Incidents and Reflections.—No. 267.

A writer in the Christian Advocate calls attention to the illustrations of Christian life and experience which may be drawn from the objects and the incidents which surround us. The following is a part of the article:

"A very suggestive lesson to me was the building of a small addition to the house last summer; the partial tearing down of one wall caused much noise, dirt and confusion, but we patiently endured the temporary inconvenience, thinking of the great improvement that we should soon see in the house when the rubbish was cleared away and the extra closets were at our service. This forcibly reminded me of 'the recompense of reward' which the Christian can anticipate while enduring a 'great fight of afflictions' that he may be molded into the likeness of his heavenly Master. He would not 'cut off a right hand' if He did not see that maiming us was needful, nor would He take away our staff of bread if He did not see that 'fulness of bread' was taking away our appetite for that which comes down from heaven.

"One day a schoolmate of mine, who was visiting us, mentioned that her father (who was an extensive coal-dealer) said that the price of coal was going up. A neighbor of ours heard this, but said nothing. He quickly engaged his winter's supply of coal at a low price; but we who did not profit by the young lady's hint had to pay the advanced price, and he laughed at us for our neighbor for not being as wise as he was. How many hints the people of the world have from human experience and teaching that they should make haste if they would lay up treasure in heaven!

"Sometimes, as I used to look at a pear tree in our back-yard, I have been reminded of the barren fig tree and its fate. Part of our tree last summer was clothed with foliage and bore fruit, but the naked branches of the dead part of the tree were fit only to be burned. What a fit illustration is this tree of those Christians who bring forth some fruit, but whose glaring defects of character prevent the supply being abundant. Spiritually speaking, they are half-dead.

"But illustrations in Christian life from way-side gatherings might be multiplied indefinitely, or they are to be found in trees and flowers and rocks and streams, and everywhere."

A good illustration of the necessity of being willing to part with everything, in order that we may gain the salvation of the soul, the pearl of great price, is found in the case of a young man in a boat who was hunting near New Haven and broke one of his oars.

"A sudden rain-storm was coming up, but he was so desirous of securing a duck he had shot, he neglected to go ashore while he could. The squall drove him far from land, and with but one oar he soon found himself helplessly drifting rapidly out to sea. Finally, seeing no hope of safety by his own exertions, he took his handkerchief and tied it to the oar, and held it up to attract attention of others, should any vessel come in sight. After weary waiting, a sloop was at length seen making for him, and as soon as it was within hailing distance of the boat the captain bade the man jump aboard the instant the sloop came alongside, as it was sailing fast under a strong wind. The order was obeyed. He jumped and caught the taffrail with both hands. "Saved!" you say. No, for no sooner had he seized hold than he was pulled back, fell into the water, and was seen no more, as the sloop dashed onward in its course. He had tied the boat's painter about his loins, and so the weight of the boat dragged him down into a watery grave. In trying to save his game he was driven out to sea; and then, in trying to save his boat, he lost his life. Had he divested himself of every weight and leaped unfettered into that ark of safety, which for an instant was within his reach, he would have been saved. O, the folly of those who are anxious to save trifles and reckless in risking all—who hesitate to lay aside every weight, and the sin that so easily besets them, and thus forever perish. Did they say as Toplady, "Nothing in my hands I bring;" did they drop what was dear to them as a right hand or eye for the sake of eternal life, they would gain heaven.

"He that forsaketh not all that he hath cannot be Christ's disciple. If there be love of money, or fear of hardship, or dread of ridicule, or choice of pleasure—whatever it is that fetters and loads down the soul, there is no hope of heaven. The gate is narrow. There is no room for the bulky appendages with which the self-righteous, or worldly, or covetous burden themselves. To dream of thus entering heaven is a fatal mistake. But by giving up all we gain all. By dropping the toys of time we receive the wealth of eternity."

A writer in The Presbyterian speaks of a friend, who manifested unflagging zeal in the work of Christ, and who explained his earnestness by the following incident:

"As soon as college closed in the summer of 188— my classmate, John Marsh, and I went to a little Canadian village on the shores of one of the Great Lakes, to spend part of the vacation.

"One night there came up a severe storm, such as is seldom seen in that locality, and particularly at that season. The waves on the lake seemed to rise almost mountain-high, the wind howled, and rain came down literally in sheets. Every now and then could be heard, through the storm, the crash of a fallen tree, or of some building being overturned.

"In the midst of the storm news came that there was a vessel, only a short distance from land, signalling for help, and evidently in great distress. Hastening down to the wharf, we found quite a crowd of villagers already assembled. By the flashes of lightning we could see the vessel, hardly three hundred yards from where we were standing, evidently not able to hold together much longer in that furious sea.

"John Marsh knew as much about the sea as an experienced sailor, and I knew that he was not the man to stand by and let those poor creatures on the vessel drown without making some effort to save them. One or two of the Canadian fishermen volunteered to go with him, and, after almost superhuman effort, they succeeded in launching a boat right side up.

"It seemed almost impossible for the frail little fishing boat to float ten minutes in such a sea; but strength and skill carried her safely through the waves and out to the sinking vessel. John and his crew could only bring off four men at a time, and then the utmost care was required to bring rescuers and rescued safe to shore. They made two trips, and were returning for the rest of the vessel's crew—three men, I believe—when the vessel seemed to give a sudden lurch, and went down forever.

"When the rescuing party returned once more to land John Marsh was lying in the bottom of the boat. Loving hands lifted him carefully, and loving hearts did every thing possible for him, but to no avail. He did not seem to feel any fear, although he knew that he had broken a blood-vessel, and was bleeding to death, a painless death, but swift and certain. All night long I watched by his bedside, and he was perfectly conscious to the last. Over and over again he kept saying, 'I might have done better! I might have saved one more! God forgive me! I can hear those poor fellows calling to us, praying to us to come back and save them, but now it is too late, too late forever, and I might have saved at least one more.'

"As long as I live, that wail of anguish, of self-condemnation will haunt me. 'I might have saved one more; God forgive me!' He seemed to lose sight of the men he had saved, of his own condition, of every thing but those who were lost.

"About daybreak he died—my strong, kindly friend, and down to the very gates of eternity he carried his burden of remorse.

"Never a day passes that the scene does not come back to me. It seems as if he had left me a legacy of anxiety for the salvation of others. He strove to preserve men from bodily death; I, from eternal. It seems to me that the day is always before me when the Master will call for an account of my stewardship; and, O! the horror of the thought that perhaps I may have nothing to bring Him, only idle years and wasted opportunity to lay at his feet!"

1802.—A Minute on the statistical inquiry similar to that of last year is given. Nine are reported as engaged in distillation, and sixty-four as dealing in spirits. "Four Quarters report that some of their members are engaged in this business without specifying the number."

"The report made last year relating to the treatment of such in membership who import, distil or vend distilled or spirituous liquors, being renewedly considered, it is under weighty deliberation believed safest to suspend any further discussion thereon at present; and Friends in the various branches of this meeting are desired to labor with those whose practice thus gives occasion of concern and exercise in meekness and patience, and as the mind is inwardly engaged for right ability in the performance of these brotherly endeavors, we may experience a degree of confidence and hope, that this discharge of duty will not be wholly unavailing tho' the effects be not as obvious as would accord with our expectation."

1803.—"Further labor with those who distil or vend distilled Spirituous Liquors is again recommended to the attention of Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, who are desired to move in this service as strength may be afforded, forwarding accounts thereof to this Meeting next year."

1806.—"A renewed desire that our testimony against the distillation, trading in and unnecessary use of distilled Spirits may be advanced and our members more generally engaged in promoting and spreading a concern which has for its aim the comfort and happiness of mankind; Monthly Meetings are again exhorted to extend labor to such whose conduct manifests they are not yet united with the body in this exercise."

1808.—"The subject of distilled Spirituous Liquors being again brought into view by advertising to the summary statement collected from the Reports, it appears that although the labors of Friends for the discouragement of the baneful traffic in, and unnecessary use of this article, have not been attended with much success since last year, yet a hope is entertained that they have, in some instances, proved beneficial. Quarterly and Monthly Meetings are desired to be faithful in a discharge of duty towards such of our members as may give occasion for uneasiness herein, and forward accounts thereof, to this Meeting next year."

1809.—"It appears that the subject of distilled Spirituous Liquors has claimed renewed attention in the respective Quarters since last year; that there are 86 wholesale and retail dealers in, and 14 distillers of that article; and that tho' there has been considerable extension of care towards most of our members of this description, but little encouragement was afforded in general that they would relinquish the traffic."

"And it is particularly recommended that renewed earnest endeavors be exerted for dissuading those who distil, trade in, or unnecessarily use those Spirituous Liquors, from continuing in a practice which causes so much concern and exercise to the brethren in religious profession; of which labor, Quarterly Meetings are desired to send up accounts to this Meeting next year."

1810.—"The subject concerning the distillation, trading in, and unnecessarily using Spirituous Liquors, appears to have claimed the attention of the several Quarters, and labor extended that a greater degree of conformity with the concern and advice of this meeting might be generally evident; notwithstanding which it appears that there are ten members engaged in distillation—79 who deal in this article (most of whom are retailers), and 8 who receive it on consignment; there are also several women concerned in retailing it whose husbands are not in membership with us. Several Friends have had their fruit or cider converted into Spirits, and divers have made use of distilled Spirits in the time of gathering in their hay and harvest. Within the limits of some Meetings, it is believed that testimony against those practices has not latterly advanced—in others, the travail of the Church appearing to have gained place in the minds of divers encourages to a continuance of further patient labor."

The whole of one and part of another sitting this year, (1810), were devoted to the subject, and a strong Minute of advice was finally adopted similar to those of previous years.

1811.—Seventy-six members are reported as wholesale dealers, retailers or receivers on consignment.

"The subject of distilled Spirituous Liquors being brought into view by reading the summary statement collected from the reports, its introduction brought a renewed exercise over the meeting, under which, divers brethren were strengthened to offer some weighty and pertinent observations, which Friends are desired to bear in remembrance, and in their respective Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, extend further patient labor towards such of our members as have not yet been prevailed upon to relinquish practices which have long been causes of painful exercise to many of their brethren;—and that a clear report of the service be sent to this Meeting next year."

1812.—Ninety-two members engaged in dealing in the article, most of them retailers, and five distillers. A Minute of advice similar to that of 1811 was adopted.

1813.—One hundred and five vend the article and (two Quarters not reporting) ten distil it. "also a number encourage distillation by sending their fruit for that purpose. Altho' in a few of the Reports, a hope is expressed that the influence of this important testimony is extending, yet it is painful to observe that, upon the whole, little or no advance has been made therein during the last year."

Forty-three Friends were appointed "to deliberate on the present state of this concern amongst us, who are desired to offer to a future sitting their sense, whether any, and what further step it may be expedient for the Meeting to take in order to the advancement of this testimony." This Committee produced a Report the meeting did not feel easy to adopt. (Report not given).

1814.—Haddonfield Quarter brought up a Report for advancing the cause of temperance, which was referred to a Committee of forty-four Friends. Their report, the meeting "does not appear easy to adopt" but refers the subject to the Yearly Meeting next year."

1815.—The subject is brought up from the Western District Monthly Meeting in regard to a rule of Discipline which was not well understood and which it was decided to change as follows:

"The word sell in the Rule of Discipline, be substituted for the word retail; so that the rule will now stand as follows"—

"And if any should distil Spirits out of grain or sell such liquors, Monthly Meetings should deal with them as with other offenders; and they cannot be prevailed with to desist from such a practice, be at liberty to declare their disunity with them."

1817.—The Southern District Monthly Meeting desiring the cause of temperance might be advanced, thirty-three Friends were appointed to consider the subject, but the Yearly Meeting did not see its way to adopt their Report.

1818.—"The concern respecting the traffic in Spirituous Liquors by members of our religious Society brought up by Philadelphia Quarters and referred on our Minutes last year, renewedly engaged the attention of the Meeting. After deliberate consideration, way did not open to take any step on this subject at the present time."

1819.—The word Births was omitted from the 4th Query.

1822.—Haddonfield Quarter Reports "The practice of Friends trading in and distilling Spirituous Liquors being brought before the view of this Meeting from the reports of two of the Monthly Meetings, it was concluded to forward the subject to the Yearly Meeting for consideration, whether the time has not arrived wherein it is expedient that a rule of Discipline be made to advance our testimony herein."

The Yearly Meeting appointed twenty-two Friends to consider the above proposition, who reported "That it be recommended to Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, to extend brotherly labor with such of their members as are engaged in distilling, trading in, or selling of distilled Spirituous Liquors, or procuring their fruit to be thus converted, and an explicit account of the care of Meetings herein and the state of their members, be forwarded to the Yearly Meeting next year. And we further propose that faithful Friends in all the Quarters, would in their private capacity, under the influence of Gospel love, extend patient tender labor to such of their fellow-members as are in the practice of using this article as a common drink, or of handing it out to others, for that purpose; endeavoring to convince them of the impropriety of such conduct, and to bring them to unite with the body in its travail for the advancement of this righteous cause."

1823.—"The Quarters report that fourteen are engaged in distillation and one hundred and two deal in the article, mostly as retailers, three who receive it on consignment, and a large number who had their fruit converted into Spirits and also that the use of the article as a drink particularly in the time of hay and harvest, is still continued in some places. Altho' the accounts thus brought into view do not afford an encouraging prospect of the present state of Society in relation to this important testimony yet from the tenor of a few of the reports, there is ground to hope that this extension of brotherly labor, has in some cases been productive of advantage."

1824.—The same subject was referred to the Subordinate Meetings, to report next year, including "the number concerned in this business," and a Committee of forty-two appointed to consider measures for advancing the testimony of Friends against distilling or trading in distilled Spirits. This Committee finding the subject "weighty and important," asked for time to give it full consideration, they were directed to report next year.

(To be concluded.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The ascent to Cotopaxi was a walk. No climbing whatever was necessary. The lower camp was distant about 8,600 feet from the nearest part of the crater, and in this distance we rose 5,500 feet, and a little higher we were able to follow snow uninterruptedly right up to the slope upon which I proposed to encamp. In order to insure regularity in the march, we tied up in line, a proceeding that our natives did not at all comprehend, and they wondered still more at the use of the axe in cutting steps in the snow, to facilitate progress. The most interesting feature I noticed upon this section of the mountain was the existence of glaciers upon the upper part of the cone. They occurred on each side of us, and in some places extended to within 100 feet of the top; but, through being much covered by ash, it was not possible to say exactly where they commenced or terminated, and for the same reason they were quite unrecognizable at a distance.

At 11 A. M. we arrived at the foot of the great slope of ash upon the western side of the summit, which leads right up to the edge of the crater, and we found this was the steepest and most laborious part of the ascent. I estimate it to be 750 feet high, and 1,100 feet long. It was composed of the materials which are being daily, even hourly, ejected (mainly of particles weighing about 500 to a grain, with an admixture of angular fragments of lava up to a quarter of an inch in diameter), and it was piled up nearly to the maximum angle at which it would stand. I know, experimentally, that its materials will stand at 41° but the face of the slope was not, I think, steeper than 37°. We deposited our baggage at the foot of it until we had completed the ascent, and found that occasional streaks of ice gave some stability to the mass, which would otherwise have slipped down in large quantities at every step.

We hurried up this unstable slope as fast as we could go and reached the western edge of the summit rim exactly at mid-day. The crater was nearly filled with smoke and steam, which drifted about and obscured the view. The opposite side could scarcely be perceived, and the bottom was quite concealed. As the vapors were wafted hither and thither, we gained a pretty good idea of the general shape of the crater, though as a whole it was not seen until night-time.

A few minutes after our arrival, a roar from the bottom told us that the "animal" (Carrel's term for the volcano) was alive. It had been settled beforehand that every man was to shift for himself if an eruption occurred, and that all our belongings were to be abandoned. When we heard the roar, there was an "it is time to be off" expression clearly written on all our faces; but before a word could be uttered we found ourselves enveloped only in a cloud of cool and quite unobjectionable steam, and we concluded to stop.

The establishment of the tent was the first consideration. It was unanimously decided that it was not advisable to camp at the top of the slope, close to the rim or lip of the crater, on account of wind and the liability to harm from lightning, and the more I examined the slope myself the less I liked it. It was naked, exposed, and slipped upon the slightest provocation. Jean Antoine and I therefore set out on a tour to look for a better place, but after spending several hours in passing round about a quarter of the crater, without result, we returned to the others, and all hands set to work to endeavor to make a platform upon the ash. This proved to be a long and troublesome business. Unlike snow, it gained no coherence by being beaten or trampled down, and the more they raked to extend our platform the more slipped down from above. Ultimately it was made sufficiently secure by scooping channels in the portion of the slope which was above and tenderly pouring many tons upon the slope below, so as to strengthen the base. The tent-ropes were secured to large blocks of lava, which had to be brought from long distances and buried in the ash. For additional security four ropes were run out besides the usual ones, and we rigged up our long rope as a sort of hand-rail to the nearest convenient point of the rim of the crater, from which we were distant 250 feet. When this was done, the natives were sent back to the lower camp, and the Carrels and I remained alone.

We had scarcely completed our preparations when a violent squall arose, which threatened to carry the whole establishment away, and during an hour it was a great question whether our abode would weather the storm. The squall passed away as suddenly as it arose, and for the rest of our stay we were not much troubled by wind. While this was occurring there was another cause for alarm. A great smell of India-rubber commenced to arise, and on putting my hand to the floor of the tent I found that it was on the point of melting.

When night fairly set in we went up to view the interior of the crater. The atmosphere was cold and tranquil. We could hear the deadead roar of the steam-blasts as they escaped from time to time. Our long rope had been fixed both to guide in the darkness, and to lessen the chance of disturbing the equilibrium of the slope of ash. Grasping it, I made my way upwards, prepared for something dramatic, for a strong glow on the under sides of the steam-clouds showed that there was fire below. Crawling and grovelling as the lip was approached, I bent eagerly forward to peer into the unknown, with Carrel behind, gripping my legs.

The vapors no longer concealed any part of the vast crater, though they were there, drifting about as before. We saw an amphitheatre 2,300 feet in diameter from north to south, and 1,650 feet across from east to west, with a rugged and irregular crest, notched and cracked; surrounded by cliffs, by perpendicular and even overhanging precipices, mixed with steep slopes—some bearing snow, and others apparently encrusted with sulphur. Cavernous recesses belched forth smoke, the sides of cracks and chasms no more than half way down shone with ruddy light; and so it continued on all sides, right down to the bottom, alternating with slope, and the fiery fissures becoming more numerous as the bottom was approached. At the bottom probably twelve hundred feet below us, and towards the centre, there was a rudely circular spot about one-tenth of the diameter of the crater, the pipe of the volcano, its channel of communication with lower regions, filled with incandescent if not molten lava, glowing and burning; with flames travelling to and fro over its surface, and scintillations scattering as from a wood-fire; lighted by tongues of flickering flame which issued from the cracks in the surrounding slopes.

ALL the doors that lead inwards to the secret place of the Most High, are doors outwards—out of self—out of smallness—out of wrong.

Ways of Debauching the Young.

BY SAMUEL COLGATE.

President of the Society for the Suppression of Vice.

It goes without saying that books of an obscene or an immoral character, have a deleterious influence on the young. After its organization the work of this society was directed against obscene literature, then lotteries, and finally gambling. Those were the three vices that we aimed to combat.

Our attention was at first directed to obscene literature. When we started, twenty years ago, there were 160 of such books regularly published and sold openly in a certain class of bookstores. But all those books were seized and destroyed years ago, the plates from which they were printed were melted, and no literature of that kind is now published. We find our greatest difficulty in destroying obscene pictures owing to the facility with which they may be produced by means of the photograph, and the ease with which they can be secretly handled and sold. But we have been very successful in that direction. We quickly get word as soon as any one is about to publish anything of that kind, and we invariably suppress it.

About one-third of the entire population of the United States are twenty-one years of age or under. This means that there are more than twenty millions of youth and children in this country. The protection of the moral purity of these millions of youth is closely involved in the work of this society. These millions of youthful souls are in the plastic state, where character is being molded, where impressions for evil are most sensibly felt, and where insidious and vicious influences are most impressive and their effects most blasting. With steady and irresistible tread this mighty phalanx is marching up from infancy to mature life. Into their keeping soon, inevitably, must be placed the reins of the Government, while Church and society must, with equal certainty, look to this advancing host for future supports.

It must not be forgotten that in each one of these young hearts there is a chamber of imagery, memory's storehouse—wherein are constantly being gathered impressions, scenes and influences that are to shape the future destiny of that soul. Too little importance is paid to this chamber of imagery in the hearts of our children. There is a criminal indifference on the part of many publishers in this country as to what impressions are made upon the lives of the rising generation by their tainted publications. Utter indifference is manifested even by some religious people, to the criminal and vicious influences of evil reading, gambling and kindred vices. The laws of Nature and the warning notes of God's Word, "Be not deceived; God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap," are all unheeded.

There are certain forms of evil that especially curse the young, which this society has, for seventeen years, in the face of indifference and opposition, persistently assailed, to wit: obscene and criminal literature, articles of indecent and immoral use, gambling and lotteries. These evils are crime-breeders. They destroy public morals: they undermine religion and honey-comb the foundations of good government.

The Society for the Suppression of Vice has felt that the highest public service to this nation, is that which preserves the moral purity of the youth and children.

We cannot tolerate public gambling in any form without reaping a harvest of immorality, embezzlements, defalcations, robberies, breaches of trust, and general dishonesty. There cannot be gathered purity from a scattering of impurity, nor cleanliness from disseminating that which is foul; neither can we expect pure men and women in the future if the boys and girls of to-day are to be corrupted and debauched either by the sensational stories of loathsome crimes in the daily press, by the tainted and contagious pages of the light literature of to-day, or by the more deadly and grosser class of obscene publications. * * *

The ravages of the forms of gambling known as "pool gambling" and book-making are fearful to contemplate. Every year the newspapers are filled with accounts of embezzlements, defalcations, breaches of trust, robbery, suicide and murder, as results of these evils. The large space given in the daily newspapers to these crime-breeders under the heading of "sporting news," is simply fostering crime and promoting dishonesty. Boss gamblers and their decoys, in a high-haunted manner, invade, not only every race track, but maintain open saloons in the midst of the marts of trade and commerce, a constant menace to industrious habits and common honesty. This form of so-called amusement may be popular, but nevertheless it is none the less a crime against public morals.

"Sure tips," are often the invention of the gamblers or their decoys. Young men are so carried away with the idea that they are going to win that they resolve to try their luck with money obtained by fair means or foul. Two young men of most reputable families were brought to our notice last summer. They had obtained over $100 worth of jewelry upon false pretenses, pawned it for $50 and staked it upon a "sure tip" only to lose it. We raided and closed the gambling den where the bet was made, and were able to save the two youths and their families from disgrace.

During last year one hundred and twenty-eight persons were either shot or stabbed over gambling games. Four were stabbed and five shot at poker, twelve stabbed and twenty-four shot over the game of craps—a game of dice much played by boot-blacks and newsboys upon the sidewalk, and by fast young men and negroes. Twenty-eight men were stabbed, and fifty-five were shot over the gambling table, or as the direct result thereof.

Besides these, six attempted suicide, twenty-four committed suicide, and sixty persons were murdered in cold blood, while two were driven insane.

Sixty-eight youths and persons were ruined by pool gambling and betting upon horse-racing.

Among the crimes committed to get money to gamble with were two burglaries, eighteen forgeries, and eighty-five embezzlements, while thirty-two persons holding positions of trusts in banks and other places of mercantile life absconded.

The enormous sum of $2,898,372 is shown by this same record, as the proceeds of these embezzlements and defalcations.

To these crimes must be added the long list of thefts, robberies, embezzlements, larcenies and defalcations, which are never known except to immediate friends, or persons especially interested.

There have been fully two tons' weight of obscene books, pictures and plates seized and destroyed during the past year, including four different books and the plates for making them, while another book was prevented from being printed after the manuscript had been sent to the printer. * * *

The worst feature of our cheap literature, in the present day, is the nasty character of so many novels and the immoral effect which they leave on the mind of the reader. The law, as it is, can hardly reach them, and it is difficult to get a jury that will agree as to the improper character of the books. We have stopped the publication of a great many such works, but we cannot do it publicly; we do it privately because if we mentioned the name of a book which we believed ought to be suppressed, and we did not succeed in suppressing it, it would simply have the effect of advertising the book.

CONTENT.

Not asking how or why,
Before thy will,
O Father, let my heart
Lie hushed and still!

Why should I seek to know?
Thou art all-wise;
If thou dost bid me go,
Let that suffice.

If thou dost bid me stay,
Make me content
In narrow bounds to dwell
Till life be spent.

If thou dost seal the lips
That fain would speak,
Let me be still till thou
The seal shalt break.

If thou dost make pale Pain
Thy minister,
Then let my patient heart
Clasp hands with her.

Or, if thou sendest Joy
To walk with me,
My Father, let her lead
Me nearer thee!

Teach me that Joy and Pain
Alike are thine.
Teach me my life to leave
In hands Divine!

FOR "THE FRIEND."

[A Friend in Massachusetts sends us the following lines, accompanied with this comment—"If we do not recognize among the poor and lowly of this world that they are such as Christ came to seek and to save; should we, if we had lived at the time of his appearance on earth, have recognized in Him and his teaching, his Divine mission?"—Ed.]

INASMUCH.

"If I had dwelt," so mused a tender woman,
All fine emotions stirred Through pondering o'er that life, Divine yet human,
Told in the sacred word—

"If I had dwelt of old, a Jewish maiden,
In some Judean street
Where Jesus walked, and heard his word so laden
With comfort strangely sweet:

And seen the face where utmost pity blended
With each rebuke of wrong;
I would have left my lattice, and descended,
And followed with the throng.

If I had been the daughter, jewel-girdled,
Of some rich rabbi there;
Seeking the sick, blind, halt, my blood had curdled
At sight of such despair,

And I had wrenched the sapphires from my fillet,
Nor let one spark remain;
Snatched up my gold, amid the crowd to spill it,
For pity of their pain.

I would have let the palsied fingers hold me;
I would have walked between
The Marys and Salome, while they told me
About the Magdalene.

"Foxes have holes"—I think my heart had broken
To hear the words so said,
"While Christ had not"—were sadder ever spoken?
"A place to lay his head in!"

I would have flung abroad my doors before Him,
And in my joy have been
First on the threshold, eager to adore Him,
And crave his entrance in!"

Ah, would you so? Without a recognition
You passed Him yesterday;
Jostled aside, unhelped, his mute petition,
And calmly went your way.

With warmth and comfort, garmented and girdled,
Before your window-sill
Sweep heart-sick crowds—and if your blood is curdled
You wear your jewels still.

You catch aside your robes, lest want should clutch them
In its implorings wild;
Or lest some woeful penitent might touch them,
And you be thus defiled.

O dreamers, dreaming that your faith is keeping
All service free from blot,
Christ daily walks your streets, sick, suffering, weeping
And ye perceive Him not!

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Fourth of Ninth Month. Lodged at John Sawyer's; travelled thirty-five miles west through a mountainous country almost literally covered with rocks and stones, but thickly inhabited by many people, and lodged at Abijah Johnston's within about six miles of Connecticut River, and the line of Vermont State.

Fifth of Ninth Month. Had a meeting at Unity, which was small and not very lively; in which I felt my way open to labor amongst them to the peace of my own mind; blessed be the Lord for his goodness unto the children of men. Were it not for his mercies we should be consumed; but his compassions fail not.

Last night we had a severe frost which killed a good deal of Indian corn and potatoes; which will be seriously felt in a country like this, where grain is scarce and high; corn $1.50 to 62¢, wheat $3 per bushel; which shows unto us that we must quickly perish from the face of the earth, should He withhold the blessings of this life.

Sixth of the Ninth Month and 4th of the week. Travelled about forty miles amongst the mountains, a south course, and lodged at Lev Wheelers, having Winslow Copeland for our pilot.

Seventh of the month and 5th day of the week. Notice was given of our attendance at their midweek meeting, which is very small for a Monthly Meeting; and no other meeting of Friends within forty or fifty miles. Many gay people, particularly women, attended; and through holy help, was a good and a watering season. The Lord in the riches of his mercy condescending to be as a refreshing "brook by the way."

Blessed be the name of the Lord, who hitherto hath helped us."

Eighth of the month. This day we travelled a distance of about fifty miles to Bolton, and lodged at James Fry's.

It is now Seventh-day morning, 9th of Ninth Month, and notice given for meeting for us to day at Bolton.

Tenth day of the month. The meeting alluded to was a solemnizing and favored season; the Lord condescending to be in the midst, as a refreshing "brook by the way;" watering and eding his sheep to the humbling of our hearts, and to the praise of his great and holy name.

From here we went to Worcester fifteen miles, and lodged at Edward Earle's in a village of about eight thousand inhabitants.

Meeting at Leicester, six miles from Worcester, first day of the week; attended it to the peace of my own mind; had good service therein; the Lord opening and strengthening my understanding, until I was a wonder to myself; blessed be his great and holy name forever! From thence we went to North Bridge, a distance of twenty miles and lodged at one Mr.orton's.

Eleventh of the month and second day of the week. Had two meetings; one at North Bridge and the other at Uxbridge; both open and reviving opportunities. At the close of the latter, felt a comfortable stop in my mind from further appointments, as though my service here was drawing to a close; which continued with me through the night, also next morning, being the third day of the week. We went to Providence, a distance of seventeen miles, passing meeting houses on our right hand, and on our left.

Dined at Dr. Samuel B. Tobey's, in the village above named, of about eighteen or twenty thousand inhabitants.

Here we met with our dear friend, John Meader, who kindly invited us home with him, which we readily accepted of, and lodged.

Fourth-day. Attended the meeting which is held of course on this day of the week at Providence Boarding School. As to myself silent and peaceful.

Thirteenth of Ninth Month. Returned again with J. Meader, after dining with Friends at the School.

Fifth day of the week, attended Providence meeting as it came in course. Through holy help, had good services therein; having the company of dear John Meader, whose kindness and near sympathy, and fellowship in the Gospel has been grateful and strengthening together in the Lord.

Sixth-day afternoon. Had an appointed meeting at Cranston; the fore part of which was dry and lifeless, in which I labored to but little purpose of good, and took my seat; my mind not relieved; and sitting awhile, felt the spirit of prayer to clothe my mind; and yielding unto was enabled, through holy help, to relieve my feelings, and leave the burden, I trust, where it belonged.

Blessed be the name of the Lord forever!

Seventh day of the week, met with some of the prominent members to consult about the propriety of selling our horses and quitting the field in this part of the vineyard, which they thought would do, providing I felt easy in leaving the balance of the meetings, of which there seemed to be some doubts with some of them; but it remained easy in my mind.

In the afternoon, attended the funeral of an aged woman Friend; there being a large collection of people met on the solemn occasion, and a meeting held around the corpse, in which dear John Meader had a lively testimony. After which I was drawn forth in supplication, and under the power of that spirit which makes intercession, to the humbling of our souls, and a breaking down of many hearts, and all seemed to be brought near one unto another in the heavenly relationship in Christ Jesus, who gave us the victory.

Blessed be his great and holy name forever! On First-day, attended two meetings as they came in course; one at Lower Smithfield; the other at Friends' Boarding School; both to good satisfaction; having some service therein.

Second-day, made arrangements for leaving New England, and Third-day forenoon, attended with the Yearly Meeting Committee of examination of the Boarding School of Providence, which would have been a very interesting thing to me to have seen them go through the whole examination, but it would take two or three days; but at four o'clock this afternoon, we were to bid adieu to all our dear friends of New England, and accordingly took our passage in the steamboat Rhode Island, bound for New York, where we landed at half-past six in the morning, and there changed for the nine o'clock boat for Amboy, where we took the railroad, thirty-five miles to Bordentown, and again in the steamboat down the Delaware River, making twenty-five hours from Providence, R. I., to Philadelphia, a distance of about three hundred and twenty miles.

Fifth day of the week, rested in Philadelphia.

Sixth-day, came up to John Buckman's by the assistance of my kind friend, J. Kite, and lodged, from whence he took me in his carriage to Benjamin Lowry's.

William Kennard's visit to New York Yearly Meeting:

Third of Fifth Month, 1841. Took leave of my son and many dear Friends of Mount Pleasant in tenderness, with desires unto the Lord, that the Angel of His Presence may be our support and our rejoicing, of whose power and love I have in an unusual manner felt to be my support in the arduous journey in which I have now embarked to visit the seed which the Lord hath planted in the North and Eastern parts which compose the Yearly Meeting of New York.

Ten o'clock at night, reached Cadiz, and next day at two o'clock in Dover, where we took the canal-boat, bound for Cleveland; Fourth-day, the 5th, about nine o'clock, called in Massillon, and made a short visit at the dwelling-house of Mar. Folger. Reached Cleveland on Lake Erie; there took the steamboat Anthony Wayne, bound for Toledo, where we took the railroad car thirty-three miles to Adrian (Mich.) Attended seven meetings besides a Monthly Meeting; and also one appointment from amongst Friends.

Seventh-day, the 8th of Fifth Month, dined at George Carpenter's, and lodged at Elihu Carpenters; and in the morning of the ninth, being First-day, attended Adrian Meeting, in which the good hand of Providence was near, in which I was strengthened to labor amongst them, to the peace of my own mind, and to the tendering of many souls.

Felt inward peace and a thankful mind.

Returned to David Harkness's; a minister in whom my soul nearly united in the covenant of life.

In the afternoon had a meeting at Raisin, in which my dear friend, D. H., together with myself, was engaged to bear testimony amongst the people, in the authority under which we felt our minds clothed.

On Second-day, the 10th, Aaron Comfort, a kind Friend, took us in his carriage about thirty-five miles to Been Creek. Lodged at John Comstock's. Third-day, the 11th, had a meeting in his house which is called Rollin; also another at Woodstock in the afternoon; both owned by the Great Head of the Church, so that D. remarked, that if the Master was not with us he was mistaken; both these meetings ending in solemn supplication unto the Lord.

Returned on Fourth-day to Tecumseh; lodged at Aaron Comfort's.

On Fifth-day, attended Adrian Monthly Meeting to good satisfaction. On Sixth-day, had a meeting at Palmyra, held in the house of George Crany, which was a low time; the seed suffered and I suffered with it; having nothing to offer in the ministerial line.

Lodged at Samuel Satterthwaites, near Tecumseh. On Seventh-day we travelled; the above named Friend took his carriage and horses and carried us about sixty miles, although a busy season; cheerfully gave up his time, and enjoyed himself on the journey.

We had a meeting at Macon (where a meeting of Friends has been laid down), which was, through the Master's favor, a refreshing time.

On First-day, the 16th, had a meeting at a place called Ypsilanti, which was a laborious time; the minds of the people outward, after the good things of this world; and so miss of the true riches.

From thence we went to Farmington. Had a meeting at 3 o'clock, Second-day afternoon, seventeenth; a painful time; the state of the meeting at a low ebb. My mouth was opened to declare the Truth, in which I felt sweet peace.

Here we parted with our affectionate friend, S. S., who returned homeward.

Third-day, the 18th, we were conveyed by a Friend by the name of Stephen Lapping, in a market wagon with two live calves, eighteen miles to Detroit; lodged, and on the morning of the nineteenth we sailed at half-past nine o'clock in the steamboat Wisconsin, bound for Buffalo, three hundred and twenty miles; reached that port on the twentieth, eight o'clock in the evening; lodged in the city; 21st, travelled in the stage coach to Hamburg; put up at John Durham's.

Fifth Month, 22nd. Was carried by him twenty-eight miles to Orangeville. Twenty-third. We had a meeting at this place, in which I felt amply compensated for all my toil.

Lodged the evening before at Jeduthun Butler's, whose wife is a Hicksite, but attended our meeting, which was said to be the first time the meeting was held in the dwelling house of William Hall. Returned after meeting twenty-eight miles to John Durham (or Dunham), and lodged; who again took us six miles to Dr. Joseph Darnold's, a minister, where I enjoyed myself; being the 24th of the month. On this day we rested, and wrote letters home.

Crush in a Coal Mine.

On the 6th [Tenth Month,] 1835, in a remote part of the old coal mine of Kilgrammie, near Dailly, John Brown, the hero of this tragedy, was at work alone. Sixty-six years of age, but hale in body and fond of fun, he had long been a favorite with his fellow workmen, more especially with the younger colliers, whom his humor and story telling used to bring to his side when their own term of work was done. Many a time would they take his pick from him, and finish his remaining task, while he sat on the floor of the mine, and gave them his racy chat in return. On the day in question he was apart from the others, at the far end of a roadway. While there an empty wagon came rumbling along the rails, and stopped within a foot of the edge of the hole in which his work lay. Had it gone a few inches farther, it would have fallen upon him, and deprived him either of limb or life. There seemed something so thoughtless in such an act as the pushing of a wagon upon him that he came up to see which of his fellow workmen could have been guilty of it. But nobody was there. He shouted along the dark mine; but no sound came back, save the echo of his own voice. That evening, when the men had gathered round the village fires, the incident of the wagon was matter of earnest talk. Everybody scorned the imputation of having, even in mere thoughtlessness, risked a life in the pit. Besides, nobody had been in that part of the workings except Brown himself. He fully acquitted them, having an explanation of his own to account for the movements of the wagon. He had known such things happen before, he said, and was persuaded that it could only be the devil, who seemed much more ready to push along empty hutches, and so endanger men's lives, than to give any miner help in pushing them when full.

In truth, this story of the wagon came in the end to have a significance little dreamt of at the time. It proved to have been the first indication of a "crush" in the pit, that is, a falling in of the roof. The coal seam was a thick one, and in extracting it, massive pillars, some sixteen or seventeen feet broad and forty to fifty feet long, were left to keep the roof up. At first, half of the coal only was taken out; but after some progress had been made the pillars were reduced in size, so as to let a third more of the seam be removed. This, of course, was a delicate operation, since the desire to get as much coal out of the mine as possible led to the risk of paring down the pillars so far as to make them too weak for the enormous weight they had to bear. Such a failure of support leads to a "crush." The weakened pillars are crushed to fragments, and at the same time the floor of the pit under the enormous and unequal pressure, is here and there squeezed up even to the roof. Such was the disaster that now befell the coal pit of Kilgrammie. It had been the early disturbance of level heralding the final catastrophe that sent the empty wagon along the roadway.

For a couple of days cracks and grinding noises went on continuously in the pit, the levels of the rails got more and more altered, and though the men remained at work, it became hourly more clear that part of the workings would now need to be abandoned. At last on the 8th [Tenth Month] the final crash came suddenly and violently. The huge weight of rock under which the galleries ran settled down solidly on them, with a noise and shock which, spreading for a mile or two up and down the quiet vale of the Girvan, were set down at the time as the passing of an earthquake. Over the site of the mine itself, the ground was split open into huge rents for a space of several acres, the dam of a pond gave way and the water streamed off while the horses at the mouth of the pit took fright, and came scampering masterless and in terror into the little village, the inhabitants of which rushed out of doors, and were standing in wonderment as to what had happened.

But the disasters above ground were only a feeble indication of the terrors underneath. Constant exposure to risk hardens a man against an appreciation of his dangers, and even makes him, it may be, foolhardy. The Kilgrammie colliers had continued their work with reckless disregard of consequences, until at last the cry arose among them that the roof was settling down. First they made a rush to the bottom of the shaft, in hopes of being pulled up by the engine. But by this time the shaft had become involved in the ruin of the roof. A second shaft stood at a little distance; but this, too, they found to be closed. Every avenue of escape cut off, and amid the hideous groanings and grindings of the sinking ground, the colliers had retreated to a part of the workings where the pillars yet stood firm. Fortunately one of them remembered an old tunnel or "day-level," running from the mine for more than half a mile to the Brunston Holm, on the banks of the Girvan, and made originally to carry off the underground water. They were starting to find the entrance to this tunnel, when they noticed, for the first time, that John Brown was not among them. Two of the younger men (one of whom told me the story) started back through the falling part of the workings, and found the old man at his post, working as unconcernedly as if he had been digging potatoes in his own garden. With some difficulty they persuaded him to return with them, and were in the act of hurrying him along, when he remembered that in his haste he had left his jacket behind. In vain they tried to drag him along. "The jacket was a new one," he said, "and as for the pit, he had been at a crush before now, and would win through it this time, too." So, with a spring backwards, he tore himself away from them, and dived into the darkness of the mine in search of his valued garment. Hardly, however, had he parted from them when the roof between him and them came down with a crash. They managed to rejoin their comrades. John Brown was sealed up within the mine, most probably, as they thought, crushed to death between the ruins of the roof and floor.

Those who have ever, by any chance, peeped into the sombre mouth of the day-level of a coal-pit, will realize what the colliers had now to do to make good their escape. The tunnel had been cut simply as a drain; dark water and mud filled it almost to the roof. For more than half a mile they had to walk, or rather crouch along in a stooping posture through this conduit, the water often up to their shoulder, sometimes indeed, with barely room for their heads to pass between the surface of the slimy water and the rough roof above. But at length, they reached the bright daylight, as it streamed over the green holms and autumn woods of the Girvan, no man missing save him whom they had done their best to rescue. They were the first to bring the tidings of their escape to the terrified village.—Geological Sketches.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Pressure of Sand.—In the examination of a sand mound at Tick Island, Florida, the pressure of the overlying sand was found to be so heavy, that the bones of the skeletons interred there were crushed.

Torpidity in Dry Weather.—The Tauree, an insect eating creature of Madagascar, resembling a hedge-hog, is very active during the rainy season, but lies torpid for nearly six months in the dry period. There is a class of animals intermediate between frogs and fishes, and able to breathe either in air or water. A careful examination of one of these showed that during the dry period of nine months it remained buried to a depth of five feet in dried mud. On the return of rain, the dried mucus covering the animal dissolves, and the creature straightens out from its doubled-up position.

Crossing Lake Baikal in Winter.—Julie Price describes his driving for thirty miles on the ice surface of the lake as follows: "Owing to the marvellous transparency of the water, the ice presented everywhere the appearance of polished crystal, and was so colorless that it was like passing over space. It gave me at first quite an uncanny feeling to look over the side of the sledge down into the black abyss beneath."

The South African Aloes.—This drug is principally procured from the species Aloe ferox. A visitor to the district says: "The whole country both on the level ground and far up the hill sides was thickly covered with the plants. The average height of the stems was to 10 feet. In gathering it each workman provided with a stout leather glove for the left hand, a cutlass or bill-hook, and a trough similar to a pig-trough, made of 6-inch board, with square ends, so as to stand level, and having on each side a rail at a sufficient height from the top of the trough to support the end of the leaves. As the leaves are cut the workman places the cut on each side of the trough with the cut end downwards, and lays one row over the other until the trough is full. He then fills in the same manner a second and a third trough, by which time the leaves of the first are sufficiently drained of their juice, and are then taken off and thrown away, the juice in the trough being emptied into a bucket. A good hand will collect about a bucketful of juice each day. Those plants which are most covered with prickles are considered the best. When sufficient juice is collected, it is placed in an iron pot or boiler, and boiled about half an hour until the juice thickens."

A Sad Contrast.—A German residing in America paid a visit to his native country, and thus describes what he witnessed there:—"One day I saw a review of cavalry in Berlin. There were the sands of men cantering gaily along for the entertainment of the Emperor. The next day I went into the country, and not very far from the capital I saw a woman holding a plough, and this was being dragged through the earth by two other women and a dog harnessed together. Here there were two pictures—the idle horses and the idle men capering about Berlin, the women and dogs doing the work of men and horses in the country."

Friends' Missionary Training Home.—The Low Friend of Seventh Month 1st, contains a notice of the proposed establishment "of a Students' Home of Residence for young men who feel called to devote themselves to Foreign Missionary Work." This seems to us another step in the path which leads to the substitution of human wisdom for arrangements for the pure leadings of the Spirit of Christ, which in former times prepared as well commissioned such men as Stephen Grellet, Joel Woolman, Daniel Wheeler, George Fox and others for the services to which the Lord had called them.

Movements of Jonathan E. Rhoads and Sam Morris.—We learn that our friend Jonathan Rhoads, accompanied by Ephraim Smith, arrived at Pasadena, Cal., from Philadelphia, on the 2nd of Sixth Month, after a safe journey, and were met at the railroad station by one of the Friends residing there, at whose comfortable home they were accommodated while they remained in that neighborhood. On the 26th they attended the meeting at that place consisting largely of Friends from Ohio and Iowa. On the 27th they had a religious opportunity with some members residing at El Riverside; on the 29th attended a meeting at Elmore in the morning, and in the evening a meeting at Wildemar, seven miles further south. On the 1st of Seventh Month, an appointed meeting was held at Escondido, where two families of Friends reside. This meeting was held in a school-house and was attended by about fifty persons. On the 2nd they were at a meeting at El Modena; First-day, the 3rd, were again at the meeting regularly held at Pasadena, and in the evening of the met those who are members of the so-called "waker Church" in that place. On the 4th they were present at a meeting with some under our name at Long Beach, in which as in the preceding person is employed to officiate as "pastor." On the 5th they attended a meeting at Whittier, and the 6th visited Santa Barbara, and on the 7th had a religious opportunity in the family of a member living there. On the 9th they were present in the morning at the meeting near San Jose, to which El Bean belongs, and in the evening at one composed of a different class under the name of Friends. They left San Francisco on the 12th for Astland, Oregon, where they arrived on the 14th. In addition to the above they visited a number of families in different settlements, in several of which during seasons of retirement and the expression of religious concern were afforded them. Our friend, Samuel Morris, left Philadelphia on the 20th, intending to remain during the following stay-day at Colorado Springs on his way to join Nathaniel Rhoads in San Francisco, whence they expect to take passage for Japan on the 4th of the 5th Month.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 30, 1892.

The recent trouble at Homestead, near Pittsburgh, and the murderous conflict and loss of life that occurred there, have arrested the attention of the public mind in this country, and to some extent in Europe. It originated in a dispute between the proprietors of the extensive iron and steel works located there, and their workmen, as to the scale of wages to be adopted. The workmen employed in this establishment are members of what is known as the Amalgamated Association, which does not permit its members to work in any mills except under regulations prescribed by its own officers. The different mills and their yards, etc., of the Homestead works, occupy an area of 110 acres, situated on the banks of the Monongahela River. As the parties concerned could not arrive at an agreement respecting the wage-scale, the owners of the property determined to close the works for some time, enclose the whole in a strong fence, and employ a set of watchmen to guard and protect the premises. For this purpose they made a contract with the Pinkerton agency, to send them 300 men. These men were brought to the site in barges, but their landing was opposed by an excited body of the locked-out workmen. A conflict ensued, in which several persons were killed and others wounded, and the Pinkerton men were prevented from entering the premises. The workmen had stationed detachments of men on the roads leading to Homestead to intercept any non-union workmen who might be induced to seek employment there, with the determination to compel the proprietors to accede to their terms; and their opposition to the introduction of the Pinkerton guards, was probably a part of the same plan of keeping out any operatives other than themselves. The Sheriff of the county, being unable to collect a body of deputies, sufficient to restore the possession of the Homestead works to their owners, applied to the Governor of Pennsylvania, who called out an overwhelming body of the State militia, so that at the last accounts were in quiet possession of the town and surrounding places.

As to the question of wages, there are so many things to be considered, that those not familiar with a business, are rarely competent to arrive at a well-founded judgment. Carnegie Company may or may not have demanded an unreasonable reduction in the scale they presented to their workmen; and the latter may or may not have been unreasonable in their demands; but their resolution to prevent by force if necessary, any others from taking their places, is not only illegal, but wrong. As Governor Pattison said to one of the attorneys for the Amalgamated Association,—"the placing of pickets about the works by workmen to prevent others from going inside, struck a direct blow at the root of government, because it interfered with the liberties of citizens."

There are many persons, who will not join a trade union, because it practically places them under the control of others, and interferes with their freedom of action, often compelling them to refuse work which is agreeable to them, and which would pay them well, because persons are employed in the same establishment who are not members of their union, or because the management of the office conflicts in some other way, with the rules of the union. There are some persons of tender conscience, who do not feel themselves at liberty to enter into an agreement to govern their actions by the will of others, who may (and at times do) require them to act in a way which their own judgment does not approve of. By the rules of the trade unions, all such are excluded from finding work in any establishment under their control.

It is not surprising to learn that Carnegie & Co. express their determination to reopen their works as a place where competent men may find work whether they belong to a trade union or not; and that they will make their agreements as to wages with those whom they employ, without interference from others—thus ignoring the Amalgamated Association.

It is lamentable that labor unions while exercising their right of association for what they may consider mutual benefit, should so disregard the rights of property of their employers, the rights of fellow workmen not of their union, the demands of civilization, and the requirements of the christian religion, as to seize the property and destroy the lives of their fellow men for the sake of maintaining their organization.

This spirit of destruction has created a demand for larger numbers of watchmen for the protection of large establishments than immediate neighborhoods are able to supply upon sudden emergencies, and the supplying of this want is one of the objects of the Pinkerton Agency.

Professors of the religion of Him who declared, "My Kingdom is not of this world," must ever mourn at the clash of arms, whenever heard, and from whatever cause. Violence sometimes results when the want of bread for starving families creates a demand of nature for the famished ones, which overrides the reason, but in this favored land, where the necessities and comforts, and some luxuries of life are for the most part enjoyed by the laboring classes, no such demand of nature can be cited as the cause of most of the great labor disturbances of the country.

It is to be feared that many of the newspapers, and public men, and even religious teachers, too easily lend their influence to encourage in labor unions much that should be utterly extinguished, but whatever methods experience shall bring to the nation for improvements in solving the problems of our industrial institutions may be gladly welcomed by all who have the welfare of the nation at heart. The danger of legislation during times of excitement is, that partisan motives may construe it rather than a sense of justice and appreciation of individual rights. No classes of citizens are exempt from responsibility, but there is a peculiar responsibility resting upon legislators and teachers of religion among the working classes, that they do not pander to the passions of the masses,—but that they point them to the Golden Rule and the guidance of the inward monitor.

There is no remedy for the ills of society that can supersede the christian religion, and for its spread in every heart it behooves all good citizens to labor.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—There are but two obstacles now in the way of an early adjournment of Congress, and they are the World's Fair amendment of the Sundry Civil Appropriation bill and the pending Anti-options bill in the Senate. When they are disposed of the session will terminate.

The Conference Committee on the Sundry Civil Appropriation bill has succeeded in adjusting all the points of difference between the two Houses, except in regard to the World's Fair appropriation of $5,000,000, in regard to which they will report total disagreement.

From a false idea of economy, a large number of Representatives in the House will use their utmost endeavors to prevent the final passage of the World's Fair appropriation.

The President has approved the joint resolution providing for an investigation of the slums of cities. Also the act providing when a plaintiff may sue as a poor person and when counsel shall be assigned by the Court.

The President of the United States on the 21st inst., issued a proclamation, in accordance with the act of Congress, declaring the 21st of Tenth Month, 1892, a national holiday, it being the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus.

A dispatch from Wallace, Idaho, states, all is quiet here and work has been resumed at all the mines in Coeur d'Alene. Wages have been fixed at $3.50 for skilled miners and $3.00 per day for shovellers. The presence of the troops is a guarantee that the men can work for whom they please without becoming members of any organization.

The strike at the Carnegie Steel Works at Homestead, Pa., still continues. The last day fixed by the Company upon which the locked-out men and strikers could apply for their old positions has expired. None of the old employees returned to work, but non-union men are being gradually introduced into the mills. The Company, however, rely upon many of their old employees eventually returning to work. The town of Homestead is still occupied by the militia, but there has been no serious disturbance.

About seven hundred men employed at the Duquesne steel mill, of the Carnegie Steel Company, went on strike out of sympathy with the locked-out Homestead men.

Burgess John McLuckie, Hugh O'Donnell, Hugh Ross, Martin Foy and Peter Allen have been admitted to bail in the sum of $10,000 each. These men were charged with being participants in the murder of a Pinkerton man and a mill-worker during the battle at Homestead on Seventh Month 6th.

An Anarchist, who gave his name as Alexander Berkman, entered the office of Carnegie & Co., in Pittsburgh, on Seventh-day afternoon, and shot H. C. Frick twice and stabbed him in three places with a dagger. After a struggle he was overpowered by persons in the office, assisted by H. C. Frick, and turned over to the police. Chairman Frick's wounds were not fatal and he is making satisfactory progress toward recovery. He will not deviate from the policy he has been pursuing and will continue to direct the contest at Homestead from his home. Berkman was held in $14,000 bail.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 546, which is 31 less than the previous week. Of the whole number 289 were males and 257 females. The unusual number of 232 were under one year of age; 124 died of cholera infantum; 40 of consumption; 39 of marasmus; 29 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 21 of inanition; 20 of heart disease; 19 of diphtheria; 18 of convulsions, and 14 of cancer.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 116 a 116½; currency 6's, 106½ a 117½.

COTTON was in limited request, but steady, on a basis of 7½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.25 a $2.50; do., extras, $2.75 a $3.10; No. 2 winter family, $3.25 a $3.65;

Pennsylvania roller, straight, $4.00 a $4.30; Western winter, clear, $3.90 a $4.25; do. do., straight, $4.25 a $4.50; winter patent, $4.50 a $4.75; Minnesota, clear, $3.35 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.85 a $4.35; do., patent, $4.50 a $4.75; do. favorite brands, higher. Rye flour moved slowly and prices were barely steady at $3.80 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 84 a 84½ cts.

No. 2 mixed corn, 53½ a 54 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 39 a 39½ cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Good, 5½ a 5½ cts.; medium, 4¾ a 5 cts.; common, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; culls, 3¾ a 4 cts.; Fat cows, 3 a 4 cts.; Texas, 3¾ a 4¾ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 5 a 5½ cts.; medium, 4¾ a 4¾ cts.; common, 3¾ a 4 cts.; culls, 2 a 3½ cts.; Lambs, 4 a 7½ cts.

HOGS continue high, in sympathy with the West.

FAT COWS.—3 a 4 cts.

THIN COWS.—$10 a $22.50.

MILCH COWS.—$25 a 50.

FOREIGN.—The Standard says that A. Akers-Douglass, Conservative whip, has communicated with Arnold Morley, Liberal whip, with the object of getting the opposition members to present themselves in the House of Commons as soon as possible to be sworn in, thus shortening the formal proceedings and enabling Gladstone to introduce his resolution on Eighth Month 9th, the debate on which might be concluded at the end of a week.

The Berlin correspondent of the Times says: Count Von Waldersee, in an interview at Luzerne, denied that he took an important part in the recent endeavor to reconcile the Emperor to Prince Bismarck, or that he had intrigued against Chancellor Von Caprivi. He said, that when at Kiel, the Czar requested him to go to Friedrichsruhe to present the Czar's felicitations to Prince Bismarck, which he did without reference to reconciliation.

Referring to the neutrality of Switzerland, Count Waldersee said that no scheme existed in German military plans to invade Switzerland in the event of war between the Dreibund and France, and that no efforts had been made to induce Switzerland to join the Dreibund. The latter desired Helvetia to remain neutral. He saw no sign of danger of a war between Great European powers. There was more danger of a war between smaller Eastern States, where Russia was striving to increase her influence. Referring to English politics, Count Waldersee said that Germany did not look with favor upon a Gladstone Ministry. The evacuation of Egypt would be a great mistake. England's occupation of Egypt was more important than the possession of Constantinople.

The eruption of Mount Etna continues to diminish in violence. The stream of lava that was flowing in an eastward direction has come to a standstill.

The famous robber tower at Znaim, in Moravia, one of the oldest relics of the Middle Ages, has fallen. Five persons were killed by the falling walls.

A dispatch to the Lancet from Paris, says that the cholera in the suburbs of that city is stationary, and exhibits no tendency to extension within the fortifications. Officially the disease is styled epidemic choleraforme. It develops so slowly that time for preparations to combat it can be readily taken.

The Times's St. Petersburg correspondent says: Official cholera returns for the period from Seventh Month 17th to Seventh Month 21st, gave the number of cases in Russia as 4,839, and the number of deaths as 2,590.

In Nijni Novgorod cholera is confined to a few travellers from infected districts. The epidemic on the Volga is decreasing rapidly, but the disease is spreading in the south of Russia.

Advices received from Astrakhan are to the effect that the epidemic of cholera at that place is abating. From these advices it is also learned that serious disturbances, due to the outbreak of the disease, have occurred at Srenaiach Toubanowd, in the Province of Astrakhan, where the inhabitants and a number of emigrants rebelled against the sanitary measures adopted by the authorities. The rioters attacked and pillaged the post-office and the communal offices, and also wrecked a pharmacy and killed the proprietor and his assistant. They then attacked the police, who were trying to restore order, killing one and injuring a number of others.

Desperate fighting has taken place between the Angleret tribesmen and the Moorish troops. The result of the battle is unknown. The insurgents have set fire to and destroyed three villages—Zeenats, Zalawen and Kahya.

Dr. Stuhlmann, Emin Pasha's second in command, writes to Dr. Schweinfurth from East Africa, denying that Emin Pasha invaded British territory, or that he had tried to recover the ivory he left at Wadelai, the rebels having seized and carried it off. The fatigues of the marches, says Dr. Stuhlmann, sapped Emin's health, his eyesight became worse until he could not read or write, or see the way, and he continued to suffer from insomnia and from frequent hemorrhages from an old ear wound. Dr. Stuhlmann, who parted with Emin some distance west of Victoria Nyanza, brings to the coast a rich scientific collection.

The British Minister to Guatemala has telegraphed to the Foreign Office that the Government of Honduras has closed the coast to foreign commerce.

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY.—The Library will be open during the Seventh and Eighth Months, on Fifth-day afternoons, from 3 to 6 o'clock.

DIED, at his residence, near London Grove, Chester County, Penna., Seventh Month 7th, 1892, MORRIS COPE, a beloved member and minister of London Grove Monthly and Particular Meeting, aged nearly ninety-two years.

For more than two years he had been declining mental as well as physical vigor, during which mellowing influence of Divine grace was remarkably manifested. The submission and entire resignation with which he endured the suffering and weariness tending a protracted illness, and his desire to patient, and to be prepared for his release, were instructive. No murmuring or repining escaped him but he felt grateful for favors vouchsafed, saying have many blessings "to be thankful for, if we take the right view of our existence here," and evinced fear of death, but a willingness to go or stay in accordance with the Divine will, often remarking, "I nothing in my way;" quietly trusting in the mercy of his Saviour who did not leave him in the time of age, nor forsake him when his strength failed.

He continued until near his close to show his interest in, and concern for the cause of Truth, and welfare of our religious Society, for the promotion of which he had long and valiantly labored, and at times seemed comforted in looking towards the future in confidence that "there would be a succession of standard bearers raised up to take the places of those who are being removed;" stating also that his belief continued firm in the doctrines and testimonies of Gospel as held and maintained by our early Friends and in the necessity of faithfulness in the support of our Christian testimonies.

He was endowed with clear and excellent judgment both in natural and spiritual things, and was a remarkable example of firmness and faithfulness in bearing an open testimony for the Truth. His sterling integrity of character and fairness of mind combined with a kind and loving disposition established him in general confidence and esteem of the community which his long life was mostly spent, and endeared him to many hearts in no common degree.

The sweetness and innocence of his spirit, and quietness and peace felt in his chamber gave evidence that he had been prepared to enter that heavenly home where the weary are at rest.

—, at his late residence, in Guilford Co., N. C., First Month 1st, 1892, DANIEL BARKER, in the eighth year of his age. This dear Friend was a long member of the Society of Friends, and greatly attached to its principles as held by its founders and primitive Friends. Obedient to the admonition of the Holy Spirit in his heart from childhood, early came to recognize the voice of the Master in assemblies of the people, and for nearly half a century he was actively engaged in the ministry of Gospel. In the course of his religious services he labored and labored within the limits of every year meeting on this continent. In the latter part of life owing to bodily infirmity, he had not often privilege of attending meeting, except that held in own house, but the welfare of the Society and of friends continued to be the constant subject of thoughts; and even in the last year of his life, when his mental powers were failing, he often imagined was in meeting, and was frequently engaged in prayer and exhortation.

—, at the same place as the above, on the 5th First Month, 1892, SARAH BARKER, daughter of Daniel and Lydia Barker, both deceased, in the fifty-seventh year of her age. Being always of a frail constitution and of a weak and diffident disposition, never became prominent in the affairs of the Society in which she was deeply interested. Although her ministry was never recorded by the Monthly Meeting she was frequently acceptably engaged in public religious service and in family visiting. Every way she led a conscientious faithful Christian life and adorned the doctrine of our Saviour.

—, at the residence of her son Samuel C. Wister, M. D., Third Month 9th, 1892, HANNAH P. WISTER, wife of Caleb Webster, in the sixty-ninth year of her age. A member of Media Particular Meeting, Chester, Pa., Monthly Meeting. She was of a meek and quiet spirit, a devoted wife and parent; and reverently believed that the "perfect quiet" which prayerfully sought was granted her, and that language of Holy Scripture is applicable, "These they which came out of great tribulation, and they washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple."

—, on the 10th of Fifth Month, 1892, RACHEL FUNSTON, a member of Muncy Monthly Meeting, the seventy-ninth year of her age.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 268.

The danger of neglecting the gracious visitations of our Heavenly Father, and postponing the work which he would have us to do, is strikingly shown in the following incident, which we find in the Herald of Truth.

It was the still hour of a sultry July midnight, when I was aroused from my slumbers, to attend a new patient just brought into the hospital. Hastily throwing on my clothes, soon I was by her side. Lying before me, with a countenance of ghastly paleness, was a young girl, not over twenty years of age, whose face retained evidences of great former beauty, though sadly marred by her life of sin. Her sunken eyes, pinched features, and blue lips told me that she was in the deadly embraces of the fell destroyer that had rendered desolate so many homes, both here and across the waters. Cholera had seized her amidst her rioting, and ready the fatal stage of collapse was near at hand. As I reached her, she seized me with her clammy fingers, and drawing me closer in order that I might hear more readily her feeble words, she whispered in my ear, and her breath was like an icy coldness on my cheek, "Oh! doctor, don't let me die 'till I get to be a good girl!" This was the burden of her cry, and the great sorrowful eyes that were turned beseechingly towards me, revealed even more of agony than the pitiful words bespoke. They were few, but full of meaning. For a moment, what a picture came before me—that life, and the vision of those needs now done, that she would have forever forgotten from her sight. Quietly I assured her that at everything that was possible should be done for her, and to my surprise she soon began to rally under the treatment with amazing rapidity. In a few short hours the disease seemed to be succumbing to treatment, and the next morning she was apparently out of danger. I sought an opportunity to converse with her, and found, as I had supposed, that she had wandered far from the innocence of her childhood, and from the happiness of her younger hours. Her life was a dark picture on which we will not dwell—a picture of love betrayed, of withered hopes and sad despair. She told me all, and scalding tears trickled down her hollow cheeks and great drops of agony were on her brow. I spoke to her of the erring one to whom the gentle Saviour said, in long ages past,

"Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more!" of the door of mercy that was open wide before her, and of the fountain in which our most foully-stained robes can be made white and pure. I urged her to attend to the subject of her soul's salvation now, and not put off the all-important subject. God was speaking very loudly to her just now; she had been near the threshold of another world, and it might be her last warning to prepare for a solemn change. "Ah! doctor," she replied, "I shall be a very different woman after this, and when I am perfectly well then I will attend to what you say." The sky was fair, and I saw no indications of an approaching storm in her case, and yet I told her that danger might be near, and that life was uncertain even in our sunniest hours of health, and no one could call the morrow his own. I begged her to think on what I said without tarrying, and to throw herself in her Saviour's outstretched arms at once. But she shook her head, and said those fatal words, "at another time." I left her, not dreaming of those few short hours that separated her from eternity. * * Another midnight came; again I was wrapped in my slumbers; and again the summons came to go to the dying. Mechanically I walked along the long halls, my footsteps reverberating in the stillness of the hour, not knowing what case might have taken on unfavorable symptoms, until I arrived at the bedside of my patient, and found, to my grief and surprise, that she had not many minutes more to live. Her disease has suddenly assumed most rapidly fatal features, and she was fast being hurried to the grave. Her eyes were fixed, her face was of a marble coldness, and death was imprinted on every feature. I spoke to her, but from her palsied tongue there came no answer. Her ears were closed forever to human sounds. Motionless and without a moan she lay, until the gray dawn began to peep through the windows, when her spirit began to burst its clay shackles and started on its unknown journey alone. And thus she died, refusing to the last, it is to be feared, to drink of the cup of sparkling, living waters that was held to her very lips, of which, when a mortal once drinks, he shall never thirst again. And as I stood beside that corpse, cold and beautiful in death, how rang through my ears those words so often uttered to a physician, especially in a hospital, and wrung from the depths of the spirit's agony, "Doctor, don't let me die! Oh! anything but that! How can I die and face my angry God? Where can I hide my multitude of sins? Oh! give me life that I may live anew and have washed out my former deeds!" And this same procrastination, this unwillingness to accept Jesus, however lovingly offered, how constantly do we see it in our every walk of life! "At a more convenient season," and the king's excuse is re-echoed daily by a thousand lips. Oh! that mortals would but be wise! Oh! the solemn impressions that are continually being made upon us by what we see and hear in our daily life, would not fade and vanish from our recollections as did the mists before the rising sun on that morning as I sadly returned to my quiet chamber. J. B. B.

How much more cheering is the case of Henri Heine, who had been one of the most skeptical and cynical writers of his age. He passed through terrible torments caused by disease of the spinal marrow.

One day, as a friend was calling upon him, he said:

"If I could only walk on crutches, do you know where I would go?"

"No."

"Straight to the church."

"You jest."

"No, no; straight to the church."

His illness continued, and this is the narrative of another of his friends, who visited him some years later, in 1849:

"I found Heine in Paris, but in what a state! He was lying on a mattress spread upon the floor. The poor man was almost wholly blind, and his body was a prey to the most poignant anguish; his withered arms stretched lifeless by his side; his disease incurable. His back, burned in spots by the surgeons, was one sore. He seemed the very picture of pain; and yet his fair and noble visage had a strange aspect of peace and submission. He talked of his sufferings as if they were those of another. For a time I could not understand so much peace and resignation in the midst of such an experience, especially in the case of one who had declared himself an atheist.

"He was not long in giving me the explanation. A smile upon his lips, he described to me yet further the dreadful sufferings he endured, and after having said that he should never get better, he proceeded in that steady and powerful voice which still remained despite his utter weakness:

"My friend, believe me, it is Henri Heine who tells you so, after having reflected on it for years, and after having reconsidered and maturely weighed what has been written upon this subject by men of all sorts, believe me, I have reached the conclusion that there is a God who judges our conduct, that the soul is immortal, and that after this life there is another, when the good are rewarded and the wicked punished. Yes, this is what Henri Heine says, who has so often denied the Holy Ghost. If ever you have doubted these grand truths, fling from you these doubts, and learn by my example that nothing but simple faith in God's mercy can sustain, without repining, atrocious pains. Without that faith, convinced as I am that my bodily state is desperate, I should long since have put an end to my days."

"Profoundly moved, I seized his hand. He went on:

"There are fools, who, having passed their lives in skepticism and mistake, and denied God in their words and acts, have not courage to own that they were wholly deceived; as for me, I feel compelled to declare that it is a cursed falsehood which long made me blind. Only at present I see clearly; and any man who knows me must confess that it is not because my faculties have become weak, for never was my mind more clear and strong than it is this moment."

John G. Paton tells us in his life, of an infidel lecturer, residing in his district, who became very ill. He says:—"His wife called me in to visit him. I found him possessed of a circulating library of infidel books, by which he sought to pervert unwary minds.

Though he had talked and lectured much against the Gospel, he did not at all really understand its message. He had read the Bible, but only to find food for ridicule. Now supposed to be dying, he confessed that his mind was full of terror as to the future. After several visits and frequent conversations and prayers, he became genuinely and deeply interested, drank in God's message of salvation, and cried aloud with many tears for pardon and peace. He bitterly lamented the evil he had done, and called in all the infidel literature that he had in circulation, with the purpose of destroying it. He began to speak solemnly to any of his old companions that came to see him, telling them what he had found in the Lord Jesus. At his request I bought and brought to him a Bible, which he received with great joy, saying, 'This is the book for me now;' and adding, 'Since you were here last, I gathered together all my infidel books, my wife locked the door, till she and my daughter tore them to pieces, and I struck the light that reduced the pile to ashes.'

As long as he lived this man was unwearied and unflinching in testifying, to all that crossed his path, how much Jesus Christ had been to his heart and soul; and he died in possession of a full and blessed hope."

The Epitaph of Abercius.

BY PROFESSOR BENJAMIN P. WARFIELD.

All readers of the lives of the Oriental saints have made themselves merry over the legends of one Abercius, said to have been the successor of Papias in the see of Hierapolis in Phrygia, who is described as working many miracles and doing many strange things, and when he came to die, as having himself buried in a tomb of his own building, which bore a long metrical epitaph of his own composing. This epitaph is found in the extravagant life of Abercius by Symeon Metaphrastes, but has been looked upon as but one of the "old wives' fables" which constitute the rest of the story. Curiously enough, however, Ramsay has stumbled on the veritable tomb, still bearing a part of the veritable epitaph, at the less important Phrygian town of Hieropolis, thus at once correcting the traditional site of Abercius's bishopric, and establishing the genuineness of the writing. * * In the despised and neglected epitaph of the old saint we now see one of the most valuable remains of Christian antiquity,—an abiding and unsophisticated witness of the type of Christianity that was current in the lifetime of a man who was born scarcely later than say A. D. 120. In full accord of what Pliny had told us of the neighboring Christians of Bithynia, a few years earlier, we see this aged bishop ascribing Divine attributes to Christ. We see him cherishing certain sacred books which easily identify themselves with our Bible—which certainly included the Psalms and Revelation, the Epistles of Paul and the Gospel of John. We see him in full and cordial communication with his Christian fellows from Rome to Euphrates, and with them all celebrating two mysteries of the faith—baptism and the Lord's Supper. * * *

All this and more is apparent, however, from the epitaph itself, which we adjoin in a rough version:

A townsman of this town elect, in life
I had this made, that, in due season, here
I may a body's place possess. My name's
Abercius;—pupil of the Shepherd pure
Who feeds his flocks on mountain and in plain,— Great eyes who hath which every way do see.
And he it was who taught me faithful books;
And sent me royal Rome to see, and her
The queen, of golden robe and sandals gold.
And people there I saw who wore bright seals.
And Syria's ground I saw and all her towns,
And Nisibis, across Euphrates' flood.
And everywhere I found companions true.
With steadfast step I followed Paul;—'twas Faith
That led the way, and spread for food
At every place the Fish, exceeding great
And clean, drawn from the fountain. Virginal
Was she that took it. This unto her friends
She gave to eat away, with generous wine,
And with the mingled cup she added bread.
While still here present, I, Abercius, have These things commanded to be written here,—
My threescore years and twelve completing fast:
Let him who reads them over me rejoice,—
Each one whose heart accordant is with mine.
Lay no one else within this tomb but me,—
Or pay to Rome two thousand golden coins
And to this kindly town a thousand more.

The modern reader may be puzzled by the exceedingly figurative and mystical language which the writer affected in common with most Christians of his time. His description of the Church as a "Queen, golden-robed and golden-shod," depends on the Greek translation of Psalm 45: 10. * * *

The "folk who wore a golden seal" are the children of the Queen, the Church, signed and sealed in baptism. Jesus is represented by two symbols of the Shepherd with all-seeing eyes, and the Fish, the life-giving food of the Church. The latter of these, however strange to us, was, perhaps, the favorite one with the Church, from the second to the fourth centuries, the badge of persecuted Christianity, which she began to lose her affection for so soon as she acquired the rulership. The letters of the Greek word "Fish," were the initials of the words, "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour," and thus the word on the sculptured figure served as a convenient anagrammatic confession. * * *

Curiously enough, the closest illustrative parallel to Abercius's language is found in another epitaph, erected to a young man named Pectorius, at the other end of the world,—in far-away Gaul. This famous "Autun inscription" has been much discussed, and is usually assigned to the fourth or fifth century; I cannot believe it to belong later, however, than the third century, and it may come even from the end of the second. Observe how closely it accords with Abercius's in color and imagery:

"Oh, holy child of the supernal Fish,
Keep now thy heart in reverence, since a fount
Immortal, mortals yet among, thou hast
From waters heavenly sweet obtained. Thy soul,
Oh, dear one, quicken with the waves etern,
That give enriching wisdom, and receive
The honeyed food of th' Saviour of the saints,— Yea, hold in hand and, hung'ring, eat the Fish;—
The Fish, to whom I cry, 'Come nigh to me,
My Master,—Saviour; be my guide,
Oh, thou who art the light of all the dead.
Aschandius, father, dear unto my soul,
And mother dear, and all of mine, oh, gaze
Upon the Fish, and of Pectorius think.'"

1825.—Report of Committee of 1824. "Having at different times had the same under serious deliberate consideration are sensible that there is much cause for deep and painful concern on this account; and from various circumstances presented to our view, it would seem desirable that some advance of our religious testimony should be made, but the way not clearly opening with that unanimity and solid weight which is needful on such an important occasion—We therefore propose that faithful Friends keep close to their exercises and that it be recommended to the respective Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, to continue further patient persevering labor with all such as give occasion for uneasiness on this account; and whenever meetings are clearly satisfied that this matter ought to claim the renewed and further proceeding of the Yearly Meeting, that they be encouraged to spread the same before it." No statistics given on the Minutes.

1833.—A Committee to visit the Subordinate Meetings state in their Report to the Yearly Meeting: "Some inquiry was made into the present state of our testimony against the unnecessary use of ardent Spirits. Although appears that the practice of using it as a drink is almost abandoned by Friends, yet in many of the meetings there remain some members who still give it to their workmen on particular occasions. Even this custom, however, is declining, and the opinion was expressed in a few meetings that in another season for labor would still lessen. Friends were encouraged to persuade those who give it, to make the attempt to gather their crops and perform other labor without it, and to clear their hands effectually of the baneful consequences arising from the use of this pernicious article. It appeared to the Committee that a more strict investigation into this matter, involving as it does the dearest interests of families and of Society, would be attended with beneficial results, both to individuals and to the advancement of this testimony."

A Minute was adopted by the Yearly Meeting reciting the substance of the above extracts and desiring that subordinate meetings may be "stirred up to make a thorough and strict examination into the state of their members in relation thereto, and incite them to clear their hands effectually of the baneful consequences which result from the use of this pernicious article and transmit to this meeting next year, an account of the state of this concern among their members."

1834.—"By the Reports the Meeting is informed that the use and traffic in Spirituous Liquors among our members, has received the close attention of the Quarterly and nearly all the Monthly Meetings; the statements now read exhibit affecting evidence that this pernicious article is either used as a drink by some members, or given by them to their workmen, in most of the meetings, and that a few still trade in it. Under a painful feeling of the state of this testimony amongst us, although great advances have been made, the meeting was brought into renewed concern, that the subject may claim the very serious consideration of every one who trades in or uses ardent Spirits as a drink, and furnishes or allows it to their workmen—that they may be awakened to a lively feeling of the ngers to which they are subjecting themselves and families—and Quarterly and Monthly Meetings are desired to continue their zealous and affectionate labor to convince such of their error and to persuade them to abandon the practice entirely and to forward specific reports of the progress of the concern and of their labors next year."

1835.—"Reports were forwarded by all the Quarterly Meetings of the investigation which they have made into the present condition of the members respecting their trading in Spirituous Liquors and the use of it as a common drink. Although a few continue in the trade, and the use of this article has much diminished, the statements now read, while they show that the labors of Friends have been attended with beneficial effects, also prove that much remains to be done in order to banish it from amongst us, and in some parts still using it, particularly on hay time and harvest, and also giving it to their workmen on other occasions. In renewing and considering the destructive effect of drinking ardent Spirits, and the tendency it has to waste our testimony to the purity and self-denial which the Truth leads into, thereby lessening our usefulness as a religious Society in those parts where it is partaken of, this meeting feels a strong solicitude that every member who is standing in opposition to this righteous testimony, may be brought seriously to reflect on the wound he may inflict on our religious profession, and the dangers to which he subjects himself and family—and that Friends may be animated to labor fervently with all such to issue them from the habit; also that the discipline in relation to the traffic may be faithfully administered and supported. The Subordinate Meetings are directed to forward explicit accounts of the state of this concern next year and the results of their labor."

1836.—"Accounts of the labors of Friends in all the Quarterly Meetings to prevail with their members who use or give ardent Spirits as a drink to abandon the habit, were produced and read. Their care and exertions to extirpate this evil from our borders, is satisfactory and the results in many instances successful. Encouraged with a belief, that if Friends persevere in affectionately yet firmly remonstrating with those amongst them who continue the dangerous and destructive practice, it will eventually be removed, Quarterly and Monthly Meetings are desired to renew their efforts in this righteous cause, and report next year their labors and the number of our members who may still use or give ardent Spirits as a drink."

1837.—"Agreeably to the direction of this meeting the Reports of the Quarterly Meeting, inform that the subordinate branches have investigated the state of their members respecting the use of ardent Spirits as a drink, and extended such labors as they were enabled, to persuade those who are in the practice, or to give it to their workmen, to abstain from it. Although there remains a number who stand opposed to the concern and advice of this meeting, yet some advance has been effected since last report. We would encourage Friends to persevere in renewed earnest entreaty with such, that the Society may be entirely cleared of this stain upon its profession and the dreadful consequences which are connected with the evil averted. They are desired to forward explicit statements of the number who use or give this pernicious article as drink; so that the condition of the Yearly Meeting in this respect may be fully known."

1838.—"In a few meetings the use * * appears to be relinquished, and in nearly all those meetings where some of the members still continue this evil habit, a small reduction of the number has taken place since last report."

In the year 1839 for the first time, the number of members taking ardent Spirits is given on the Yearly Meeting's Minutes. It is sixty-nine; and up to and including the year 1880, the number of delinquents is annually recorded. The fluctuation is sometimes great—but a diminution prevails until the number reported in 1880 is thirty-six.

1852.—"This Meeting recommends to Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, earnest, patient labor with those who use it or give it as a drink; and it is our desire that this concern may not rest too lightly upon the minds of Friends who are clear of the practice; but Monthly Meetings, under a sense of the danger to which the use of strong drink subjects those individuals, and awaits the young people, may in an earnest, affectionate spirit, continue to remonstrate with them against it, etc."

1881.—It is stated that much labor had been extended with encouraging results; and the meeting recommends to our members to avoid all intoxicating drinks; the number of exceptions to be reported. Neither this nor the next year is the number recorded on the Yearly Meeting Minutes. In 1883 and every year since, the numbers are given; they fluctuate considerably and end in a slight diminution.

1892.—A Committee was appointed to take the whole subject of the use of intoxicating drinks into consideration, and report to our next Yearly Meeting their judgment in reference to it.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Visit to Budd's Lake.

The State of New Jersey, although one of the smaller States of our Union contains within its limits a considerable variety of geological formations. The general direction in which they lie is from N. E. to S. W., or about parallel to the trend of the Alleghany Mountains.

There is a considerable body of alluvial soil bordering the ocean, Delaware Bay and some of its streams. Leaving this out of view, the southern half of the State, that lying south of a line running from near Trenton to Raritan River near its mouth, is composed of a succession of layers of sands, clays, gravels and marls, which show the action of water in sorting the materials derived from the destruction of older rocks, and in spreading them over the surface.

There is little doubt that the ocean in remote ages reached to the high lands on which Philadelphia is situated, and that the gneiss rocks which we see in the quarries around that city formed its gradually descending bed for many miles. On this bed were deposited the materials which were gradually removed from the highlands of Pennsylvania and Upper New Jersey until the water was crowded back to its present limits. In other words, the whole of Southern New Jersey is made land. There are many proofs that this has been the course of events. It is only by the long continued motion of water, that we can account for the rounded forms of the stones in the gravels which abound in this part of the State. Nothing else could have separated the sands and clays from the general debris of the decayed rocks, and laid them in layers where man could appropriate them as he pleased. The fossils which are found in many parts are those belonging to animals that must have lived in salt water. In the neighborhood of Moorestown, much of the country is underlaid with a thick bed of black clay or hardened mud. Some years ago, having occasion to sink a well into this, I examined the pile of earth which had been dug out, and found some interesting marine shell-fish. One kind was a small, black spiral shell, like a snail shell, brightly polished. Another was still more curious, and had been the former home of a species of cuttle fish, closely related to the modern Paper Nautilus, but instead of having the coiled form which the Nautilus assumes, it was straightened out like a cane or staff, and the different joints were fastened together by a very curious suture or interlacing of projecting points.

A number of wells for water have been bored at Atlantic City, on the sea shore, and at other places, the deepest of which is about 1,400 feet. The borings passed through various layers of sand, clay, gravel and marl, some of which could be identified with similar strata appearing at the surface many miles inland, showing a gradual slope of about 25 feet to the mile as the ocean was approached.

Every one who has watched the effects of a heavy shower of rain, must have noticed that the streams of water everywhere set in motion by the falling torrents are heavily laden with sand and clay. As these rivulets descend to more level ground, their velocity diminishes, and the heavier particles which they were carrying along are dropped. The gravel stones and fragments of rock first, then the sand, and lastly the clay which had been held in suspension as mud, settles down. This sorting of running water may be seen in hilly countries on every roadside. Indeed in many neighborhoods the masons depend on the roadside sand thus deposited for the basis of the mortar used in building their walls.

On the geological map of New Jersey, the portions of the State occupied by different formations are indicated by the colors used. On referring to the map, we find a broad band of reddish brown reaching from the Delaware River above Trenton to the New York line, indicating that that part of the State is occupied with Red Sandstone, or shale, a formation often called Triassic. In going from Philadelphia to New York by the Reading Railroad (via Bound Brook), the traveller passes through this in almost the whole of his New Jersey journey. It was a pleasant day in the latter part of the Sixth Month, when I made the trip. The country was beautiful. The crops of grain seemed nearly ready to be gathered. The foliage of the trees was bright and fresh, and the country was gently rolling. The soil was distinctly red, and in freshly worked fields of corn, contrasted prettily with the green of the corn plants. This Triassic formation covers an area in New Jersey of more than 1,500 square miles, or about one-fifth of the whole State. It extends northeastward to Massachusetts and southwestward to South Carolina.

Its strata are nearly horizontal, and its origin has been an interesting question to geologists. Professor Rogers attributes it to a broad stream or water channel extending from the higher grounds in North Carolina, and descending in its course across Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York to its outlet in the ocean. And this stream, in the course of time, brought down and deposited in its channel or trough the materials in the position in which we now find them. That it was originally a mass of mud and gravel is shown not only by the manner in which it is deposited in layers, but by the tracks made upon it when in a soft state, by animals walking over it.

The thickness of the strata is enormous, and has been estimated to be not less than five miles. The accumulation of so much material must have produced great pressure on the portion of the earth's surface beneath it, and may have been one of the causes of the protrusion of dykes of melted rock, which are uncommonly abundant in the Red Sandstone districts. The Pennsylvania Railroad passes over one of these dykes of Trap, as they are called, a little north of Monmouth Junction. On the Reading road we just skirted the western edge of the same dyke.

Bergen Hill and the Palisade Mountains along the Hudson River are part of an outcrop of Trap forty-eight miles in length, which varies in breadth from half a mile to a mile and a half. The rock is hard, deep blue in color, and as it breaks equally well in all directions under the hammer, it makes a desirable paving stone. It is chiefly made up of Feldspar and Hornblende. This range is very precipitous on its eastern face. The western slope is gentle, corresponding with the dip of the sandstone stratas from between which it has flowed out.

There are two long and prominent ranges of Trap rock, known in Essex County as the First and Second mountains. They are each more than forty miles in length, although the First Mountain has several depressions in it, through which the waters of the valley to the east of it find an outlet. The Triassic regions of New Jersey have many other Trap dykes of smaller size than those now described. There is room for an almost unlimited play of the imagination, in picturing to oneself the grandeur of those operations of nature, which could lift the immense layers of the sandstone and pour up between them, from unknown depths, the melted rock, which hardened into beds of Trap forty miles or more in length, and two miles in width, the average width of the Second Mountain.

The hills of Trap are generally elevated from three hundred to five hundred feet above the surrounding country. It is thought that originally the Trap and Sandstone rose to the same height, but that the Trap, owing to its hardness, resisted the wearing effects of those agencies which swept away the softer sandstone, and thus was left protruding.

Our route to Budd's Lake was along the Reading Railroad line to Bound Brook, through the Red Sandstone or Trias. At that point we took a car on the New Jersey Central for High Bridge, nearly returning on our tracks, but bearing more to the north. The course from Trenton to Bound Brook is nearly northeast; but from Bound Brook to High Bridge is but a few degrees north of west. At High Bridge we are in the Highland Ranges, an older geological formation, composed of gneiss, granite and limestone. This formation is sometimes called the Azoic, which means "without life," because no fossils or other traces of organized existence are found in its rocks. This mountain region of New Jersey is not a continuous ridge or chain, but a mass of separate ridges, often with valleys or passes between them, and lying nearly parallel to each other, and extending in a northeasterly direction, so that it has been comparatively easy to penetrate the section with railroads. At High Bridge we changed to a branch railroad, which ran a little east of north, nearly at right angles to our former course. The red soil over which we had been passing since entering New Jersey now disappeared, and in place of it we found the well-known clayey colored earth which marks other gneissic and granitic regions. During a part of this ride, we passed through a limestone valley, and noticed several quarries with their accompanying kilns. We left the cars at Flanders' station, and after a ride of two or three miles were landed at Hatakawanna Inn, a boarding house on the rising ground overlooking Budd's Lake, a circular or oval sheet of water, surrounded by mountains. It is on the western side of Schooley's Mountain, and its surface is 933 feet above the ocean. It receives the drainage of the surrounding land, and from its southern end issue the head waters of the south branch of the Raritan River. The inn at which we stopped is so called from the Indian name of the lake—Hatakawanna. J. W.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"It is not of him that willeth, neither of him that runneth, but of God who sheweth mercy."

Of what use can it be to dictate one to another and say we have been converted and know that we have been saved. "God's Ministers have converted us to Him." This seems like saying, "we have piped unto you and ye have not danced—we have mourned unto you and ye have not lamented." There is no authority in the Bible for believing a lie. It is for those who are truly converted to God "Light after Light to attain," through obedience to the Law of the Lord. God taught Paul himself after he had taken human wisdom all out of him and he was left to inquire, "Who art thou Lord?" The answer was, "I am Jesus whom thou persecuted"—"It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks." The pricks of conscience which reveals a God within man, which may be called the smitings of conscience, which is above and beyond all that is of human conviction. It was by revelation Divine, not imagination, that the Blessed Jesus taught Paul that it was not Paul's will—but the will of God that should be his sanctification. "That not of him who willeth, neither of him that runneth, but of God who sheweth mercy"—that all his zeal for the Church was worse than nothing. Self was blind without anointed vision—"poor, blind, naked, and miserable" was Paul with all his teaching at the feet of Gamaliel. The Law of the Lord is a perfect Law—it sets free from the Law of sin and death. It enables to run without being weary, to walk and not be faint. Though zealots may compass sea and land to make one proselyte, what better is he for being made, if God has not had the making of him. Away with mere theories—without saving belief,—Belief is of God who worketh in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure. The beloved Son of God said, "No man cometh to the Father except by me," and no man cometh unto me except the Father who sent me draw him." Then, as it is by the drawing cords of the Father's love that all mankind can approach to the Blessed Jesus, why make it such hard work to crucify the "deeds of the flesh, with the affections and lusts?" Cease from our own willings and runnings—have faith in God, "who giveth all things richly to enjoy."

"Hunger then no more shall seize thee,
Neither thirst thy soul dismay.
But Jesus to the fount will lead thee
And wipe all thy tears away."

PROVIDENCE, Seventh Month, 1892.

HIS COMING,

They tell me a solemn story,
But it is not sad to me,
For in its sweet unfolding
My Saviour's love I see.

They say that at any moment
The Lord of life may come
To lift me from the cloudland
Into the light of home.

They say I may have no warning,
I may not even hear
The rustle of his garments,
As He softly draweth near.

Suddenly in a moment,
Upon my ear may fall
The summons, Loved of our Master,
"Answer the Master's call."

Perhaps He will come in the noontide
Of some bright, sunny day,
When, with dear ones all around me,
My life seems bright and gay.

Pleasant must be the pathway,
Easy the shining road,
Up from the dimmer sunlight
Into the light of God.

Perhaps He will come in the stillness
Of the mild and quiet night,
When the earth is calmly sleeping,
'Neath the moonbeam's silvery light;

When the stars are softly shining
O'er the slumbering land and sea,
Perhaps in holy stillness
The Master will come for me.

RAIN AFTER DROUGHT,

JOHN W. CHADWICK.

A few short hours ago, and all the land
Lay, as in fever, faint and parched with drought;
And so had lain, while many a weary day
Dragged the long horror of its minutes out.

The juiceless fruits fell from the dusty trees;
The farmer doubted if the Lord was good,
As, sad, he watched the labor of his hands,
Made useless by the Day-god's fiery mood.

The hot streets sickened in the burning glare;
The roadsides lost the glory of their green;
No second growth sprang up to glad the eye,
Where once the mower with his scythe had been.

A few short hours ago! And now, behold,
Freshness and beauty gleam on every side;
The earth has drunk its fill, and all about
The amber pools are stretching far and wide.

A million drops are flashing in the sun;
The springs far down the upper wonder know;
The farmer laughs, and little cares how fast
Through his torn hat the cooling streamlets flow.

And all the fields and pastures seem to say,
With joyous smile that I shall ne'er forget,
And all the flowers and trees in chorus join,
"We knew 'twould come; He never failed us yet."

God of my life, as God of all beside,
This lovely wonder, which thy hand hath wrought,
Quickens in thought the mercies manifold
Which thy great love into my soul hath brought.

For I have lain, full oft, as hot and dry
As ever earth in summer's fiercest hour;
And the long days, slow creeping over me,
Brought me no tokens of thy gracious power.

Then, at thy word, down fell thy spirit rain;
I felt its coolness all my being through;
Made fresh and clean and joyous every whit,
I heard the whisper, "I make all things new."

But mine, alas! was not the holy faith
The parched earth felt through all her thirsty hours
I was in fear that never more again
Should I be quickened by the heavenly powers.

So shall it be no more; but, though I lie
For many days as one thou dost forget,
Recalling this glad hour, my heart shall say,
"I know 'twill come; He never failed me yet."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Twenty-fifth of Fifth Month. This afternoon we had an appointed meeting at a district school house, with a few Friends and others. I think it must have been an awakening visitation to some of the lukewarm idlers who were warned of their deplorable situation; the sincere-hearted encouraged.

At this meeting, for the first time, my dear companion, Lewis Taber, appeared in the line of the ministry, in a few broken and appropriate words well suited to the purpose. The meeting closed under a solemn sense of Divine favor.

Twenty-sixth. Attended Hamburg Monthly Meeting, which was small; in which I had much labor; the Lord being "mouth and wisdom; tongue and utterance."

Twenty-seventh. Attended Collins' Monthly Meeting, which was a watering season; the shout of a king being heard in the camp."

Twenty-ninth. Thomas Hewson and his wife were fixing to take us over the Lake into Canada, being a pleasant morning both within and without, in which my soul has been made thankful.

At Buffalo, we called at Joseph Hoag's; and having a desire to see Samuel Walker, a member, we walked to his shop; he then walked over to J. H's, who was away with a line boat, which he runs this season. His wife prepared an early dinner, whilst we were pleasantly engaged in conversation, under which my mind became exercised for the welfare and growth of the Truth in this place, wherein is all manner of evil; and proposing to get down in the quiet of night upon the Lord, I felt a word to arise in my heart; and after delivering what seemed to be given in this way, my mind was clothed with the spirit of supplication, and [I] bowed under with such openings and living faith in God, that He did hear, and would grant that which was his will, that "my soul did magnify the Lord, and my spirit rejoiced in God my Saviour."

Twenty-ninth. Leaving Buffalo, we passed over a moderately elevated country lying between the city and the River Niagara, which was a very grand and most commanding prospect of the city with its splendid suburbs; its stately and magnificent country seats, with a view of the lake and mouth of its beautiful river which drains Erie with her great sister connections, and glides along with brisk and rapid current, until reaching the great cataract and world's wonder. We crossed over at Black Rock into Canada, and then travelled down the river eighteen miles to Port Niagara, where we had the prospect most tremendous of a great river, rolling, tumbling, pitching, and foaming with such violence for two or three miles, as to make the dark color of the water white as milk; at length it reaches the precipice, from whence, with such a great weight falling perpendicular from the height of 168 feet, affords a prospect very astonishing and very grand; which brings to mind that "they who go down into ships and do business in great waters behold the wonders of the Lord."

Thirtieth. Being First-day, we had a meeting at Pelham, Niagara district, in which the Lord gave me strength to relieve my mind to a large auditory.

Dined at Calvin Kelsey's, where many Friends collected in the afternoon, and dropping into silence before leaving, the hand of my God favored us with a consoling season.

Went two miles, and lodged at William Kelsey's.

Thirty-first. Dropped into silence this morning; had a sweet parting.

Returned back eleven miles to the Falls, and again beheld the wonderful works of nature's God; and crossed over below the Falls, where the river must be very deep, and there at Niagara, took our passage in a railroad car for Lockport thirty-two miles, which we reached in one hour and a half, which is a place of much business, both by railroads and canals.

From here we walked about a mile, and put up at Jesse P. Haines's.

First of Sixth Month, we had a meeting at 2 o'clock in Lockport. There took the canal boat for Hartland, and lodged at Zeno Hoag's; from there ten miles to Somerset Meeting, two miles from Lake Ontario, which was a low time, and a poor meeting; but my Good Master gave me strength to labor amongst them, which has left me with a peaceful mind.

Had a meeting at Hartland, in which I hope the cause of Truth did not suffer, but ability was given to bear deep truths in the demonstration of the spirit; a humbling time it was; blessed be the great name of the Lord!

Lodged at Allen Mason's, near Millville. 4th of Sixth Month. This place lies about forty miles north of the Alleghany mountains; is a beautiful country; very productive to grain and grass; having great privileges of water communication for importation and exportation, of country produce; and here lies a smooth ridge about twenty or thirty feet high, running east and west one hundred miles in length, ten or twelve miles wide. On the south side, there is no descent on the north, a low valley. This range runs from Rochester across the Niagara River into Canada; and about three miles north of this mountain, there is an elevated ridge which runs parallel with the other, the whole distance, that it is said that there is scarcely the like for a road in the world. It is solidly a smooth sand ridge, and the conjecture is, that it was a sand bar three miles from the shore which the mountain ridge formed, when the two great lakes—Ontario and Erie—formed but one lake, before that the St. Lawrence at the Thousand Islands, cutting its way down, drained off ten or twelve miles in width of the State of Michigan, also of New York, and a large portion of Canada.

Fifth of Sixth Month, and 7th of the week, had a meeting at Elba, which was a suffering time. The seed of God is "pressed down as a cart loaded with sheaves," and I suffered with it, my spirit, covered with mourning, which reminded me of the mourning of Hadad Rimmon in the valley of Megiddon, when King Josiah was slain; being a lively figure and representation of Christ whom they "crucified afresh and put to an open shame."

The meeting sat about an hour and a half, after which I had a short, but lively testimony.

Returned on our way back to Shelby, lodged at Oden Fields'; his wife's mother a member amongst the Baptists; aged near ninety years; and at the family reading of the Scriptures in the morning, First-day, 6th of Sixth Month, the Master's presence was like a refreshing "brook by the way;" remembering that when the Apostle met the Brethren how "that he thanked God, and took courage;" which in some degree was my situation. Attended Shelby Meeting which was large, but a great departure is creeping in, from primitive plainness; pride and arrogance with a mingling with others; like Ephraim of old, hath "mixed himself with the people;" "Ephraim is a cake not turned;" "strangers have devoured his strength, and he knoweth it not." So this people knoweth not their own condition.

Returned to Hartland, twenty-nine miles from Elba. Lodged at William Brownall's; the kind Friend that took us to the last two meetings and back. Seventh-day of Sixth Month, I had a very solemn season with his family, in which I was opened in many things by the ability given from above, and left with a peaceful mind unto the Lord.

Walked near two miles to Reynold's Basin, where we took the packet boat half-past 8 o'clock on the canal, eight miles to Lockport. There we took the railroad car thirty-two miles to Lewistown, on the Niagara River, where we took the steamboat seven or eight miles to the mouth where it empties into Lake Ontario; from there thirty-six miles across to Toronto in Upper Canada. Landed half-past six in the evening; and sitting in an upper chamber viewing the people pass the street, my mind was seriously affected; beholding the great pride of fallen man; his martial and warlike appearance; the imagination of the thought of his heart only, and continually evil; corrupting and indulging in all the abominations of Mystery Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots.

When shall wickedness cease? When shall the son of perdition be put off and destroyed?

Oh! when shall righteousness run down as a mighty stream, and the earth [be] "filled with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the seas."

O Thou Holy One! Wilt thou hasten that day; put an end to sin; blot out transgressions; and bring in everlasting righteousness, that in every nation incense may be offered unto thy name and a pure offering.

Eighth of Sixth Month. Lodged last night at Anderson Smith's, a genteel colored man; and although yet young, having a young family, now owns a good house and lot in this city, keeps a temperance boarding house and a grocery store in York Street, number 14, the whole establishment paid for.

A little past 9 o'clock we took the stage for New Market, twenty-eight miles.

Here new trials again await me, for a fresh proof of my faith and allegiance to the King Immortal, Eternal.

The day was extremely warm; the coach crowded with twelve persons and much baggage; their conversation, volatile, light, and chaffy, which was a grief to my feelings.

Ninth of Sixth Month. A pleasant morning. My mind calm and composed; confiding in the hope of Israel's God for support.

Was carried five miles to White Church Meeting, where the oil and the wine was not withheld from a mixed multitude who was brought near in the love of the Gospel. The meeting closed in solemn supplication, which had, through the power of the Lord's spirit, such a reaching effect, that the people seemed reluctantly to leave the house, it being Preparative Meeting day.

Tenth of Sixth Month, and 5th of the week, attended Yonge Street Meeting; general notice was given, and a large meeting it was, in which the Lord strengthened and opened my understanding to relieve my mind amongst the people.

It was a season of great tenderness. The meeting closed in solemn supplication in the Lord's spirit. After which there was a little business to attend to by the members; it being their Preparative Meeting day.

Natural History, Science, etc.

The Depopulation of France. The statistics of France show that in 1890 the number of deaths exceeded that of births by about 38,000. The number of children in France averaged about 150 to 100 families, while in other countries of Europe the number was 300 or over. One cause of this has doubtless been the weakening of the popular strength by insufficient food and exceptional labor; and this must largely be attributed to the military burdens imposed on the people.

An Encounter with Lions. We were riding along through a small open glade covered with high grass, Lee a few yards ahead of me, when I suddenly saw him turn round, cry out something to me, and point with his finger ahead. I looked, and saw galloping along through and over the grass, about forty yards off, a yellow animal about as big as a small bullock. It flashed across me that it was a lion, the last thing in the world that I was thinking of. I was going to dismount and take aim, but Lee called out in succession five or six times, "Look, look!" at the same time pointing with his finger in different directions in front. I saw to my astonishment, and rather to my dismay, that the glade appeared to be alive with lions. There they were trooping and trotting along ahead of us like a lot of enormous dogs, great yellow objects, offering such a sight as I had never dreamed of. Lee turned to me and said, "What will you do?" I said, "I suppose we must go after them," thinking all the time that I was making a very foolish answer. This I am the more convinced of now, for Lee told me afterwards that many old hunters in South Africa, will turn away from such a troop of lions as we had before us. We moved on after them a short distance to where the bush was more open, the lions trotting along ahead of us in the most composed and leisurely fashion, very different from the galloping off of a surprised and startled antelope. Lee now dismounted and fired at a lion about fifty yards off. I saw the brute fall forward on its head, twist round and round, and stagger into a patch of high grass slightly to the left of where I was riding. I did not venture to dismount with such a lot of these brutes all around ahead of me, not feeling at all sure that I should be able to remount quickly enough and gallop away after shooting. My horse untrained to the gun, would not allow me to fire from its back, and would probably have thrown me off had I done so. I stuck close to Lee, determined to leave the shooting to him unless things became critical, as his aim was true. I counted seven lions; Lee says there were more. I saw, and cried out to Lee, pointing him to a great big fellow with a heavy black mane trotting along slightly ahead of the rest. He was just crossing a small spruit one hundred yards ahead, and as he climbed the opposite bank offered his hind quarters as a fair target. Lee fired at him, at which he quickened his pace and disappeared in front. We approached the spruit, and, almost literally under my nose, I saw three lions tumble up out of it, climb the opposite side and disappear."—Men, Mines and Animals in South Africa.

Perfumery.—Grasse, near the Mediterranean, in Southern France, has over seventy factories, where roses, orange flowers, mint, heliotrope and other raw materials are taken and manufactured into perfumery.

The blossoms are gathered in the morning as soon as the dew is off the leaves, and troops of children, basket in hand, may then be seen gathering the sweet roses and violets. When the baskets are filled they are carried to the factory so that they may be used before wilting. The factory or laboratory is sometimes near a large field of flowers so as to retain at home the greatest possible profit. In the rich mellow ground the flower petals are large and fragrant, and the essential oil abundant, while the labor is pleasant and refining to the young. An average of about five cents per pound is paid for rose leaves, twenty-five cents for orange, and forty or fifty cents per pound for violets. Flower buyers pass through the neighboring districts every day and purchase flowers for the factory from smaller growers. It is said that every man who owns a strip of land in the vicinity raises flowers for the factories, the buyers purchasing at daily market rates.

Over 5,000 persons are engaged in this industry, either in the field or factory, in the vicinity of Grasse; and children have been trained for generations to follow the occupation of their fathers. It requires skill, but no specially secret process, to distil the oil or to prepare the common pomade for perfumery; but manufacturers have different methods, some of which they are unwilling to reveal. One manner of making simple pomade is by pulling the leaves from the flowers and placing them between greased panes of glass; more leaves and more greased panes are placed above until there is quite a pile. The glasses are then pressed in a tight chest or box, and remain there until the fragrance is absorbed by the grease, fresh flowers then being substituted. As necessity requires these changes are made, continuing from two to six months according to the required strength. The pomade is treated with alcohol or other chemicals, and becomes a dainty perfume. Other processes are by distillation or by pressure. Some stills are large enough to receive a ton or more of leaves at one time.

In preparing the otto or attar of roses, it is asserted by good authority that it takes 4,000 pounds of leaves to produce one pound of the precious oil. The leaves of roses are sometimes placed in water, and when exposed to the heat of the oven for a time oil floats upon the surface. The oil is gathered by means of lint or wool, and placed in bottles which are hermetically sealed. It needs much practice to insure success in this work. Steaming the petals, it is alleged, makes a finer oil.—Annals of Perennials.

Russian Famine Relief.—The British Friend of Seventh Month, contains the following letter from Prince Dolgoroukoff, of Russia, to Herbert Jones:

Dear Sir:—Allow me to thank you for the pamphlets of the Peace Society that you sent me. I have not as yet had time to read them, but intend doing so on reaching home, where I shall have more leisure.

I shall be very pleased to receive any other publications of the same class, being very much interested in the subject.

I have passed a fortnight in the Tatar villages, and can confidently say that your aid has been of the greatest use. I do not understand how the Tatars managed to live before your help arrived.

Your assistance came at the precise moment, when it was most needed; when there was nothing more to sell, bread extremely dear and no work to be had. Soon I hope to be able to send an account of the distribution, stating number of people assisted, amount of grant per head, etc.

9,000 poods of corn, at the cost of Roubles	10,440
10,440 roubles of your fund, say . . .	10,440
Transport and other expenses . . .	392
Balance in hand	1,168

Total 12,000

This last sum, namely 1168 roubles, I have employed in constructing four large bakeries, an other expenses for baking and selling at low price bread from four truckloads of American flour. I decided on selling cheap bread as the best way of rendering assistance to the poor at the present time. The need on one hand is not so sharp as early in the spring; on the other hand by keeping down the market prices, I helped many thousand to get their food cheaper. The results have been far more successful than I even hoped for, as we succeeded in lowering the market prices of bread and grain 25 copecks in the pood (about a farthing per lb.) in all the district. 450 roubles and 40 poods of American flour I remitted to Madam Dourouff, from whom you received a letter in Samara.

At all our bakeries I must add, the poorest peasants receive bread free of charge. All the money received from the sale of cheap bread is again invested in flour, so that I hope to keep the business up for a month more. When this work is finished I shall give a full account of what has been done.

I am deeply grateful to the kind donors of funds for our sanitary work. Without their timely assistance we should hardly have been able to support our invalids and given so much help. In Patrooka and its environs we opened nine free kitchens for the sick and convalescent.

Now the epidemic is nearly at an end, and our sanitary work will be finished within a fortnight.

Then I shall send you an account of our work and of all that has been done through your contribution.

The Government has granted a large sum of money for sanitary needs, and has sent several medical parties to our province.

Yours very truly,

PRINCE DOLGOROUKOFF,
Per Secretary.

Risking Life for Humanity's Sake.—"It was at Fredericksburg, after a bloody battle. Hundred of Union soldiers lay wounded on the field; a night and all next day the space was swept by artillery from both armies, and no one could venture to the sufferers' relief. At that time, too, there were up agonizing cries for water, but there was no response save the roar of the guns. At length, however, one brave fellow behind the ramparts, southern soldier, felt that he could endure those piteous cries no longer. His compassion rose superior to his love of life.

"General," said Richard Kirkland to his commander, "I can't stand this; those poor souls out there have been praying for water all night and all day, and it is more than I can bear; I ask permission to carry them water."

"The general assured him that it would be instant death for him to appear on the battle field but he begged so earnestly that the officer, admiring his noble devotion to humanity, could not refuse his request. Provided with a supply of water the brave soldier stepped over the wall and went on his Christ-like errand. From both sides wounding eyes looked on as he knelt by the nearest sufferer, and gently raising his head, held the cooling cup to his parched lips. At once the Union soldiers understood what the soldier in gray was doing for their own wounded comrades and not shot was fired. For an hour and a half he continued his work, giving drink to the thirsty, straightening cramped and mangled limbs, pillowing men's heads on their knapsacks and spreading blankets and army coats over them as tenderly as a mother would cover her child, and all the while, until this angelic ministry was finished, the fusillade of death was hushed."

Self-sacrifice.—One of the victims who perished in the recent disaster at Oil City was seventy-three years of age, and yet by his efforts to save his imperiled neighbors is said to have rescued twenty persons from death by drowning or burning. Finding a woman and five children in a house surrounded by water, he assisted to place them in a boat, which was then too heavily loaded to take the rescuer also. He told those in charge of the boat to go on and he would wait for their return. Before they returned the house caught fire and he was so badly burned that he died in a few hours. He said: "I have no regrets. I can go to my maker knowing that I died for my fellow-man."

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 6, 1892.

Some of the members of North Carolina early Meeting have been brought under much exercise by the efforts of others to commit the early Meeting to the indorsement of methods so-called "Evangelistic work," which involve the employment of persons who are paid for their services; and also to introduce certain changes into the Discipline, such as the abolition of birthright membership, the appointment of elders for a term of four years, etc.

The opposition to these innovations is especially strong in the limits of Rich Square Monthly Meeting, to which our beloved friends, Henry Outland and Benjamin P. Brown belong. At a meeting held Seventh Month 16th, reports were presented by Committees appointed to consider both of these subjects, which were adopted by the Monthly Meeting, and directed to be forwarded to the Yearly Meeting. We have received copies of these reports which are subjoined:—

Rich Square Monthly Meeting of Friends, to be held Seventh Month, 16th, 1892.

We, the Committee continued from last Monthly Meeting, to produce to this, a document setting forth the reason for the non-payment of our proportional part of the tax directed for Evangelistic work by our Yearly Meeting held Eighth Month 30th and 1891, are fully united in submitting the following.

Our Meeting has been brought under deep religious exercise in this matter, with desires that we may in no way wound the Spirit of our God, by saying anything that may hinder his work upon the earth. And in viewing the general manner and spirit of this so-called Evangelistic work, we do not fully believe that it is inconsistent with the teachings of our Saviour, and with the Spirit and practice of the Apostles, and of our worthy predecessors in the Truth. "Freely ye have received, freely give," said our Saviour to the twelve. Matt. 10-8.

"I have coveted no man's silver or gold or apparel. Yea, ye yourselves know that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me.

I have shewed you all things how that so labor ye ought to support the weak; and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus * * * 'It is more blessed to give than to receive' said Paul to the elders of the church at Ephesus." Elders in that place no doubt included ministers. Acts 20-33, 1-35.

He also said, "What is my reward then? Verily that when I preach the Gospel I may make the Gospel of Christ without charge; that I abuse not my power in the Gospel." 1 Cor. 9-18.

Robert Barclay shows that this abuse crept in with the apostasy. 10 Prop. page 315-319 inclusive.

In conclusion we are convinced that this system is but a step into a hireling ministry; therefore we are conscientiously opposed to paying any part of said tax.

On behalf of Committee,
BENJAMIN P. BROWN.
ELIZABETH PEELE.

To Rich Square Monthly Meeting of Friends to be held Seventh Month, 16th, 1892.

DEAR FRIENDS:—We, the Committee appointed to consider the subject of the revision of our Discipline, have examined the proposed changes, and conferred together, and are united in the belief that our Yearly Meeting had better make no changes at present, which we submit to the Meeting.

On behalf of the Committee,
WILLIAM C. OUTLAND,
MARY A. BROWN.

We think our brethren in North Carolina, who are contending for the principles of Truth as renewedly proclaimed to the world by our early Friends, have strong claims on the sympathy of fellow believers elsewhere. Some of us may be so situated in the midst of those whose views of Society concerns are similar to our own, that from "our loopholes of retreat," we can look out upon the conflicts of others, and scarcely feel the stir. But it is right for such to heed the Apostle's advice,—"Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them which suffer adversity, as being yourselves also in the body." We none of us know what trials await us; or what conflicts we may have to endure in maintaining our open allegiance to the doctrines and testimonies of Friends. It is very possible that a day may come in which we shall feel the need of the sympathy and help of the honest-hearted elsewhere.

We hope our dear Friends in North Carolina, will be strengthened by the Lord to stand faithful to his cause—and that He will preserve them from all the snares that may be laid for their feet, and give them both the courage and the wisdom that are needed to go forward in his work and service.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows that the interest and non-interest bearing debt decreased $838,855.50 during the Seventh Month. Cash in the Treasury, $783,978,271.81.

The total collections of internal revenue for the fiscal year which ended Sixth Month 30th last, amounted to $153,857,543, an increase of $7,832,128 on the total for the preceding fiscal year.

The Senate has confirmed the nomination of George Shiras, Jr., to be Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court.

In the United States Senate the Anti-Option bill has been postponed until the next session of Congress. The World's Fair appropriation is still discussed in the House.

During the Fifty second Congress, there were 9,835 bills and joint resolutions introduced in the House and 3604 in the Senate. The House passed approximately 475 bills, of which 284 were passed by the Senate and sent to the President. The Senate passed 691 bills, only 113 of which passed the House and reached the President. Two of this latter number the President vetoed, the bill to send the famous McGarran claim to the Court of Claims for adjudication and a bill to amend the Court of Appeals act. Three bills the President permitted to become laws without his signature.

Seven hundred and fifty thousand acres of land in San Benito and Monterey counties, California, which, according to the act of Congress of Ninth Month, 29th, 1890, reverts to the Government by reason of the failure of the Southern Pacific Railroad to complete a certain portion of its line within a specified time, have been thrown open to settlement under the Homestead act.

The Record of this city says:—"The officers of the United States Internal Revenue Department, who have concluded their labors and settled their accounts for the year ending June 30th, 1892, are justly proud of the fact that the beer tax for 1891-2 has been the largest in the history of Philadelphia, $1,817,661.15, which represents the levy on 908,330,500 glasses of foaming lager, have flowed into their coffers, after which the beer, at the rate of 850 glasses for every man, woman and child in this city, has flowed gently and pleasantly down the throats of the thirsty denizens of the borough of William Penn. Or, again, on the supposition that beer is only imbibed by men over 21 years of age, the awful amount of 3,633 glasses must be allotted to each man. Members of the W. C. T. U. may be pardoned for shuddering at these figures, which, by the way, can only be arrived at after an exceedingly abstruse mathematical calculation. The beer tax last year was $1,711,272.10, or $105,389.05 less than this year's tax, which increase shows conclusively that lager is becoming more and more popular."

The Supreme Court of Michigan has given a decision declaring unconstitutional the two acts of the last Legislature reapportioning the Representative and the Senatorial districts in the State. The Governor of the State has called an extra session of the Legislature to redistrict the State, which was gerrymandered by the Republicans in 1884, and by the Democrats in 1891.

The fast, protected cruiser Columbia, designed primarily as a commerce destroyer, and in this respect claimed to be the most formidable war vessel in the world, was successfully launched on the 26th ult., at Cramp's shipyard, in this city.

The Inman Line steamship City of Paris arrived at New York, on the 27th ult., having made the fastest voyage from Liverpool on record. Her time was five days, 15 hours and 53 minutes. Two of her single day runs, 519 and 520 miles, on Seventh Month, 24th and 26th respectively, also broke the record. The steamer's average for the voyage was 20.48 knots per hour, of 20.43 knots.

The Board of Aldermen of Brooklyn gave away without consideration—to the city—very valuable franchises for the construction of a street car line. The Board of Aldermen not only made such a grant in the face of an offer to pay for it, but, when the ordinance was vetoed, passed it over the veto by a vote of 16 to 2. The Courts are now asked to declare the grant illegal and void, or, if the franchise is held to be legal, to compel the Aldermen who granted it to pay to the city as individuals the amount offered for the franchise by the Union Street Railroad Company.

During the twenty-four hours ending at noon of the 30th ult., there were 261 deaths reported in New York city. This is the heaviest death rate for a single day for twenty years. The number of deaths for the week just passed is 1434, the heaviest since Seventh Month 16th, 1876, when 1581 deaths were reported for the week ending that day.

There were 840 deaths in the city of Washington during Seventh Month, the largest number for any one month in the history of the city.

The number of deaths in this city last week was reported to be 786—392 males and 394 females—being 240 more than the previous week, and 359 more than the corresponding week last year. Of the entire number 338 were children under one year of age: 188 died of cholera infantum; 52 of marasmus; 52 of consumption; 39 of old age; 35 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 34 of diseases of the heart; 31 of convulsions; 28 of sunstroke; 28 of inanition; 23 of apoplexy; 21 of pneumonia; 15 of dysentery; 16 of debility; 16 of Bright's disease; 16 of paralysis; 15 of inflammation of the brain, and 14 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 116½ a 116¾; currency 6's, 106½ a 117½.

COTTON was quiet but unchanged. Middling uplands were officially quoted at 7½c. per pound.

FLOUR.—Winter bran, in bulk, at $15.75 a $16.50 and spring bran, in bulk, spot, $14.50 a $15.25.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.25 a $2.50; do., extras, $2.75 a $3.10; No. 2 winter family, $3.25 a $3.65; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $4.00 a $4.30; Western winter, clear, $3.75 a $4.10; do. do., straight, $4.00 a $4.30; winter patent, $4.40 a $4.75; Minnesota, clear, $3.35 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.85 a $4.35; do., patent, $4.50 a $4.75; do. favorite brands, higher. Rye flour was in limited request and weak at $3.75 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 80½ a 81½ cts.

No. 2 mixed corn, 54½ a 55 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 38 a 39 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Good, 5 a 5½ cts.; medium, 4½ a 4¾ cts.; common, 4 a 4½ cts.; culls, 3½ a 3¾ cts.; Fat cows, 2½ a 3¾ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5¾ cts.; good, 5 a 5½ cts.; medium, 4½ a 4¾ cts.; common, 3¾ a 4½ cts.; culls, 2 a 3½ cts.; Lambs, 4 a 7 cts.

HOGS were ½c. higher. Chicago, 8½ cts.; other Western, 8¼ a 8½ cts.

FOREIGN.—W. E. Gladstone's majority will be forty in the next Parliament. The Conservatives will not dispute it, but will at once retire from office. The Queen, after a consultation with the Duke of Devonshire, has consented to ask Gladstone to form a cabinet. It is said that the Irish party, including the nine Par-nelites, will support Gladstone heartily; as will the Labor party, which at first seemed disposed to be troublesome.

The Althrop Library, which in consequence of the difficulties in his position, due to reduced rentals of his agricultural estates, Lord Spencer some time since announced would be sold at public auction unless a purchaser for the whole could be found, has been sold entire to an Englishman. The library, which is the most splendid private collection of books in the world, comprises 50,000 volumes, almost every one of which has some uncommon value of its own. It contains the rarest editions and most historic bindings and most priceless examples of illustration and early printing on vellum, all of which are unusually well preserved. Its collection of Bibles is unique.

The purchaser of the library will, it is stated, provide a suitable building for its reception, to which the general public will have free access.

Returns of the triennial elections held in the provinces of France on First-day the 31st ultimo, for members of the Councils General have been received from 1,234 districts. They show the election of 977 Republicans and 217 Conservatives, while supplementary ballots are required in ninety districts.

At a Ministerial Council held in Madrid, on the 29th ult., it was decided to sanction the project for the farming out of the Cuban customs revenue, tenders for which will be received until Eleventh Month 1st next. The contract will go into effect First Month 1st, 1893. Security must be deposited on tenders for $15,000,000 to the amount of $3,750,000 cash or its equivalent in stocks. Tenders from limited liability companies will be rejected and none will be accepted unless made by a mercantile or banking house. The Imparcial, of Madrid, considers that the carrying out of this plan involves grave responsibility as tending either to the improvement of the government of Cuba, or as leading to the loss of the island, according to whether the contract falls into the hands of North Americans or Spaniards.

A dispatch from Vienna dated Seventh Month 27th, says: Eighty houses and an ancient Capuchin monastery, with a valuable library, have been destroyed by fire at Male, a town in the Tyrol, 50 miles from Trent. Nine hundred persons are rendered homeless by the fire. The loss amounts to $25,000.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Times says that the official cholera reports for Seventh Month 23rd, 24th and 26th, for all Russia, show 2,583 new cases and 1,465 deaths.

A dispatch from Simla, dated Seventh Month 28th, says: The Hazaras, who are in revolt against the Ameer of Afghanistan, have been joined by the Great Bezdand tribe. The combined forces have blocked the road between Herat and Cabul. The commander of the Ameer's forces now operating against the rebels has returned to Cabul, leaving the camp standing. A body of 500 British troops, with two guns, has been ordered to occupy the Gomal Pass, in the mountains between Afghanistan and India.

DIED, at his residence, near Toughkenamon, Chester County, Pa., on the 16th of Fifth Month, 1892, JOSEPH P. CHAMBERS, in the seventy-second year of his age, a member of New Garden Monthly Meeting, Pa. This dear friend had been in declining health for some time, with a chronic nervous affection, which at times seemed almost more than he could bear, and at such times, he was frequently heard to say, if it be consistent with my Heavenly Father's will, I should like to be released, and at others, he hoped that his patience might hold out to the end. A few weeks before the close came, he was stricken down with paralysis, which destroyed his power of speech—and rendered him almost helpless—but his mental faculties remained unimpaired. Late in the afternoon of the 16th he passed peacefully away, leaving to his family the comforting evidence he had found that rest prepared for the righteous.

—, at Muncy, Seventh Month, 8th, 1892, MARY W. HAINES, wife of Jesse Haines, and daughter of the late Henry Eerooy, aged sixty-five years. Her cheerful, affectionate disposition, and active sympathies extended beyond her family circle, leading her to assist and comfort her neighbors in times of affliction, and to promote their happiness in seasons of prosperity. She was especially fond of children, quick to help them in their needs, or to provide them with innocent pleasures. During her short illness, she was sustained by a living faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. Sensible of the change that was rapidly approaching, she was kept in a calm and humble trust, looking forward with a lively hope to a blessed immortality.

—, at his residence, on the 11th of Seventh Month 1892, near Plainfield, Hendricks County, Ind., JAMES N. SYMONS, in the seventy-ninth year of his age. He was a consistent member and Elder of Plainfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, and was firmly attached to the ancient doctrines and practices of the Society. He bore a short but severe illness with Christian patience and fortitude, often speaking of the change that seemed to be near approaching.

—, on the 1st of Sixth Month, 1892, at the residence of her son-in-law, T. Clarkson Eldridge, in West Chester, Pa., MARY A. BONSALE, widow of the late Jesse T. Bonsale, in the seventy-first year of her age. She was for over twenty-eight years confined to her bed, most of the time with spinal trouble, being a very patient sufferer, giving evidence to those who were favored to meet with her that the supporting power of Divine grace was with her. To a friend she remarked, "I have much to be thankful for; the presence of the Master has been with me most of the time." She was much interested in hearing of meetings, and though not able to attend, maintained a lively interest in society, entering into sympathy with those who were concerned to uphold its ancient doctrines and ways, and would give counsel or encouragement as she felt was needful. Some time before her death, she seemed to be sensible that her end was near, making preparation for that event, and said, "if I am only as ready as my things, all will be well." She bid a loving farewell to her family the night before her death, and on the morning of the next day they found her spirit had taken its departure in the night, we reverently believe to be ever with the Lord, whom she loved on earth, who has taken her to himself to that place where none can say "I am sick," and the people who dwell therein are forgiven their iniquities.

An old number of Chamber's Edinburgh Journal contains the following narrative:—

"Upon the 4th of April, 1823, I was pacing usual the Glasgow Exchange rooms, when my eyes got a glimpse of some Jamaica Gazettes on a side table and remembering that piracies were then prevalent in the West Indies, I glanced over them till I met with a case which arrested my attention. One Henrique Buche had been recently tried in Jamaica for piracy, on the testimony of a person who swore that he was a mariner in the ship Malcom, belonging to Messrs Strang & Co., merchants in Leith; that they sailed from that harbor on the 9th of November, 1819, and upon the 30th of December following, whilst in the Bay of Honduras, they were boarded by pirates; that these plundered the ship of a great variety of stores, of which the witness specified the weights, quantities and qualities with such a minuteness which seemed me quite incredible, as he confessedly took no notes of them at the time; was a mere fore-castle in; was stationed at the helm all the time; and that several years had elapsed since the alleged piracy took place. The witness added that the pirates departed with their booty, and he did not see any of them till three years afterwards, when he pointed out to a police officer the prisoner at the bar as one of them, whilst he was entering the harbor of Kingston in a boat.

"The only other witness was the police officer who had seized poor Buche on the allegation of the sailor, so that the latter was the sole witness to the crime charged—a charge which Henrique Buche indignantly denied on his trial, stating that, if an extension of time had been allowed him, he could have proved that he was of respectable connections in the Island of Guadeloupe, where he possessed a competency which placed him far beyond the necessity of following the infamous and perilous profession of a pirate; adding that it would be seen from Lloyd's lists that no ship of the name stated by the witness had left Leith at the time alleged.

"In reply the prosecutor stated that the prisoner had already been allowed time sufficient to produce evidence of his alleged status in Guadeloupe, and that, as to the inference drawn from the silence of Lloyd's lists, it was well known to the jury that these lists, though correct as to the part of London, were far from being so as to distant ports like Leith. He therefore demanded a verdict of guilty; and my surprise was inexpressible when I found that twelve men had consigned a helpless stranger to an ignominious death, on the single unsupported and incredible testimony of an obscure seaman and common informer, of whom no one seemed to know anything, and who probably had been stimulated by the hope of blood money, then freely given for such disclosures.

"Animated by these feelings and fears, I instantly stepped to the side bar of the exchange rooms, and soon discovered incontestable evidence that poor Buche had been convicted, condemned, and I feared, hanged, on the testimony of a perjured man. The Leith shipping lists proved that no vessel of the name stated by the Crown witness had left Leith on the day in question, or during the whole of that month. I also found from the directory that there was no company of ship owners, or of any profession, of the firm sworn to in Leith or Edinburgh during the whole of the year in question. These facts I instantly communicated to Lord Bathurst, as minister for the colonies, with a view to the rescue of Buche; if, happily, his execution had not taken place, or, at all events, for the seizure and punishment of his perjured enemy. And great was my delight when, in the course of post, his lordship's chief secretary wrote me thus:—

"It will, I am persuaded, be satisfactory to you to be informed that the Governor of Jamaica, in officially reporting the trial and conviction of these unfortunate persons, has stated the circumstances which induced him to grant a respite to Henrique Buche, in order that the necessary inquiries might be made to establish the truth of the particulars which he stated in his defence. I have therefore to acquaint you that your letter will be transmitted to the Governor."

Buche was liberated, and leaving Jamaica, returned to his native island. The moral, the writer draws from the circumstance is,—“That each of us should be prompt to help the other, and all of us to help humanity at large.”

Dr. A. J. Gordon tells a touching incident, in which the effort to relieve the distress of a fellow being, was made instrumental in promoting the person's own happiness—The narrative is as follows:—

"My name is Anthony Hunt. I am a drover, and I live miles and miles away upon the western prairie. There wasn't a home within sight when we moved there, my wife and I; and now we haven't many neighbors, though those we have are good ones.

"One day, about ten years ago, I went away from home to sell some fifty head of cattle—as fine creatures as I ever saw. I was to buy groceries and dry goods before I came back, and above all, a doll for our youngest Dolly; she had never had a store doll of her own, only the rag babies her mother had made for her. Dolly could talk of nothing else, and went down to the very gate to call after me to 'buy a big one.' Nobody but a parent can understand how my mind was on that toy, and how, when the cattle were sold, the first thing I hurried off to buy was Dolly's doll. I found a large one, with eyes that would open and shut when you pulled a wire, and had it wrapped up in paper and tucked it under my arm, while I had the parcels of calico and delaine and tea and sugar put up.

"It might have been more prudent to stay till morning, but I felt anxious to get back, and eager to hear Dolly's prattle about her doll. I mounted a steady-going old horse of mine, and pretty well loaded. Night set in before I was a mile from town, and settled down, dark as pitch, while I was in the wildest bit of road I know of. I could have felt my way through, I remembered it so well; although, when the storm that had been brewing broke out and pelted the rain in torrents, I was almost five miles, or maybe six, from home. I rode on as fast as I could.

"But all of a sudden I heard a little cry, like a child's voice. I stopped short and listened. I heard it again. I called and it answered me. I couldn't see a thing. All was dark as pitch. I got down and felt about in the grass—called again, and again I was answered. Then I began to wonder. I'm not timid; but I was known to be a drover, and to have money about me. It might be a trap to catch me unawares, and rob and murder me. I am not superstitious—not very; but how could a real child be out on the prairie in such a night, at such an hour? It might be more than human. The bit of a coward that hides itself in most men showed itself to me then, and I was half inclined to run away.

"But once more I heard that cry; and said I, 'If any man's child is hereabouts, Anthony Hunt is not the man to let it die.' I searched again. At last I bethought me of a hollow under the bill, and groped that way. Sure enough, I found a little dripping thing that moaned and sobbed as I took it in my arms. I called my horse, and the beast came to me; and I mounted, and tucked the little soaked thing under my coat, as well as I could, promising to take it home to mammy. It seemed tired to death, and pretty soon cried itself to sleep against my bosom.

"It had slept there for over an hour when I saw my own windows. There were lights in them, and I supposed my wife had lit them for my sake; but when I got into the door-yard, I saw something was the matter, and stood still with dread fear of heart five minutes before I could lift the latch. At last I did it and saw the room full of neighbors, and my wife amidst them weeping. When she saw me she hid her face.

"'O, don't tell him,' she said; 'it will kill him!'

"'What is it, neighbors?' I cried.

"And one said, 'Nothing, now, I hope; what's that in your arms?'

"A poor lost child," says I, 'I found it on the road. Take it, will you? I've turned faint;' and I lifted the sleeping thing, and saw the face of my own child, my little Dolly!

"It was my darling, and none other, that I had picked up on that drenched road. My little child had wandered out to meet 'daddy' and doll, while her mother was at work; and Dolly they were lamenting as one dead. I thanked heaven on my knees before them all.

"It is not much of a story; but I think of it often in the night, and wonder how I could bear to live now, if I had not stopped when I heard the cry for help upon the road—the little baby cry, hardly louder than a squirrel's chirp."

It is much of a story. It is a story in which the great moral of the world's redemption lies wrapped up. It is a story which translates for us the deepest meaning of the cross. In exposing his life to danger this man restored the life that was dearest to him. "He that loseth his life shall find it."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

An Extract From the Letters and Memorandums of John Barclay.

"DEAR FELLOW TRAVELLER:—In a little of that love which has been extended to me by Him, who "showeth mercy unto thousands," I send thee these few lines; sincerely desiring that the eye of thy soul may be so effectually opened and enlightened by the healing hand of the great physician, Christ Jesus, as to enable thee clearly to see things that belong unto thy peace, before they are hidden from thee.

Dear fellow traveller, dost thou not at times, when thy mind is in some degree disengaged from the round of sin and folly, or when thy natural flow of health and spirits is somewhat broken, dost thou not feel within thee convictions of thy wickedness, and condemnation for the same? Hast thou not intelligibly heard at such intervals a language which whispers "all is not right?" Hast thou not felt that the end of these things, in which thy gratification is placed, can never be peace,—can never be anything short of death, eternal death to the soul that persists in them? Be assured then, that although these are thy secret feelings, thou art still the object of infinite condescension and loving kindness. He who desires not the death of the evil-doer, but the death of the evil, is still near thee, notwithstanding all thy rebellion; following thee in thy ways which are those of sin, and running after thee as a shepherd, in search of his strayed sheep. These pleadings of Divine grace, these convictions of the Spirit of Christ, which in spite of thy concealment of them are pursuing thee, and in spite of thy endeavors to appease them by partial reformations are galling thy soul,—even these are the evidences of his gracious hand upon thee, who wounds only to heal, and whose very judgments are in mercy. O! that thou mayst come to see with undoubted clearness the truth of this; that thou mayst be encouraged and emboldened unreservedly to follow that, which is, as I fully believe, shown thee to be right and acceptable in the sight of the great Judge of all the earth. Assuredly, He has shown thee, what He is requiring at thy hands, and what his righteous controversy is with; He requires of thee nothing but that which has separated thee from Him, the only source and centre of true joy,—nothing but that which, if not forsaken, will embitter thy present life, and plunge thee into utter darkness after it. Dear fellow traveller, it may be that thou hast been, within these few years, my companion in the walk of wickedness; that I have taken thee by the arm, have helped thee forward in the broad and beaten track which leadeth downwards; that we have taken delight to set at defiance the commandments of a great Creator; and have yielded ourselves, and all that we possess, the ready instruments of Satan:—Our time, our talents, our means, our youth, our health, our peace, have been freely sacrificed at the altar of our soul's enemy. Be then entreated by one who has himself trod in this path; who has hurried forward with impetuosity down this fatal current, who, borne by the rushing waters to the very brink of a tremendous precipice, has been there snatched from the very month of destruction. There is indeed, dear young person, neither help, nor hope, nor happiness, even in this state of existence, but in the favor of Him, in whose favor is life; in implicit obedience to the Divine will as far as it is made known to us. It is to no purpose that we reckon ourselves, or are reckoned by others as belonging to this sect or the other church, to this class or the other division of professing Christians—if we fall short of those unalterable marks and evidences of true Christianity, by which we shall be known and distinguished in that great day, when every gloss will be removed, and every ceremony and shadow shall fade before the eternal sun of truth. We read that at that awful crisis, there shall be but two names or classes, by which the inhabitants of the whole world shall be known; the sheep and the goats,—the good and the bad. Well, dear fellow traveller, it remains for each of us, if we have any desire that this transient state of being may terminate in an unfading inheritance, to lay aside all the false and foolish reasonings, all the vain suggestions, the cheating insinuations of an unwearied adversary; and with sincerity and simplicity of soul, to take up the holy resolution to seek and to serve the Lord our God, during the few remaining days that may be allotted us; and to this end, that we be found daily inquiring in his temple, the temple of our own hearts, and waiting upon him there, where his kingdom must come and his will be done; that so we may feel his presence and power, to direct and to guide us into the saving knowledge of himself. That thou and I, as well as all our poor brethren upon the face of the earth, may be of that gloriously happy number, who shall inherit an eternity of joy unspeakable in the kingdom of heaven, is the earnest desire of one who feels himself thy soul's true friend."

A. M. W.

If a soothsayer were to come unto thee, and proclaim that thou art verily to die on the third day, what preparations wouldst thou not make, O man, for thy departure! How thou wouldst ask the forgiveness of those injured by thee; how thou wouldst pay thy debts, and how thou wouldst refuse all frivolity, and say, "Alas, tomorrow I must die!" But, though no soothsayer come to thee, thou knowest nevertheless, that die thou must. What matters it whether it be three days hence, or three decades? Ay, the very morrow may find thee dead; for death sends no couriers ahead of his track. Shalt thou, then, not be ever ready to depart hence, as if a soothsayer hath foretold thee thine hour?

Who think they suffer, should have our compassion as much as those who do suffer. Imaginary sorrow is still sorrow.

Tenth of Sixth Month. This afternoon I had a meeting in a district school house, which proved, through Divine goodness, to be a favored season; but my mind not relieved; bearing its burden.

Lodged at John Rorick's. In the morning had an open time with his family; and he and his wife walking with us about half a mile to John Webb's; a family looking towards Friends. At this house we had, through the Master's goodness, a remarkable season.

This afternoon, had a meeting at Tecumseh a poor, low company; their minds outward, and not in the Lord. I labored amongst them the peace of my mind; blessed be the Lord.

Went to William Phillips's, where I was taken much unwell, with a chill and headache. *

* * * but was carried to Clayton Webb's, Uxbridge, about thirty-five miles, twelve miles through a wilderness woods. Clayton left at White Church, and there we were taken to Cornelius Austen to Ezekiel James's, where was more unwell; had to take my bed. Cornelius's wife stayed more than a week and nursed me.

* * * * *

I was kindly attended by Friends coming from a distance; one Eleazer Lewis came nearly twenty miles, bringing some articles or sending them, which I wanted.

Against the 20th of Sixth Month I was sorely better, but yet much amiss; being First-day, went to meeting; was again much tried with such a people, like unto the "heath in the desert; knowing not when good cometh." I labored amongst them, and the Lord gave me a peaceful mind.

Returned home to my lodgings.

* * * * *

Twenty-first of Sixth Month. Went to William Wright's, a valuable Friend; their accommodations good, and their hearts open. Here I found a resting place; had notice given for a meeting next day, which was pretty largely attended, although near an hour gathering after which it came to some settlement; and the Lord gave me strength and wisdom to labor amongst them to my comfort and peace.

From here, William Wright, and Margaret his wife, carried us to Toronto, twenty-two miles; landed six in the evening, much fatigued; some slight chills and fever.

In this last journey, there was one thing worthy of note; about twelve miles of the way planked with pine boards about fourteen or fifteen feet long and three inches thick, close laid on sawed sleepers, which makes a very fine road at Toronto City; the population about twelve or thirteen thousand inhabitants.

We took the steamboat at 9 o'clock in the evening, bound for Rochester, but to touch Port Hope, where we landed at daylight.

We are now on the lake, being the 24th of the month; touched at Coburg and then crossed over Ontario Lake, and struck in the mouth of the Genesee River, and went up about five or six miles, and left the boat, and took a car through miles to the city of Rochester, from Toronto about a hundred and thirty miles. My life thus far hath been marvellously preserved by an invisible Hand; blessed be the Lord!

Twenty-fourth, lodged in the city at Sil Cornell's.

Twenty-fifth. Still unwell. * *

is day occurred Rochester Monthly Meeting, which I attended; also their Select Preparative 4 o'clock.

Labored in both; the Lord in his condescension; goodness gave strength and ability, so that relieved my mind amongst them. We were brought near unto each other in gospel love and tenderness.

Returned to Silas Cornell's; enjoying sweet peace of mind, and lodged; blessed be the Lord! Twenty-sixth. This morning, at eight o'clock, a little after, we took a canal line boat for Macedon, twenty-two miles. Landed at ten in the evening. Put up at a hotel.

Twenty-seventh. Being First-day morning, we went a few rods to a Friend's house, where we were kindly received, by the name of John Willetts. Had a precious family visit in his house. He then took us in his carriage three miles to Farmington Meeting, which was large and silent. I enjoyed a composed and tranquil mind, in which I was strengthened; being sensible of the Lord's good spirit in my heart.

Dined at Joseph C. Hathaway's; hard by, as the Post-Office, where I received two letters; which was grateful; being the first account which I had had since leaving, near two months ago; one from J. E., and the other from my son.

Called this afternoon to see Caleb McCumby, a minister.

Returned in the evening to the canal boat, and waited until half-past 10 o'clock before the packet arrived; being an hour and a half out of time, in which we took a passage for Montezuma, a distance of about forty miles, which we reached about 7 o'clock in the morning. Here we hired a young man to take four of us in a carriage for six shillings each, to be carried fourteen miles to Springport, along side the Cayuga Lake; and about the middle of the day, and dined at Cornelius Howland's.

Now the 28th, the weather very warm. Cayuga Lake forty miles in length, and from one to five miles in width. Springport has peculiar mill privileges; large creeks breaking out of the banks above the lake, which are dammed up, and the water several feet high, perhaps covers over an acre or two of land, which never freezes; and never want for water to run four pairs of stones or burrs. The country along this lake, and for miles off of it, is very fertile for grain and grass; also for fruits of the best kinds; the situation and prospect delightful; abounding with the comforts of this life.

In the evening, a blind Friend of the name of Esther Fowler, came in to visit me, unto whom I felt the flow of Gospel love to arise in my heart, and the testimony which the Lord gave me left a sweet comfortable feeling on my spirit, with gratitude.

Lodged at Cornelius Howland's.

Now the 29th of the month. This morning was carried by Charles Howland, son of George Howland, of New Bedford, seven miles to Chas. Gifford's; agreeable Friends, where we dined and regaled ourselves on most delicious fruits, large, sweet cherries and strawberries, both in abundance, which seem to suit my feeble condition.

Was carried by this Friend five miles to Scipio Select Quarterly Meeting, in which I was silent until near the close; and then was favored with a lively testimony, but not lengthy, which caused some remarks, that although the servants are but as a trumpet, or a ram's horn, but that the best wine had been kept until the last.

After meeting, went to Calvin Tupper's and took tea.

At this meeting we met with Phebe Field, who had just returned home; having been out all winter on a religious visit. Also met with Lydia Dean on a similar embassy, from the city of New York; also Elihu Anthony, from one of the Eastern quarters, whom we fell in with at Rochester.

Lodged at Calvin Tupper's.

Thirtieth of the month, attended Scipio Quarterly Meeting, in which I was strengthened to relieve my mind, and felt the reward of peace.

Dined at Job Otis's, a man of strong natural abilities, but singular in his manners.

First of Seventh Month. It is common within the limits of this Yearly Meeting, to have a public meeting next day; which we attended to good satisfaction.

I took my seat in this meeting with an idea, that on my part it would be a silent opportunity; but at length I felt the word of command; and commencing that I was not looking for anything to communicate, neither did I think it would have been my lot at this time; but having my mind turned inward unto the Lord, I felt a revival of a Scripture passage, which was feelingly brought to the view of my mind; one of the parables of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: "That he that heareth those sayings of mine and doeth them, I will show you whom he is like;" and so proceeded through the parable, showing the difference between the wise and the foolish man; in which the Lord strengthened me to speak with authority, and lengthened out my testimony in which He guided my feet to the close, bringing peace to my soul, and inward praise to his high and holy name; and several others followed in testimony; after which dear Hannah Wanzer was drawn forth in supplication very fervently unto the Lord; all linking together in one chain of Gospel current. Blessed be the Lord who gave us the victory this day through his dear Son, the Lamb Immaculate!

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Hatakawanna Inn, being on high ground commands a beautiful view of the placid sheet of water lying below and of the rising ground on its northern and western sides. Being a newly finished house, it lacks some of the surrounding trees and shrubbery, which time will probably furnish—but I found it a comfortable home for a few days, one of the pleasant features was a cheerful wood fire in the open fire places of the parlor and dining-room—and although we had just been passing through a very warm spell of weather, yet I found those fires added materially to my comfort.

The lake occupies a depression—a shallow valley in the hills,—the southern end of which has been closed by some means,—probably by the glacial drift which abounds in that section of country—and thus dammed up the water. It is said to be about forty feet deep in the deepest part, although much of it is not more than ten feet. Along the northern and much of the western margin is a broad belt of marsh-land, showing how gradual is the slope of the ground. Into a part of this I penetrated in pursuit of plants, but speedily found myself getting over shoe-top deep, and prudently withdrew. Yet this short excursion was not altogether fruitless of results. Around me were multitudes of the beautiful little vines, now in bloom, of the cranberry. In fact, I was in a cranberry bog—my attention was soon arrested by a plant that had some resemblance to a strawberry, but the flowers were a dark purple. On examination, it proved to be a species of Cinquefoil, the yellow variety of which is so common at home. This was the Marsh Cinquefoil, (Potentilla palustris). As this was altogether a new plant to me, although common enough in northern bogs—the botanical readers may well imagine how much pleasure its discovery gave to me; another plant growing near it was a slender shrub, with narrow leaves, the edges of which were rolled inward—and which were white on the under side with a fine down. The flowers had disappeared, but it had fruit capsules, which resembled those of others of the Heath family—This I subsequently found was a small species of Laurel, that grew in swamps. It was the pale Laurel, (Kalmia glauca). The flowers are about the size of those of the common Sheep Laurel. This also was a new plant to me—and I returned to the inn, well pleased with my success and prepared to enjoy the wood coals in the fire place, to dry and warm my feet.

The next day, we engaged a boat and a man to row us; and spent the forenoon in taking a circuit of the lake, landing at one place on the bogs where a partial walk had been constructed. There we found a bed of cranberry plants, surrounded with the sphagnum moss, which grows abundantly in such localities—so dense was the growth of these plants, that as our boatman told us, we could walk over it in safety, although if we tarried in one spot the feet quickly sank into the water underneath. My companion was an enthusiastic botanist, and it was a source of much pleasure to listen to her screams of delight as plant after plant was encountered. On this part of the bog, we found two species of the Orchis family, so dear to the botanist—one was the Pogonia ophioglossoides—which has a stem six to nine inches high—about the middle of which is a single leaf—and crowned at its summit with pale rose-colored, sweet-scented and beautiful flowers an inch long. The other was the Calopogon pulchellus, which has a bulbous root, from which springs a single grass-like leaf, and a flower stalk crowned with several pink-purple flowers—somewhat resembling those of the Pogonia, but much brighter in color.

On the edge of the bog farthest from the water, was a luxuriant growth of the tall huckleberry bushes, heavily laden with the fruit as yet unripe. Leaving this enticing spot, we re-entered our boat and coasted along the edge of the marsh, passing through patches of the yellow-pond Lilly or Splatterdock (Nuphar advena), the white water Lilly (Nymphaea odorata), and a curious Arum (Peltandra virginica) whose leaves resemble those of the common Calla or Egyptian Lilly. The flowers too were constructed on the same pattern, but the spathe was green, and closely wrapped around the stamens and pistils, instead of being white and unfolded as in the Calla. After the flowering, the end of the spathe rots off, leaving the seeds enclosed in their green envelope as an oval mass. The flower stem then turns downward and sinks the seed vessel into the water or the mud beneath, thus insuring its being planted. It was an interesting sight to see a clump of the Peltandra surrounded by half a dozen flower stems thus carrying their seed pods into the water.

The water lilies were in full bloom, and we carried back quite a cluster of them to adorn a vase in the parlor of the inn.

The Pickerel Weed (Pontederia cordata) was just coming into bloom. The stalk has one large leaf and terminates in a spike of blue flowers. Among the plants which we managed to save as the boat glided past them, was a species of pond weed, with unusually large leaves floating on the surface and supporting the flower stalk which was thus held up into the air and enabled to perfect its seed. The stems varied in length according to the depth of the water. Some of them were three feet or more long. The submerged leaves were altogether different from those floating on the surface, being longer, thinner, almost translucent, and wavy in their outline. Under the shelter of these water plants were droves of young fish which there found protection from the Pickerel and Bass which would otherwise have devoured them. It is to this fringe of marsh and the adjacent plants that the people in that vicinity attribute the abundance of fish for which the lake is celebrated. Boats, fishing apparatus and bait are kept for hire by a firm at the lake, and are almost constantly used by the numerous visitors. Some fellow boarders at our house went on a fishing excursion and returned with a string of pickerel, sunfish and yellow perch, which were enjoyed at the supper table by some whose tender feelings would not have permitted them to impale a worm on a hook, or to pass a hook through the back of a live minnow, that, as bait, it might tempt an unwary fish.

Among the things which attracted our notice were some enormous root-stocks or creeping stems, said by our boatman to belong to the yellow pond lilies—They were three or four inches in diameter and several feet in length, and were thickly covered with scars, which I supposed were the marks of the attachment of the leaf stems.

As we were moving quietly along, our boatman exclaimed—there is some jelly. I had once before seen some of the curious jelly-like mass of animalculæ which is found at times in ponds and lakes, and eagerly clutched at it as we slowly passed by. I caught about a quart of it, which I deposited with some water in an old tin can, which the fisherman used to hold worms and other bait; and so brought it safely to the inn and thence to my own home—having first transferred it to a jar with a cover. On looking through the transparent strings of jelly, they were seen to be thickly studded with minute brown points, which the microscope showed to be oval or egg-shaped little bodies.

The study of these low forms of life opens up a subject of much interest. They belong to the class of Polyzoa (many animals) so called because of the multitude of separate polyps which are united in each compound animal. To what genus and species my find belonged, I am unable to tell, but there is considerable resemblance in the manner of growth and life history of several of the forms of Polyzoa which inhabit fresh waters. The buds or eggs from which new colonies are to develop are formed in the summer or fall, and are liberated by the decay of the compound parent from which they arise. These eggs or buds, which are very minute, float on the water and are frozen up in the ice which forms on its surface (a process which does not seem to injure them) and in the spring attach themselves to a submerged stump, or any convenient support. They soon begin to increase by a process of budding, and the young colonies thus formed increase in size and the number of their members, until, in some species they number many thousands. The living polyps are imbedded in the gelatinous covering which is secreted, and when they display their tentacles which surround their mouths, they form most beautiful objects of examination for the microscopists, who can scarcely find terms strong enough to express their admiration of the exquisite grace and beauty of those humble organisms.

On submitting my specimens to some scientific friends who had paid considerable attention to these low forms of animal life, they decided that they were not polyzoa, but eggs of some creature imbedded in a gelatinous mass, similar to those laid by frogs and toads.

In my walks about Budd's Lake and its neighborhood, I noticed many specimens of the common Milk Weed—or Silk Weed, (Asclepias Cornuti) but this is an abundant plant in many parts of the country. Another very beautiful species, with rich, dark purple flowers (Asclepias purpurascens) was common there, which grows but seldom in our part of New Jersey. And I frequently met, among the roadside shrubbery with a third kind—(Asclepias Phytolacoides) whose leaves much resemble those of the poke bush, and thence is derived its specific name Phytolacoides, which means like the poke. The individual flowers which compose its umbels are comparatively few in number and dangle at the end of rather long and slender footstalks, and sometimes become tangled with each other, so that the head of flowers has not the compact and regular appearance of most of the species of the milk weed genus.

Another milky-juiced plant, which was quite abundant in places, was the Dogbane, with a rose-colored flower, open and bell shape. It bloomed so freely, that it was quite a handsome and showy plant.

EASTERN JUSTICE.—A strange contrast does an Eastern court of justice present to our idea of the dignity and decorum of a judicial trial. In the earlier and patriarchal times, justice was administered by those who "sat in the gate,"—the natural chiefs of the place, the elders and nobles or sheikhs, so picturesquely depicted by Job (Job 29: 10-17). "The gate" was the open space always kept just within the gateway of town or village, the ordinary place of assembly. Every traveller will recall the open space within the Jaffa gate of Jerusalem, where the country folk gather for market, and the laborers wait to be hired. Here were tried or heard all sorts of cases. There was no distinction between civil and criminal. Every man who had a grievance rushed to the gate, and in the loudest tones pleaded his own cause. I have often seen this primitive tribunal in the remoter villages both of Africa and Syria. The elders sit silently and solemnly while the litigants declaim. Not so the bystanders, who invariably assume the functions of an amateur jury, and freely criticise the pleadings. But, however vociferous the debate during the trial, all is hushed when the sheikh or the council of elders have given the final decision. In later times, and in large centers of population, the primitive tribunal gave place to the more organized courts in the judgment-hall or area of the citadel or palace. Still, the mode of procedure was the same, and the judicial functions were not separated from the executive or military. Nor were they altogether so after the Roman conquest. Pilate was procurator; this is, he governed absolutely under the emperor and had no quaestor, or judicial colleague; while the senatorial provinces were governed by proconsuls, but quaestors presided in the law courts.

THE TRIBUNALS IN JERUSALEM.—In tracing the history of the various examinations which our blessed Lord had to endure, five in all, we must bear in mind the somewhat intricate relations of the different tribunals in Jerusalem under the Roman rule, and the very definite limitations of the powers of the local and the sacerdotal authorities. The first examination during the night before Annas, not mentioned by St. Luke, was absolutely informal; for it was not at this time recognized by the civil power, having been superseded by the Roman who had placed Caiaphas on his throne. No less informal was the examination before Caiaphas; for it was expressly forbidden by the rules of the Sanhedrim, to try any capital case by night. The Mishna says: Cases of moment are heard in the daytime, and may be determined in the night. Capital causes are tried in the day, and finished in the day. Judgment is passed the same day, if it be for acquitting; but if it be for condemning, it is passed the day after. Blessed be the judge who leaveneth his judgment," which is further explained, "who delays his judgment, and lets it rest all night that he may sit out the truth." And, again there was a further rule: "Let them not judge on the Sabbath, or on the eve of the Sabbath nor on the eve of a feast-day." Consequently it was only in the morning that the Sanhedrim or council could legally assemble. "As soon as it was day, the elders came together." Yet still they would have been breaking their law had they tried their prisoner. They consequently only formulated charges. They would doubtless plead that, as the power of life and death had been taken from them by the Romans, they could not be said to be trying a capital case. It is true that, as in the case of Stephen not long afterwards, the Jewish punishment of stoning to death was sometimes inflicted. But this was done by the populace, without a formal sentence. Josephus relates that Ananias the high-priest was deposed by Albinus, the successor of Festus, for having exceeded his powers in delivering the brother of Jesus and some others to be stoned, and for assembling the Sanhedrim without his consent.

"THEY WERE INSTANT WITH LOUD VOICES."—The interrogations, the constant interruptions, the discussions with the accusers, the appeals to the crowd in the Prætorium, all are illustrated by the proceedings in Oriental judgment-halls to-day. I once witnessed such a trial in a town in Mesopotamia. A Circassian colony in the neighborhood had an evil reputation as thieves and highwaymen. Some horses had been stolen. A Circassian was caught shortly afterwards; and though his character was the only evidence of guilt, he was brought by the angry crowd before the kadi, in the town-hall of the place. After some minutes of shouting and gesticulations, the judge who sat at the end of the hall on his carpet, with his scribe and some dignitaries round him, inquired the charge, which was very vague. He declined to condemn the man, on which the turbulent mob began to use threats. Somewhat intimidated, the judge said he would speak to the accused in private. The man was led round, and the judge and defendant disappeared behind a curtain. My guide observed, as if it were a matter of course, that they had withdrawn to arrange a fife. Soon they returned, and the mob began cry out for sentence. It was evident the prisoner had not been able to satisfy the demands of the judge; for he solemnly declared, that the man was guilty, but that Circassians were thieves, and sentenced him to one hundred strokes of the bastinado at once, and he kept in prison till the horses or their value could be restored. This is a trivial commonplace instance, but enough to explain the many allusions in Scripture to unjust judges.—S. S. Times.

KNOWEST thou the size of the hole left by a man stuck into the ocean? Such a hole dost thou, O man, leave on thy departure! Universe goes on as ever; but over thee the abyss quickly closes, and all is then as before,

A SUMMER NIGHT'S SONG.

BY MARY ROWLES JARVIS.

Year after year, when earth puts on its spring-time garb of grace,
In these green temple courts of God his singers take their place.

Unspoiled by centuries of strife, unchanged all change among,
They sing the songs of Eden still, as when the world was young.

The blackbird whistling loud and clear for joy of leafy days,
The throstle on the topmost bough beside himself with praise,

The lark far up the sapphire road no human step hath trod,
The sparrow's lowly chirp—not one is silent unto God

When the triumphant march of dawn sweeps o'er the twilight skies,
And flowers by myriads on the earth uplift their waiting eyes,

When, waking, all created things make mention of his name,
The adoration of the birds man's silence puts to shame.

They tell, in briefer, softer strains, of morning hopes fulfilled
When noontide with its sultry touch the drowsy earth hath stilled,

And when the angel of the dusk steals over wood and dell,
In one grand curfew burst of song they bid the day farewell.

But lest one hour should be without its tribute to the King,
One warbler, first among them all, for darkness waits to sing;

A song so rich and full, with such sweet fantasies enwrought,
A seraph wandering from the skies its cadence might have taught.

God loves them all, each lifted voice of all the feathered host;
But still, if favored one there be, I think He praises most

The bird whose song through darkness cleaves a pathway to the throne, Content, amid a silent world, to sing for Him alone!

STILLNESS.

Be silent to God; let Him mould thee.—LUTHER,

Thy lesson art thou learning,
O tried and weary soul?
His ways art thou discerning
Who works to make thee whole?
In the haven of submission
Art thou satisfied and still?
Art thou clinging to the Father,
'Neath the shadow of his will?
Now while his arms enfold thee,
Think well, He loveth best,
Be still and He shall mould thee,
For his heritage of rest.

The vessel must be shapen
For the joys of Paradise;
The soul must have her training
For the service of the skies;
And if the great Refiner
In furnaces of pain
Would do his work more truly,
Count all his dealings gain.
For He Himself hath told thee
Of tribulations here;
Be still and let Him mould thee
For the changeless there.

From vintages of sorrow
Are deepest joys distilled,
And the cup outstretched for healing
Is oft at Marah filled.
God leads to joy through weeping,
To quietness through strife,
Through yielding into conquest,
Through death to endless life.
Be still, He hath enrolled thee
For the kingdom and the crown;
Be silent, let Him mould thee
Who calleth thee His own.

Such silence is communion,
Such stillness is a shrine;
The fellowship of suffering
An ordinance divine.
And the secrets of abiding
Most fully are declared
To those who with the Master
Gethesemane have shared.
Then trust Him to uphold thee
'Mid the shadows and the gloom;
Be still and He shall mould thee
For his Presence and for Home.

For Resurrection stillness
There is Resurrection Power;
And the prayer and praise of trusting
May glorify each hour;
And common days are holy
And years an Eastertide,
For those who with the risen One
In Risen Life abide.
Then let his true love mould thee,
Keep silent at his Word;
Be still and He shall mould thee;
O rest thee in the Lord.

THE TESTIMONY OF CHESTER MONTHLY MEETING, NEW JERSEY, CONCERNING HANNAH WARRINGTON.

The loving kindness and tender mercy of the Almighty are conspicuously shown in the manner in which He preserves in his holy fear and under his Divine government, even to very advanced life, those who have in youth yielded to the visitations of his grace, and entered into covenant with Him.

This we believe was the experience of our late valued friend, Hannah Warrington. She was the daughter of Henry and Rebecca Warrington, and was born on the 16th of Fourth Month, 1793, at the family home on the banks of the Pensaukin Creek, in Burlington County, N. J. This continued to be her home for many years, until the death of a sister, who left young children, induced her to go to her brother-in-law's, and take care of the family. She afterwards removed to Moorestown, where she resided until the close of her life.

Among her papers, evidently written in mature age, is the following narrative of her early religious experience:

"It is with me to give some account of the tender dealings of the Most High with me in my young and infantile years. My parents being deeply concerned for the welfare of their children and family, were in the practice of collecting them on First-day afternoons, for reading in the Scriptures of Truth, in which all took a part that were able to read, and they themselves also read a portion audibly, and then we sat some time in silence. It was in one of these opportunities, when I was between the age of six and seven years, that my young mind was so remarkably visited with the Day-spring from on high, that my heart was filled with such love and sweetness as I had never witnessed before; and under this precious feeling, after we were released, I was afraid to enter into conversation, lest I should lose the precious covering I had been favored with. But, like Samuel of old, I did not then understand whence it came; yet the sweet savor continued to cover as a mantle for many days. I did not feel at liberty to speak of it to any one, not even to my parents, but laid up what seemed to me these wonderful things, and pondered them in my heart. Through infinite goodness and mercy, I was not long permitted to remain in ignorance respecting this word nigh in the heart, this principle, this precious principle, of love to God and good-will to men; but I felt it not only in its excellence and loveliness, but I was given to feel it also in its reproofs, bringing sorrow for lightness and vanity, to which I sometimes gave way.

"Thus I continued for some years, through faithfulness making some advances, and through unfaithfulness falling back. Yet the good Shepherd did not leave in these, my wanderings, but in mercy He followed me by the crook of his love, and my heart was often broken before Him, and made willing to listen to his voice and obey its teachings, whereby I was given to partake of the oil of joy and rejoicing. In the twelfth year of my age a sore trial was permitted to come upon us in the death of a beloved and precious mother; a little group of six children left without a mother's care! These were humbling seasons, never to be forgotten. Yet the Arm of infinite mercy and goodness was near to sustain the bereaved; and under all these trials renewed visitations were granted to my poor soul. At one of these seasons the overshadowing was so full and complete that I sat down in silent adoration, when a voice seemed to say, 'If thou wilt be faithful I will prepare thee to proclaim the glad tidings of the gospel of peace and salvation.' On receiving this intelligence, my mind was brought into submission, and willing to do anything that would bring peace, and please Him who had dealt so bountifully with me.

"But when the full time came that I must show my allegiance to the King of kings by obedience, I drew back and plead excuses, as Moses of old did, that I was slow of speech and could not speak well. I also brought some to view who could speak well; but all excuses were rejected, nothing but obedience would do. I refused time after time to be obedient, until I was left in darkness which could be felt. But in the midst of my disobedience my Heavenly Father remembered mercy, and opened the way again; and by yielding obedience thereto, how was the scene changed! No tongue, no pen can set forth to the full the change which took place. A new creation seemed to be ushered in, nothing to disturb or destroy in all his holy mountain. The joy and rejoicing which flowed into my heart at this time were unspeakable and full of glory."

These experiences were laid up as treasures in her memory, and in after years were at times brought forth for the comfort and instruction of others. Thus, in 1868, more than fifty years after the death of her mother, in expressing her sympathy with a family where the father had died, she recalls the "memorable and melting seasons" when the presence of the Most High seemed to overshadow the little group that remained in her own family; and she assured the sorrowing household that He who has promised to be as a husband to the widow, and a father to the fatherless, "will not fail to be near to assist all his truly devoted children."

Her own early experience of the operation of the "Word nigh in the heart," was one of the things that prepared her more than eighty years after to enforce the declaration of the Psalmist, when he queried, "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way?" and answered the question by saying, "By taking heed thereto, according to thy Word." In her own meeting at Moorestown, on the 13th of Eighth Month, 1882, she referred to this passage, and exhorted young and old to take heed to the inspeaking Word of Divine Grace, which would show them how to walk and what to do, and would lead them in the right way. One who was present on that occasion, says, "It was a persuasive appeal." She afterwards knelt and prayed for different classes in a tender and touching manner, petitioning for the class to which she belonged—the aged, those who had known the Lord to be their Light in early days, and had experienced Him to be with them through life, redeeming them out of many troubles. She asked that He would still be with these in old age, when their strength was failing, and be their evening song.

In the Fifth Month of 1885, a Friend from Ohio, who was in these parts on a religious visit, spent an evening with her; when Hannah commemorated in a feeling manner the excellent kindness of her Heavenly Father to her all through her long life—(she was then in her ninety-third year). She mentioned the gladness she felt when she had heard of the Friend's proposed visit to our meetings; and referred to a visit she herself had paid many years before, and mentioned that at the close of a Quarterly Meeting she attended, Caleb Pennoek, then an aged man, came into the women's side of the house to speak with her. He told her that his strength had failed, and his time of labor was nearly over, but it was a comfort to him to see that those younger in years were still made willing to labor in the Lord's cause; so that there was a succession in the Church. Now that her own strength was failing, she appeared to rejoice that the call to labor in the Lord's vineyard was extended to others.

About the time she came of age, she spent some time in Philadelphia, preparing herself for the business of teaching, an employment in which she was engaged for many years. This was a period in her life when she passed through much exercise, preparatory to her appearance in the ministry. Different Friends were dipped into a feeling of sympathy with her. Among these was that tender-spirited minister, Thomas Scattergood. She said he did not preach to her as some others did, but in his company she felt much relief, as if, for the time, he bore her burdens.

At intervals, from 1814 to 1823, she was in the habit of recording her feelings and religious exercises in an informal diary. These memoranda evince the fervent aspirations of her mind for a full submission of heart to the Divine will, and show her dependence on the Lord for ability to withstand temptation and to perform his work. About the close of the year 1814, she pens the following petition, which seems to show a preparation for the service of the Gospel, which proclaims good-will to man: "Be pleased to open my heart in love towards the whole human family, whether far or near, Friend or no Friend, rich or poor; for this was the example of our blessed Saviour when personally among men. May this be the experience of all thy children."

In the Eleventh Month of 1815, she writes: "Find occasion of repenting every day. O, may I draw nearer and nearer to my God, and bow before his mercy seat, entreating favor for the past, and strength for days to come! O, strengthen me to endure thy chastening hand, and spare not till all sin is purged away."

Her diary shows that she had to pass through much mental conflict, and to endure many humbling baptisms of spirit in the experience of the indispensable work of regeneration, which every child of God must pass through. Her naturally strong will and decided character had to submit to the government of Christ, before she could attain a state of peace and acceptance with Him. And no doubt through much of her life she was conscious of the danger to which she was exposed—of these traits—the original inhabitants of her land, reasserting their powers, if continued vigilance were not maintained. But with her, as with many others of the Lord's servants of similar natural character, there was a perceptible softening of spirit, as years passed on, and increasing degrees were manifested of that sweetness and loveliness which evinced that she was becoming more and more prepared for the society of saints and angels, and the spirits of the just, made perfect, in those regions where all is harmony and love.

After opening her school, several of her entries express the concern she felt for the children. In the Fourth Month, 1817, she says: "May I be enriched with fresh supplies from the Fountain of living waters, that I may go in and out before the tender plants, so as to advance the great and good cause. O, may I feel thy presence morning by morning, that I may fulfil the labors of the day with acceptance!"

The first notice of her public appearance as a minister, that we have met with, is the following memorandum made in the Sixth Month, 1821: "Had to open my mouth in meeting, which was very trying to my natural part; but feeling the necessity, was made willing to bow in resignation to Him who is omnipotent, and has a right to dispose of us as He sees best. Felt my mind clothed with an holy calm after this small dedication. May there be a greater willingness wrought in my heart to do whatever is made manifest by the Light; but ever let me wait for the arising of this Light, which is as a lamp to the feet, and a light in the path."

Her gift in the ministry was acknowledged by her friends in 1822. The first minute she obtained for religious service was in the Ninth Month, 1824, to visit the meetings of Abington and Bucks Quarterly Meetings. This was an exercising service, and rendered more so by the declension which she found in some places; but at its close, through honest labor and the Divine blessing, she was enabled to record: "Returned with a mind so clothed with peace, that the language of the Psalmist was sweetly brought to my remembrance, 'What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits' to us ward?"

The minutes of the Monthly Meeting record twenty-five other visits of this kind, many of them to different parts of her own Yearly Meeting, but a number of them to those of New England, New York, Baltimore, Ohio and North Carolina. The last of these was in 1876, to Salem and Burlington Quarterly Meetings and most of their subordinate meetings. She does not appear to have preserved any detailed accounts of these visits, but a few references to them in her letters to a dearly beloved friend of Ohio, are instructive. Under date of Twelfth Month 14th, 1870, she says:

"Thy truly welcome communication came to hand at a time when I felt as under the moon, tains, with a prospect that had rested with me some time, and had obtained liberty for its performance, to visit the meetings of Abington Bucks and part of Burlington Quarters; and this is not all—to set out with such a mission under feelings of leanness and great poverty of spirit, as without purse or scrip, storehouse or barn, with an earthen tabernacle much shattered, and great weakness of mind. Is it a marvel that a few words from thy pen tended to animate and revive a hope that strength would be afforded equal to the day, agreeably to the promise: 'As thy days so shall thy strength be?' I have indeed witnessed the truth of it to my humbling admiration. After having endeavored to be faithful according to manifested duty, and about to return, the language of my heart was, 'What shall I render unto thee, O Father, for all thy benefits to me, a poor worm of the dust.' Thus are we dealt with my beloved sister, to prepare us for the Master's service, to understand the states of the people, and to wait upon Him, the great Replenisher, for ability to minister, or to keep silence before Him."

For some years prior to her death, the feebleness resulting from her advanced age prevented Hannah Warrington from getting out to religious meetings; but, as she once remarked to a friend, she often met with her friends [in spirit] whilst she was sitting by herself at home. And she added, "I am thankful that my Heavenly Father gives me to feel so much of the comfort of his Holy Spirit. I am willing to remain or to depart. My business now is to wait patiently."

She felt the need of abiding in a state of watchful dependence on the Divine mercy, and could testify that "Religion is a reality, and the half cannot be told of the mercy and loving-kindness of our Heavenly Father."

In this condition of patiently waiting and quietly hoping, she received the final summons, which came in the form of a wearing out of the earthly tabernacle, and we believe she has found a house "not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Her death occurred on the 4th of Tenth Month, 1891, in the ninety-ninth year of her age—a minister about sixty-nine years.

Burying Alive in France.—We have recently read of a petition presented many years ago to the Paris Senate for regulations to prevent burying alive. Cardinal Donnet, Archbishop of Bordeaux, gave an account of various cases within his knowledge in which persons had narrowly escaped being buried alive, and closed with his own experience, as follows:

In the summer of 1826, on a close and sultry day, in a church which was excessively crowded, a young priest who was in the act of preaching was suddenly seized with giddiness in the pulpit. The words he was uttering became indistinct; he soon lost the power of speech, and sunk down on the floor. He was taken out of the church and carried home. All was thought to be over. Some hours after, the funeral bell was tolled and the usual preparation made for interment. His eyesight was gone. But if he could see nothing he could hear, and I need not say that what reached his ears was not calculated to reassure

m. The doctor came, examined him, and pronounced him dead; and after the usual inquiries as to his age and the place of his birth, &c., gave permission for his interment next morning. The venerable Bishop, in whose cathedral the young priest was preaching when he was seized with the fit, came to his bedside to recite the De Profundis. The body was measured for the coffin. Night came on, and you will easily feel how inexpressible was the anguish of the living being in such a situation. At last, amid the voices murmuring around him, he distinguished that of one whom he had known from infancy. That voice produced a marvelous effect and a superhuman effort.

Of what followed I need say no more than at the seemingly dead man stood next day in the same pulpit. The young priest, gentlemen, the same man who is now speaking before you, and who, more than forty years after that event, implores those in authority not merely to watch vigilantly over the careful execution of the legal prescriptions with regard to interments, but to enact fresh ones in order to prevent the recurrence of irreparable misfortunes. The recital of the Cardinal of what occurred himself produced a profound sensation.

[We are somewhat sensitive on this subject, our own father, being declared dead by his physician, came very near being buried alive, and as this paper goes to about 3,500 physicians we think it well to call their attention to the subject.]—GEO. T. ANGELL in Our Dumb Animals.

Fertile and Infertile Flowers.—The "Proceedings of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia" has a paper which points out that the flowers of the common smartweed are of two classes—one which has flowers, expanding, perfect in all their parts, and freely visited by bees for honey or pollen, and yet infertile. The other class has flowers, also perfect so far as stamens and the pistil are concerned, which never open, and are all fertile. One species has in addition flowers in all the sheaths at the base of the leaves, from the root upward. This species is Polygonum acre.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 13, 1892.

In the fourth volume of "Piety Promoted" there is an account of William Levis, of Kent, in Chester County, Pa., who died in 1747. It contains the following remarks, which he made when near the close of life, and which contain instruction very applicable to the present day:—

"I am sensible that all those who are rightly concerned for the discipline and promotion of Truth, will meet with trials from that libertine spirit which would lay all waste. These will say that religion consists not in such small things; but I have observed that one small thing makes way for another, and greater things will take place; and if there is not a careful watching against these small things, the eye that should be kept open to see the light of them, will become darkened. * * * As Friends faithfully maintain this their discipline, the Lord will preserve them; but if they neglect it they shall surely suffer loss.

The Apostle Paul speaks of the man of sin sitting in the temple of God, as if he were to be an object of worship. The nearest approach to this condition of things that is to be seen in the Society of Friends at the present day, I believe, is the substitution of human will and wisdom in the Church for the pure leadings of the Spirit of Christ. In how many ways does this insidious and misleading spirit of the world manifest itself! Instead of patiently submitting to the baptisms of Christ and learning wisdom of Him who teacheth as never man taught, and instructs us by the discipline through which we are led. Some in these days think to become qualified to preach to others, by training in theological schools, and the study of the Bible; instead of going to our places of worship in a state of reverent dependence on the Almighty, willing to speak or to be silent, as He may command; some go with a determination to speak, whether a Divine message is given them or not, trusting either to previous preparation or to their own powers of oratory.

We believe it is one of the peculiarly valuable characters of our Discipline, that it had its origin in the religious concern of our worthy ancestors. It was not the result simply of human skill and wisdom, but embodied those principles and testimonies of which they had been livingly convinced by the work of grace on their own hearts. Hence it requires a measure of the same religious experience to enable persons in these days to fully appreciate it, and to see the importance of some of its provisions. Those who have not passed through the fire of God's altar or been broken to pieces by his judgments are prone to rebel against those of its provisions which conflict with their ideas and wishes, and, as opportunity offers, seek to change them, so that they may follow their own inclinations without being open to the charge of violating the Discipline. But, as our late valued friend Morris Cope, pithily remarked a few years since—It is the people that need changing not the discipline.

The Central Book and Tract Committee of Indiana Yearly Meeting have published a pamphlet entitled, "The Scripture Doctrine of the Ordinances." It contains extracts from several of our ancient and more modern writers, in regard to Water Baptism and the "Supper;" and we think clearly shows the "original, continuous and concurrent testimony" of the Society of Friends on those subjects. It is evident that Friends never practised these rites, and never regarded them as matter of indifference, which their members were at liberty to use, if they saw fit.

We are pleased to see so satisfactory a testimony to the Truth of some of our original principles.

A friend has called our attention to an expression in an article on p. 411 of THE FRIEND of Seventh Month 23d, where it is said, "The most irrefragable proof as to the Holy Scriptures being the Word of God, is the witness of that spirit."

We suppose all that was intended by the writer of the article, is included in what is elsewhere stated in the Bible, that holy men of old spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. While Friends have ever believed in the inspiration of the Scriptures, they have avoided giving to them collectively the title—"The Word of God," because that term is applied in them to our Saviour himself—and therefore such a use might lead to a confusion of ideas.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Homestead suits against the Carnegie officials and the Pinkertons, charging them with murder, were begun on the 4th inst., in Pittsburgh. The informations were made by Hugh Ross. The officials of the Carnegie Company surrendered, waived a hearing, and were released on bail in the sum of $10,000 each. Judge Ewing said: "This information is made by a man who himself is charged with murder, and is now on bail. It would have been better had it been made by some other person."

The Coroner's inquest on the bodies of the men killed in the Homestead riots was ended on the 4th inst. The jury found that the locked-out men had assembled unlawfully upon the property of Carnegie, Phipps & Co., to prevent the landing of Pinkerton men, and recommended that the proceedings be certified to the Ninth Month Grand Jury. No attempt was made by the jury in any of the ten cases to designate the persons by whom the fatal shots were fired.

H. C. Frick has recovered sufficiently to resume his duties.

On the morning of the 4th inst. a number of strikers and non-union men, armed with clubs and stones, assaulted a number of men who were about to enter the Carnegie Works, at Duquesne, to make repairs. The Deputy Sheriffs at the mills were unable to control the mob, and word was sent to Brigadier-General Wylie. He sent the Sixteenth Regiment to the scene on a special train. Upon the arrival of the troops the mob retired, and the soldiers took possession of the works.

On the 8th inst., the Duquesne plant of the Carnegie Steel Company resumed operations. Nearly all the strikers returned to work. There was no trouble.

James Hunter, who for five years has been a fugitive from justice in South America, has returned to this city to face the charges of forgery which will be made against him in court. His son, James Hunter, Jr., accompanied him. They arrived in New York on the 7th inst. from Montevideo on the steamer Securanto. James Hunter is broken down in mind and health, and it is thought he can live but a short time. He has been held in $10,000 bail for court. "The way of the transgressor is hard."

Judge Rumsey, of New York, has declared the Legislative Reapportionment Act of that State unconstitutional.

A marvellous story of icebergs is told by Captain Bray, of the British ship New City, which arrived in New York on the 8th inst., from Taital, after a voyage of 94 days. Some of the icebergs, he declares, were veritable islands, and, as a whole, they formed the largest collection that he had ever seen. At times the New City was surrounded by them. The small peaks that were first seen soon grew into icebergs of enormous size. On the night of Sixth Month 20th, 13 bergs were counted. One was fully 10 miles long, and no less than 150 feet high.

During Seventh Month the receipts of the Brooklyn Bridge were $93,576.16. The daily average of passengers carried was 102,215, or a total of 2,137,673 for the month.

A passenger train was held up by masked robbers near Collis, California, on the night of the 3d inst. The locomotive was disabled by a dynamite cartridge, and the express car blown open. The messenger was forced to open the safe, and some $50,000 or $60,000 is said to have been taken.

William Penn Cresson, the retired manufacturer and philanthropist, died on the 7th inst. at the age of 80 years.

The deaths in Philadelphia last week numbered 693, as compared with 786 for the week preceding, and 479 for the corresponding week of 1891. Of the foregoing, 212 were under one year of age; 361 were males and 332 females; 103 died of cholera infantum; 90 of sunstroke; 49 of consumption; 34 of heart diseases; 30 of marasmus; 27 of convulsions; 25 of old age; 24 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 23 of inanition; 19 of apoplexy; 15 of diphtheria; 13 of pneumonia, and 11 of typhoid fever.

COTTON was quiet but steady, on a basis of 7½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, at $16.00 a $17.00 and spring bran, $14.75 a $15.50 per ton.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.25 a $2.50; do., extras, $2.75 a $3.10; No. 2 winter family, $3.25 a $3.65; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $4.00 a $4.30; Western winter, clear, $3.75 a $4.10; do. do., straight, $4.00 a $4.30; Western winter, clear, $3.75 a $4.10; do. do., straight, $4.00 a $4.30; winter patent, $4.40 a $4.75; Minnesota, clear, $3.35 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.85 a $4.35; do., patent, $4.50 a $4.75; do. favorite brands, higher. Rye flour was dull but steady at $3.75 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 81½ a $2 cts.

No. 2 mixed corn, 56½ a 57 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 40 a 41 cts.

CATTLE MARKET.—Extra, 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3¾ cts.; culls, 3¼ a 3½ cts.; fat cows, 2½ a 3½ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5¾ cts.; good, 5 a 5½ cts.; medium, 4½ a 4¾ cts.; common, 3¾ a 4¼ cts.; culls, 2 a 3½ cts.; Lambs, 3 a 7 cts.

Hogs were dull and neglected.

FOREIGN.—On the 4th inst. the British Parliament was opened. W. E. Gladstone received an ovation on his appearance. Speaker Peel was re-elected. There was a meagre attendance at the opening of the House of Lords.

The Queen's Speech from the Throne is formal and does not outline any line of policy proposed to be adopted.

Althorp's library is said to have been purchased by a wealthy woman named Rylands, for the sum of $250,000, and by her presented to the city of Manchester.

The results of the supplementary elections in France for members of Departmental Councils leave a net Republican gain of 195. The Conservatives now hold only six departments.

Rudolph Jaeger, who for 17 years was chief cashier in the banking house of the Rothschilds at Frankfort, and who, in Tenth Month last, was found to be a defaulter, was, on the 5th inst., convicted and sentenced at Frankfort to 10 years' penal servitude. Jaeger, whose stealings were estimated at over 1,500,000 marks, fled secretly before his crime was discovered, but was tracked to Ramleh, Egypt, where he was found living at a hotel with a woman who had fled with him. When arrested, Jaeger was found to have in his possession nearly the full amount which he had stolen. His infatuation for the woman, known as Kletz, is said to have led him to commit the crime. Jaeger pled guilty to most of the charges.

The Neue Freie Press, of Vienna, on the 2d inst., published the details of a scheme, elaborated by Prof. Soetbeer, to harmonize the monetary system of the world. The professor recommends that the coming International Monetary Conference agree that no gold coin containing less than 2.8065 grams of fine gold be allowed to be coined or circulated in the contracting countries; that silver be coined in the proportion of 20 value units of silver to one of gold; that silver be legal tender up to twenty dollars, and that silver coins below the fixed standard of purity be withdrawn from circulation. Prof. Soetbeer considers that everything depends upon the attitude of Great Britain.

It is reported from Simla that three detachments of Russian troops have occupied the Pamir as far as the Hindoo-Koosh Mountains, thus holding the country from which Captain Yanoff, who commanded the Russian expedition to the Pamir in 1891, retired in the latter part of that year.

A despatch to the Times from Simla says: "It is reported that a collision has occurred between Russians and Afghans at Sonatash and Yeshilkool, five Russians being killed and sixteen captured. The Afghans, it is said, refused to release the prisoners, declaring that in future they would neither give nor take quarter. The party probably consisted of Kirghezes, officered by Russians."

The Chronicle's St. Petersburg correspondent learns that over 50,000 persons died of cholera in Russia Caucasus in Seventh Month. These figures do not include the deaths from cholera in Asiatic Russia.

A despatch from Honolulu, by way of San Francisco, says that the Hawaiian Board of Health has had an offer from Dr. Hansen, the leprosy specialist of Norway, to come to the islands to investigate the disease as it appears there. "Dr. Hansen is the discoverer of the bacillus of leprosy and inspector for Norway."

DIED, at her residence, West Grove, Chester County, Penna., Seventh Month, 4th, 1892, SARAH ANN MURRAY, wife of Harvey Murray, in her eighty-eighth year of her age. A member of the Garden Monthly and West Grove Particular Meeting. She was of a gentle and quiet spirit, and was devoted wife and parent. Her sufferings were great for many months, which she bore with patience without a murmur; and often expressed that her time was not long here, with a desire that she might patiently wait until the Master called her home, where she hoped to rest. And we fully believe she is gathered home to her eternal rest, like a shock of corn full, ripe for the Heavenly garner. Her close was like one falling into a peaceful sleep.

—, near West Grove, on the 10th of Fourth Month, 1892, MARY PUSEY, daughter of the late Joseph and Rebecca R. Pusey, in the forty-sixth year of her age. A member of the Monthly Meeting, Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 270.

G. F. Pentecost relates a very interesting instance of the work of Divine Grace, as told to him when in Scotland by a minister, who said he could vouch for its truthfulness in every particular. His narrative is as follows:—

Madam M. was the daughter of a very distinguished and wealthy French family. When she was quite young, about twenty, I believe, she was married to a young man of equal wealth and high social position. As was common, these young people were worldly and gay, given to everything going on in the fashionable world, and had nothing to do but to amuse themselves and gratify every whim which an idle fancy suggested. Of course, they were destitute of spiritual knowledge of God and Christ, though, in their way, devout enough Roman Catholics; that is, they attended church, and went through all the necessary ceremonials of Rome to secure them the approval of "Mother Church." Shortly after their marriage they went one night to the theatre, and witnessed a play in which, in one of the scenes, there was enacted the slaughter of the Huguenots. The scene was vivid and life-like that it greatly distressed the mind of the lady. She asked her husband with bated breath and strained eyes, what it meant. The reply was, "It is a representation of the killing of the Huguenots."

"Why were they killed?" asked the young wife.

"Oh, they were killed for their heretical religion!"

"And was it for no other reason than for their religion?"

"For no other reason. They were heretics."

"And who had them killed?"

"Why, I suppose it was done by order of the church; they were heretics."

"And did our holy Church have these poor people massacred for no other reason than for believing Jesus Christ could save them without the help of the Church?"

"For no other reason, so far as I know," was the reply. "They were not criminals, but heretics."

And as far as he was able to do so, the young husband related the story of the massacre, without either justifying or condemning it—speaking of it rather as a matter of course.

This scene and the story of the slaughter of the Huguenots, with which she had not been familiar, so wrought upon the young wife that she begged her husband to take her home. For days she could not shake off the impression of that scene and story. It continued to prey upon her mind until she fell into a deep state of melancholy and profound conviction of sin. There was none to help or instruct her, and she was as utterly ignorant of the Bible as she was destitute of the possession of one. The husband became so distressed and alarmed at his wife's condition that he called in medical advice. After hearing from the husband the occasion of his wife's mental distress, and from the lady herself the story of her horror,—“that these poor people should be killed for their religion,”—and being plied by her with questions concerning religion which he was utterly unable to answer, the physician withdrew and reported the case to the husband.

"It is a case of religious monomania—a very bad one. You must act at once and promptly, or your wife will fall into hopeless melancholia, and perhaps end in permanent insanity. You must take her about. Go to concerts, to balls, to parties—travel. Do anything and everything that will divert her mind from the terrible subject that possesses her."

Acting upon his advice, the husband began a round of pleasure and fashionable dissipation such as even they had never before indulged in.

Night after night they were out at the theatre, at balls, at concerts, and entertainments; the wife going reluctantly but obediently. One night they were at a grand ball in Paris. They had entered the spacious hotel, and were passing through a long and brilliantly-lighted corridor, lined with lackeys, and leading toward a broad flight of stairs up to the salon where the guests were assembled. Of a sudden, like an apparition, there darted out before them, from some side door, a little man dressed in black, and apparently a clergyman, though not a priest.

This little man stepped up to the lady, and, without a word of introduction or apology for speaking, said, "Madam, do you know the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin?"

To this startling and unheard-of proclamation the lady replied, "What did you say? Will you repeat those words?"

At which the little man in black again declared, without note or comment, but with intense eagerness and pathos, "The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin," and then disappeared as suddenly as he had appeared.

The lady stood still for a moment, dumb-founded, and then remarked to her husband, "Did you ever hear that before? That is the most extraordinary statement I ever heard. What can it mean?"

But as she mused on these words, and climbed the broad and lofty stairway, there fell upon her a peace so sweet and ecstatic that her whole face seemed lighted up with an unearthly gladness.

She went at once into the crowded salon, and approaching the first lady whom she saw, she said to her, "I have just heard the most extraordinary statement. I wonder if you ever heard it, and what does it mean: 'The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin?'"

As might have been expected, the lady to whom this inquiry was addressed was amazed; and the amazement spread through the salon, as Madam M. passed from one to another, repeating her question, and asking if any one could tell her what it meant. Of course, in a few minutes the word was whispered from lip to ear, "Madam M. has gone mad." But, like Paul, she was not mad, only filled with the gladness of God's blessed peace.

Noting the excited (or what seemed to him the excited) state of mind in which his wife had been thrown by the apparition of the little man in black, with his singular declaration, and the real excitement into which she was throwing the fashionable people in the salon by her continuous inquiry of every one whom she met concerning "the blood of Jesus Christ," her husband took her home. For days she simply dwelt in a paradise of joy, repeating over and over again the words, "The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin." Her depression, her so-called religious monomania, her deep melancholia, was gone; and, instead, an ecstasy of gladness had taken its place.

She told everybody about the house, her servants, and beyond the house, her neighbors, of this "precious blood." She found out, finally, where the saying came from. For the first time she got hold of a Bible, and soon devouring the New Testament, she learned the whole glad truth. Her joy was not for a day or a week, but continued until her husband, again alarmed, sent for his medical adviser, the same who had seen her some months before. He had another interview with her, and was treated to the gospel of Christ and a relation of her joy and peace in believing.

The medical man returned to report to the husband, and, with a grave shake of the head, declared, "It is the same thing—religious monomania. It is a very bad case. It has changed its type, taken on another form. Before she was depressed; now she is ecstatic. I am afraid it has reached an acute stage. You must watch her very closely, and do everything you can to divert her mind."

And so the wise fool departed. But the joy did not leave Madam M. It continued, and became the inspiration of a new life to her and to all about her. The Bible was now her daily companion, and she became a sweet witness for Jesus. Again and again she besought her husband to receive Jesus as his Saviour. She broke away from Rome, and took up with the few scattered Protestants whom she could find, and in her own circle continued to speak of Jesus and his precious blood, and his resurrection from the dead.

Some months after, her husband gave a dinner party to a number of artists, wits, and littérati of Paris. At the table the conversation turned on religion, which was ridiculed as superstition; and presently blasphemous and ridiculing sneers were levelled at Jesus Christ and the Bible.

After this ribald conversation had gone on for a few moments, the host, Mr. M., arose at the head of the table and said: "Gentlemen, I cannot have the name and religion of Jesus Christ taken in vain and made the subject of ridicule at my table. Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and our Saviour, and his blood cleanseth from all sin."

The effect of this speech may be more easily imagined than described. Mr. M. had never before articulated his faith, and his happy wife for the first time now knew that her testimony and her life of peace had been blessed of God to his soul also. He joined his wife in her new faith, and himself parted from the superstitions of Rome. This lady lived on for sixty years, dying only a few months ago. She never ceased to carry her joy and testimony wherever she went; and, as I have said, became the leader of the Protestant faith among her class in France.

The singular thing about the whole matter is the sudden appearance of the little man in black, in the great house on the night of a grand ball, and his apparently mad approach into the ball-room. The explanation is simply this. He was a Protestant clergyman, who had some occasion to visit the master of the house that night on business, and as he was about to leave he was seized with an irresistible impulse to rush into the corridor and tell the first person he met that "the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin." Not knowing why he was so strangely led, and himself partly terrified at what he did, not knowing Madam M., or having ever heard of her, or of the deep conviction of sin under which she had been laboring for some months, he saw in her only the first person he met; and, delivering his message, he rushed from the house, not knowing the result of his action until months afterward."

Who shall say that God the Holy Spirit, who took Philip from Samaria to declare Jesus to the eunuch, is not still doing these wonders of grace? God has not forgotten to be gracious, and the Spirit of God "has not ceased to convince men of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment;" nor to take extraordinary means to lead souls to God through Christ, when extraordinary means of grace are necessary.

A CERTAIN MAN THAT WAS LAME.—Every visitor to the East for the first time must be pained and shocked at the display of misery, deformity, and disease which meets his eye at the entrance of every city, and especially about the gateways of public buildings, mosques, and churches, and around the wells. He may well fancy himself among a population of blind men, lepers, and cripples. However, he has seen the worst; for the suffering of the place is in public. In lands where hospitals and refuges are unknown, and where there is no state aid for poverty and disease of any kind, begging is an absolute necessity, and does not even imply any degradation. And this begging is regulated and systematized. The helpless and the crippled are placed in the most frequented thoroughfares. They do not change their posts, which, by some prescription or long usage, appear to be recognized as the rightful possession of the holder; and then they ejaculate their piteous appeal to each passer-by, just as leper or blind man did to Jesus of Nazareth as He passed by. The lepers are always outside the walls, and at some distance apart from others mendicants, as we may see to-day at Jerusalem, where they sit some little way outside the Jaffa and Damascus gates, and by the Pool of Siloam. Every helpless cripple has some friends who will carry him to his accustomed seat in the morning, and, when they return from work at sunset, will carry him back to his hovel, while the lepers crawl back to their sheds, usually attached to the outside of the city wall. The duty of alms-giving is recognized and largely practised by all religions in the East; in the case of the rich, by regular daily doles. Most wealthy Moslems, on their daily visit to the mosque, distribute a very small coin to each beggar as they pass; or, in the case of very great men, are followed by a servant, who places a quarter farthing in each bowl held out before the sufferer. Nor are the very poorest backward in liberally recognizing the claim of the leper and the blind. Fortunate indeed was the lame man who could in the days of the glory of Herod's Temple secure a platform close to one of its principal gates.—H. B. Tristram, in the Sunday School Times.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

1841. Second of Seventh Month. Dined at Joseph Talcott's; from here we were taken by Matthew Barker to his house; a sound-minded Friend; Hannah Wanzer also took tea with us. Here we met with a number of young people; and feeling a concern upon my mind toward the youth, proposed getting into the quiet.

There was soon a collection made, and a solemn silence ensued, which proved to be a season of Divine favor, in which I was enabled, through the Holy Spirit, which made intercession in the wisdom that is pure and peaceable in the mystery of Christ, to the relief of my mind, and rejoicing in the Lord, which had a reaching effect upon the auditory; after which, dear Hannah Wanzer followed in testimony, that "Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts: all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me." And in the course of her communication, expressed that those mountains of opposition would give way, and be broken down before the Lord; and that I might be strengthened in his work, and so bid me God-speed. Which is a very humbling and humiliating consideration to be brought "to stand on such Holy Ground that the shoes must be taken from our feet;" "but it is the Lord's work, and marvelous in our eyes." Blessed be his holy name!

Lodged at Matthew Barker's. Third of Seventh Month, was taken by John Wanzer, a kind and religious young man, to Valentine Willett's, at Skaneateles, a distance of twenty-three miles, where we lodged; but in our journey stopped at Auburn, and was conducted all through the State Prison, in which there are between six and seven hundred prisoners. The most of them appear to be of the age between twenty and thirty-five years, with a sad gloom upon their countenances. They are engaged in almost all kinds of manufactory, wrought up to a high degree of perfection.

Fourth-day of the Seventh Month. Skaneateles Lake is a beautiful sheet of water, about a mile in width and fifteen miles in length; the scenery delightful; the buildings very splendid; the water above three hundred feet deep.

The meeting to-day at Skaneateles was small and dull, in which I sat above an hour before felt the fire of the Lord to arise in my heart and submitting thereunto, was enabled to throw off my burden where it belonged, and returned in peace to Valentine Willett's.

First-day afternoon. My dear friend, John Wanzer still with us, we set out on our journey for De Ruyter, forty-five miles. Passed down and round the foot of the lake, and through the village of Skaneateles; the main street very broad; the dwelling houses and public buildings ornamented; variously formed, exhibiting a variety of taste; painted white; the ends of the buildings set to the street; ornamented with green shrubbery. We passed up on the other side of the lake. In my opinion, such a beautiful scene is seldom to be found; the smooth clear lake, without any marshy ground, and the moderately elevated and fertile ascent from the water's edge abounding with a variety of fruit trees and evergreens, with very splendid country seats, might delight a mind at liberty to muse and feast upon the glories of this world, that must soon fade away; but I did not feel at liberty to indulge therein, but to suffer with the suffering Seed, to visit and "stir up the pur mind by way of remembrance," that those who are designed for fruit-bearing branches (but the blessings of Divine Goodness are extended unto all the human race), might be faithful to the trust, "as good stewards of the manifold Grace of God," "bringing forth fruit to the praise of the Great Husbandman."

We called and took tea at the Widow Sara Dorland's, in whose family we had a favorable opportunity, in which the visited and visitors were broken down together under the might, power and presence of Him who hath testified that "where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I." Blessed be the Lord forever! * * *

Fifth of Seventh Month. This morning had a family sitting, in which the states in individuals were opened and set forth; the ground on which they stood being similar to that of the rich young man who came to Christ commending himself; but the answer was, "One thing thou lackest yet. Sell all that thou hast and distribute to the poor, and come and follow me, and thou shalt have treasure in Heaven;" thus I was favored of the Lord to expostulate upon this subject to the tender and breaking down the hearts of a number present. May the Lord "fasten it as a nail in a sure place!" was the secret prayer of my soul. * * *

Now 6th of the month. My health continues delicate; but it may be all in the order of divine goodness that I should be more and more prepared as a sanctified vessel of the Lord, to be intrusted with a portion of the riches to hand forth to the people, when feeling the word of command, as a fire burning in my bones. Had an appointed meeting to-day at De Ruyter. A small meeting of Friends; but a number of others came in. The opportunity proved a favored season; a renewed visitation to many present.

Dined at Enos Peasley's. Here we took an affectionate leave of our dear young friend, who, for the first time in a family sitting, appeared in public while out with us; now returning home; having carried us in an easy vehicle about sixty-five miles; a grandson of Daniel Haviland. * * *

Seventh day of Seventh Month, and fourth of the week. Attended Smyrna Monthly Meeting, held at Smyrna (belonging to Butternuts Quarter), in which I was silent, except a short testimony just at the close.

* * * * *

Eighth of Seventh Month. Had an appointed meeting at 2 o'clock at Brookfield; but a few Friends here, but a large number of other people. We sat about an hour in silence; after which, my mouth seemed to be opened in that wisdom which is pure and peaceable; and my it was engaged about three-quarters of an hour, and carried through without a jar. Blessed be the Lord, who was near, to the rejoicing of many hearts.

* * * * *

Seventh-day, afternoon. Had an appointed meeting at Westmoreland, at 11 o'clock this morning, which was small, but owned by the Blessed Master, whose boundless store of rich treasures of "things new and old," which He designs to supply his poor, dependent children with] hath no end.

Again pursued our journey for New Hartford; passed through Utica City; about fourteen thousand inhabitants, lying near the Mohawk River, in a very great valley, the Erie Canal running through it, also a railroad. I was informed that, on this canal, there are between three and four thousand boats. * * *

Eleventh of Seventh Month, and First-day of the week. Attended New Hartford Meeting; notice was circulated agreeable to our desire.

There are but few Friends in this place; many others coming in; and whilst quietly waiting, with a composed mind, a Scripture passage opened with weight and attended with ear, as in the presence of his Holy Spirit, as uniting the condition of the present company, in which I was strengthened to expostulate upon the subject beginning that "There is at Jerusalem, by the sheep market, a pool which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches. In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water: For an Angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water: whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in, was made whole."

And thus it was that I was opened to take an expanded view of the matter, and apply it to the present company, of being impotent folk, blind, halt, withered, and so forth; and unto whom they should come and be healed.

The meeting ended solemnly, under which I felt sweet peace, and a thankful heart unto the Lord. * * *

Twelfth of Seventh Month. Again pursued our journey fifteen miles to Burlington, in Otsego County, and dined at Moses Hoag's. Here we had an affecting parting opportunity with our dear friends, Henry Knowles and Susanna his wife, who have carried us about one hundred and five miles, now returning homeward with heartfelt prayers unto the Lord for their preservation, as well as our own; and that his blessings might rest upon them, as upon the house of Obed-edom.

Thirteenth of Seventh Month. We had an appointed meeting at Burlington, and about two-fifths of the assembly not members.

We sat in silence nearly an hour; then feeling a necessity laid upon me to break the silence, under which the good spirit of the Lord guided my steps, strengthened my soul in the labor of the gospel of his Dear Son. A solemn covering prevailed; Truth reigned over all. Blessed be the Lord forever!

* * * * *

Fifteenth of Seventh Month. Was carried by Ephraim Sleeper fourteen miles to Otsego meeting.

The remark of a Friend in the ministry at the close of the meeting was, that the Divine Master was with us, or else he was very much mistaken. * * *

Sixteenth of the Seventh Month. Five miles to Laurens Meeting, 2 o'clock in the afternoon. A suffering time, and silence prevailed until near the close, when I arose with a close, sharp, searching testimony, expressing that my lot that day amongst them had been to suffer in silence, but with fervent desires that the meeting might dig through the rubbish; that there might be life instead of death; that they were dwelling upon the surface, and in a state of stupidity and insensibility, being dead and buried in sin and transgression; but showing how that the offers of mercy were still extended even to raise the dead to life, etc., etc.

After meeting, E. H. S. told me not to be uneasy with what I had said. I replied, in leaving, that I had left a burden.

* * * * *

Twenty-first of Seventh Month. Carried seven miles to the Mohawk River; crossed over; took the railroad car thirty-five miles to Schenectady City, and there, shifting into another train of cars, twenty-one miles to Saratoga Springs—a populous village of great resort, because of its medicinal waters.

One of those springs, called High Rock Spring, the water itself formed the rock. Another spring, called Flat-Rock Spring; this spread and run about, and formed a broad, flat rock. Another, called Congress Spring, which, is supposed, could not be bought for a hundred thousand dollars. Another spring, called Iodine, two years ago, was bought for ten thousand dollars.

I have visited two of those springs and drank of the water. It is cold, but a sharp, stinging taste like ginger beer. A man may drink and drink abundantly of it, without loading his stomach or feeling any inconvenience.

QUAKER.—"If external rites," Archbishop Tillotson affirms, "have ate out the heart of religion in the Church of Rome, religion should seem to have made the deepest impression on the Quakers, who are the most averse from external ceremonies and observances; and are therefore hated by the formalists of all churches." That no honors might be wanting to this truly Christian sect, they have been dignified by the abuse of Cobbett, who, in allusion to their dress, and their rejection of the ceremony of baptism, terms them, in choice Billingsgate, "a set of unbaptized, buttonless blackguards!"

Many have admired and eulogized the mild creed, the universal charity, the fraternal love, the well-directed industry, the moral rectitude, the commercial probity, the strict veracity, the general amiability, of these religionists, among whom are to be found no malefactors, no beggars, no infamous members of any sort, and who imagine that they best prove themselves to be good Christians, by being good subjects, good neighbors, good men.—Selected.

THOU art here to do not thine own work, but that of thy Master. Shalt thou be faithless to thy trust?

A Minute of Lisburn Monthly Meeting, respecting Anne Gardner, a Minister, who died 24th of Eleventh-month, 1891, aged about eighty-seven years.

Our dear friend, Anne Gardner, was a native of Ross, in Herefordshire, and was brought up in religious profession as a member of the Established Church. When little more than a child she became dissatisfied with its forms and ceremonies, and sought for comfort and satisfaction amongst the dissenting bodies around her. When thus seeking for rest to her soul, some of the writings of Friends were recommended to her notice by a Friend with whom she had become acquainted; and being convinced that the religious views and principles professed by us are in accordance with the truth, as set forth in the Holy Scriptures, she frequented our meetings, and soon began to speak as a Minister.

Being left in humble and reduced circumstances, after the death of her father, she earned a livelihood by dress-making; but subsequently, having profited much by reading and private study, she was engaged in several families as a companion and teacher of young children. She moved, in course of time, to the neighborhood of London, where her services as a governess were much appreciated in a family of Friends.

For a considerable time she acted as responsible manager of a hotel, of which a near relative was proprietor. In this position, as well as in more private life, she was an example of great plainness of speech, behavior, and apparel, believing herself called to walk in a path of Christian simplicity and self-denial. She, nevertheless, in every situation in life, gained the respect and loving attachment of those with whom she came in contact.

In middle life she entered the home of the late Lydia Anna Barclay, and resided for some years in Scotland, and was recorded a Minister in unity by the Two Months' Meeting of Aberdeen.

After occupying for a short time the post of governess in Croydon School, she removed to the North of Ireland, and settled at Bessbrook. Whilst a member of Lurgan Monthly Meeting she was liberated for services in this land and in Scotland; but her public engagements were most numerous in Antrim and the adjoining counties. She had a special gift and qualification for service amongst those who were not in profession with us, both in public Meetings for Worship and in small social gatherings, being enabled to set forth with clearness, and to much acceptance by the public, those spiritual views of the Gospel of Christ which have always been held by Friends.

Having the pen of a ready writer, she embraced many opportunities of bearing a testimony on social and religious matters, both in our own periodicals and as a correspondent with those in official stations. She also made short translations of some scriptural subjects into the Gaelic.

Our dear friend was, from early childhood, subject to serious and depressing attacks of illness, accompanied with much prostration of strength. But at these times, and even when confined to her couch, she persevered in the discharge of many of her responsibilities.

We believe there are not a few still living who can testify to the excellence and freshness of the gift with which she was entrusted, and to the edification and comfort that were realized under her ministrations. Although for some years before her death she was withdrawn from active life, yet we believe it may be said of her,

"She hath done what she could;" and we reverently trust that she is now one of those of whom it is declared, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord: yea, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labours, and their works do follow them."

Signed in and on behalf of Lisburn Monthly Meeting, held 17th of Third Month, 1892.

HOME-BOUND.

In childhood's day I dreamed of Orient splendors,—
The marble shrines of "Ind,"
The carved fountains and trees of fair Batavia,
And Ceylon's scented wind;

The sacred ground where holy feet have wandered,
Cashmere's enticing vale,
The call to prayer from the Muezzin's tower,
The Moslem's sorrow wail;

The moldering palaces of "Merry England," Italia's "fallen fanes,"
The rugged grandeur of the mighty Jungfrau,
And Russia's arid plains;

Old Scotia's mountain fastnesses and caverns,
Where hunted men did run,
That they might worship God in truth and spirit;
The land of "midnight sun,"

Too, had its charms,—the grand Ocean
That calmly rolls between
That land and ours, its surf and waves majestic,
My eyes have never seen.

Nor ever seen Niagara's thundering waters,
That 'pall the listening ear;
What am I, since it is not mine to witness
The beauties far or near?

The traveller passed by, and showers of blessings
Fell on his favored head;
He told of costly urns and mausoleums
That hold the ancient dead:

Of spices rare, of shades of sweetest fragrance,
Of fruit of yellow gold,
And how like one he rested 'neath the fig-tree,—
A "guileless" one of old.

If I should speak, no one would care to hear me,
I know of nothing more
Than daily duty, and the never-ending
Cares that are held in store.

But hark! I hear a gentle voice that whispers Obedience is best;
By walking in the way that He directeth
Thou gains eternal rest.

And is it not a service sweet and holy
To watch beside the bed,
And minister unto the suffering one,
And soothe the aching head?

The aged pilgrim leans in love confiding
Upon the filial hand;
Nor can the heart refuse the voice of duty
Or task that love demands.

And if from some thou hear a word of censure,
Who fail to understand
Thy life, remember this, that Jesus loves
The Marthas of our land.

He is Almighty, and reward is sure
To those who faithful are,
And for the burdens that thou daily finds
Strength will be given to bear.

SPRINGVILLE, IOWA.

THE COAST-GUARD.

Do you wonder what I am seeing
In the heart of the fire aglow,
Like cliffs in the golden sunset,
With a summer sea below?
I see, away to the eastward,
The line of a storm-beat coast,
And I hear the tread of the hurrying waves,
Like the tramp of a mailed host.

And up and down in the darkness,
And over the frozen sand,

I see the men of the coast-guard
Pacing along the strand,
Beaten by storm and tempest,
And drenched by the pelting rain,
From the shores of Carolina
To the wind-swept bays of Maine.

No matter what storms are raging,
No matter how wild the night,
The gleam of their swinging lanterns
Shines out with a friendly light.
And many a shipwrecked sailor
Thanks God, with his gasping breath,
For the sturdy arms of the coast-guard,
That drew him away from death.

And so, when the wind is wailing,
And the air grows dim with sleet,
I think of the fearless watchers
Pacing along their beat.
I think of a wreck, fast breaking
In the surf of a rocky shore,
And the life-boat leaping onward
To the stroke of the bending oar.

I hear the shouts of the sailors,
The boom of the frozen sail,
And the creak of the icy halyards
Straining against the gale.
"Courage!" the captain trumpets,
"They are sending help from the land!"
God bless the men of the coast-guard,
And hold their lives in his hand!

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.

BY MARY ROWLES JARVIS.

The day hath speech for all, it tells the glory
And strength of its Creator, hour by hour;
But sweeter tones take up the endless story,
When night reveals the hiding of his power;
A deeper flush on the horizon glowing,
A softer shadow on the moss-grown sod,
And, through the hush, the sound as of a going
Among the trees of God.

At his command, with splendor unabated
And eye undimmed, the warrior-sun goes down,
While the attendant cloudlets, new created
In gold and purple, wait on his renown;
He bids the mighty hand of night discover
The starry legions, till, at his behest,
Arrayed in light a myriad world watch over
This one world in its rest!

The curtains of the twilight softly falling
Where the high hills their all-night vigils keep,
The fitful twitter of the bird recalling
The madrigals of morning ere they sleep;
The field flowers folded for the night securely,
The shadows borne like dreams o'er hill and dale,
All tell of mercies long since promised surely,
Of love that cannot fail.

All day his vast and marvellous creation
Declares his power and goodness undefiled,
Then having given its evening-time oblation,
Sleeps at his footstool as a wearied child;
Amid the worlds his eye alone can number,
His watchful care sustaineth great and small;
And nightly, with a love that cannot slumber,
His rest enfoldeth all!

LESSON TAUGHT BY DAINTY CHINA—I thought of you a short time ago when I visited a factory, one of the largest in this country, where the most costly china is made. I had thought such dainty china was imported, but a friend took me to the factory in New Jersey, and I really felt while there that I was seeing sermon instead of hearing them, and the china seemed to talk to me, and I listened and have had an increased interest in china ever since. Beautiful china means to me now suffering. I shall never forget seeing it, after it had been so beautifully tinted, carried off to be burned. It was the only way. The painting would have been nothing without the burning; it would all have washed off. The colors had to be set, and that meant fire. I thought the china did not understand it, and was saying, perhaps bitterly, "What is the use of being tinted if you have to go into the oven?" It will know some day when it graces a palace, and every one exclaims, "How beautiful!" The flames did not touch it; that would have marred it. The flames were all around the oven, but not in it, though it was very hot, and the china not allowed to stay any longer than necessary. That was not the end of it; it was only the means to an end.—Ladies' Home Journal.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

One of the marked features of the country in the neighborhood of Budd's Lake is the depth to which the underlying rocks are covered with a mixture of clay, sand, gravel, and boulders. This covering, which geologists call "drift," has not been formed by the decomposition of the rocks which originally stood there but has been brought there from a distance by some foreign agency. If we go into a section of country which has not been subjected to such action, and dig down until we come to solid rock, we find that above this is a bed of earth, clay, sand, and stones, evidently formed by the decomposition of the rocks which once came to the surface, which the mechanical and chemical action of the elements have separated into their constituent parts—the stones that are interspersed being largely of quartz or other more indestructible substances which have retained their form and hardness, while the surrounding parts have been resolved into sand or clay.

This "drift," which covers the hills and valleys of the highlands of New Jersey, in place to the depth of nearly a hundred feet, is widely spread over other States of the Union, and is believed to have been placed in its present position by the action of ice in a remote age of the world, when the ice cap which now covers Greenland extended down to the middle part of New Jersey. The manner in which it planes down the surfaces over which it passes and transports huge blocks of stone and immense quantities of finer debris, is well shown in the glaciers which now exist among the Alps of Switzerland and other high mountains. The snows which fall on these mountains gradually accumulate, and the pressure hardens them into ice and forces this down the valley, with slow but irresistible motion, carrying with it rocks and earth torn from the mountain side. When it reaches a lower level, where the ice in front melts as fast as the ice behind moves forward, the end of the glacier is reached, and there will be found a pile of stones and other material which it had carried along with it. This pile of materials is called a "moraine," and the corresponding terminal moraine of the ice age is marked by a range of low hills of gravel, sand, etc., extending in a curved line from about where the railroad crosses the second trap mountain, below Orange, to the Delaware River at Belvidere. West of the Delaware the same moraine has been traced across Pennsylvania and far into the Western States. The line of this moraine, as drawn on the geological map of New Jersey, crosses the northerly end of Lake Budd. The boulders which have been brought by the ice are often of large size, and, of course, of the kind of rock that composed the ridges from which they were carried, which was often very different from that of the places where they were deposited.

met with an interesting illustration of both of these points while accompanying a friend, who kindly invited me to take a ride to Lake Hopatcong, which is a few miles to the north-east of Budd's Lake. As we were riding on the level road which runs up the valley of which Budd's Lake occupies the south end, we passed a small quarry of limestone on the roadside. I was surprised to see limestone in such a place; and on examining the geological survey of New Jersey, I find that it was merely an enormous boulder brought from a distance by the ice and surrounded by gravel and boulders of other kinds of rock. The quarrymen had made quite a hole in the ground in removing limestone, and the boulder is not yet exhausted, although the quarrying has been going on for several years.

At Stanhope, which is about three miles above the outlet of Budd's Lake, there is an iron furnace. There are several mines of iron ore in Morris County, not very distant from the furnace, but as they were not in the line of my ride, I could only gather up a specimen of the ore from the floor of the furnace. I noticed the piles of sandstone and limestone which are used to mix with the ore in such proportions as will enable the furnace men to melt the ore. Iron, although sand, lime, and clay (which is present in the ore) are each of them practically fusible by themselves, yet, when mixed in the proportions in which they will combine with each other, the mixture melts into an impure glass, which runs out of the furnace in a molten state and forms the slag which in time forms such extensive banks about furnaces that have been long in operation. At this spot arrangements have been made to utilize this slag, which, as it pours from the furnace in a liquid state, is struck by powerful jets of steam which scatter it in the form of very fine threads of glass into a room where it settles in a white mass like cotton wool. In this state it is called mineral wool, and, being incombustible, is used for packing around steam pipes and other places where it is liable to be exposed to heat.

Lake Hopatcong is about six miles long and is very irregular in its outline, although its general direction is north and south, like Budd's Lake, occupying one of the valleys which are characteristic of the New Jersey Highlands. It is a feeder of the Morris and Essex canal, which probably uses the great bulk of its outflow. We enjoyed our ride. The day was cool and pleasant, our horses lively, the roads good, and our driver accommodating. It was a matter of surprise to find the roads so level, but the explanation of this is, that they are largely laid out along the valleys and do not often climb the intermediate hills.

FROM THE "BRITISH FRIEND."

Where Are We Drifting?

The movement which took place some years ago resulting in the appointment of the Home Mission Committee, was itself the development of thoughts which had been for some time active in the Society.

Floating at first in isolated minds, they afterwards coalesced, and gained cumulative force which resulted in action. The Society of Friends in this country had for generations been gradually declining in numbers; a circumstance causing disquiet and even apprehension in many people—some alarmists going so far as to calculate the probable duration of our existence.

Prize essays had been written with a view to point out the causes of this decline; yet although many of those supposed causes had been removed, the Society showed no signs of a revival of numbers. It was very natural to conclude that something must be wrong, and no less natural that much self-examination should be made with a view to find the weak place. "We are not sufficiently faithful to our principles," said some; "we are not sufficiently aggressive," said others; and many were the suggested remedies.

That the principles we prize so highly, recommend themselves to so few of our fellow countrymen, should cause us regret, is a thing to be expected. We could not ignore the fact, nor could we be sincere in our regard for those principles, if we failed to feel their want of power to attract others.

The feeling of regret being natural and inevitable, involves no exercise of judgment, and it seems that so far we are right and cannot err in entertaining it; but it incites to the examination of causes, and the application of remedies, in which department of the question judgment becomes active and we become liable to err.

It is noteworthy that scarcely a speaker or writer among Friends makes any but the merest passing reference to the causes which lie outside the Society, although these are infinitely more potent than those which lie within it; this reticence being attributable no doubt to the feeling that besides being powerful, the former are beyond our reach and control.

If our views and practices when fairly put before others are rejected, we have no possible means of making them acceptable.

Many outside of our Society have written upon the subject of our decreasing numbers, but apparently the author is yet unborn who is to offer us any sound advice. Indeed many of the opinions to which we are treated, give evidence of so little ability to penetrate below the surface of things, that we might well suspect the soundness of any advice conveyed.

A work entitled "The Quakers," devotes a chapter to what the author calls "The Decay of Quakerism" in which he identifies "Quakerism" with the enthusiasm of its founders and the numbers who embrace it.

Finding that the fever fit has passed, and the numbers diminished, he innocently supposes these facts to mean a "decay of Quakerism."

No possible connection can be traced between numbers and Quakerism; the two ideas are essentially dissimilar and cannot be made to depend on each other in any way.

Arguments drawn from numbers intended to show the truth or untruth of a society's views have over and over again been shown to be baseless, as either not proving anything whatever, or as proving a great deal more than those who use them would admit; yet such arguments are still used by writers of a certain class.

What should we think of a man, who, when invited to consider the truth of some religious tenet, asked, "How many adherents did it gain in a given time?" and regulated his assent according to the answer?

The truth or untruth of the views and principles promulgated by our early Friends must be shown by an entirely different set of considerations.

If what our progenitors contended for be wrong and untrue, then we are in a sad condition even in our palmist days; but if right, then we are not in a sad condition now, although our numbers are not a fourth of what they were.

We read of "seven thousand men who had not bowed the knee to Baal," but we never think nor speak of them as in a sad condition; the sadness has its application elsewhere. No invidious comparison is here intended; nothing but a desire to show the absolute futility of a reference to numbers in this connection.

The unsound and illogical conceptions upon this subject to be met with in some quarters, have perhaps arisen from drawing false analogies between organisms and societies.

An organism deprived of any of its parts is more or less weakened, and it may be thought by some that a society which has suffered a loss of its members must be affected in a similar way.

The cases are not parallel.

The parts of an organism have each a function or functions to perform, and if one part be removed another cannot do its work so well; perhaps cannot do it at all. Leaves cannot do the work of roots, nor roots of bark. Brain cannot do the work of lungs, nor lungs of heart; each has its appointed work, and can do no other, therefore if one be removed the consequences are serious.

But each member of a society is a complete unit, and may perform many functions of the body; so that a society numbering 20,000 may exhibit quite as much life, or perhaps more, than one that could count 100,000. We ought also to be careful not to follow thoughtless writers, and mistake enthusiasm for life, because they are absolutely different things.

The former has accompanied the rise of most, if not all religions, but has rarely lasted more than one or two generations, and when it has subsided, the things that called it forth remain true or false as the case might be, and the life as real and strong. There are many Friends now who are as truly devoted to their principles as ever George Fox was, yet have none of his enthusiasm.

It has already been remarked that the decline in our numbers naturally causes us regret. Why? Is the regret on account of ourselves or of others? Surely of others and of them only.

Whether we be few or many we enjoy all our privileges the same. Our worship results in the same spiritual strengthening; our attachment to the Head of our Church, and regard for his example and precepts, bring with them the same effects on character, as if our numbers were ten or a hundred fold what they are. But rightly or wrongly we think we are enjoying advantages which others have not, and we have no wish to make a monopoly of them.

We therefore desire to see our numbers increase.

There are two and only two legitimate ways to set about effecting this desired object.

One is by example, and the other by precept. An increased faithfulness to our principles will be the best evidence of their value to us that we can show to others; and extended promulgation of them the best means of showing we desire others to share them.

If both these means fail and the outside world is unable to see or appreciate or assimilate our principles, we have nothing left to do but regret it and persevere.

Other means, however, are being tried. Our form of worship is being modified, and we are adopting in a few instances the institution of paid Pastors.

It must be evident to the mind of any one who thinks at all, that if these means succeed where the others have failed, any resulting increase of members will be an increase of members merely, not of strength; for the gain must necessarily be at the expense of some of our principles.

These methods also are calculated to discriminate between the more thoughtful and the less thoughtful people; to exclude the former and to gain the latter.

The more thoughtful will ask, "Are these the descendants of people who prized their religious practices so highly that they were willing to lose property and even life rather than relinquish them?"

"If so the continued strong advocacy of them in pamphlets and otherwise betrays some want of sincerity: we do not feel drawn by that."

The less thoughtful are not so fastidious, and will merely consider that our practices are extended over an area which embraces them.

Jonathan Dymond has well shown that there are certain things a man may not do, even to save his life; and it looks as if we were now inclined to yield points which our early Friends defended at the expense of theirs; yet it is difficult to see any counterbalancing gain, except it is to be found in an increase of members.

This brings us face to face with a very important consideration, one which lies at the root of the whole matter.

We desire that our numbers should increase for the reasons above stated; but the sole thing besides which we ought to desire is that our influence should be strong, and make itself felt over as wide a radius as possible.

To break down our hedges that others may step in is not strictly to increase our numbers; it is to form a new Society—to make in fact a bad amalgam, the parts of which will not cohere, but which, on the contrary, will be likely to illustrate the weakness of the "house divided against itself." We shall have gained nothing in that direction, but lost much in another.

Having shown by our actions that many things the Society has always thought to be of extreme importance are thought so no longer, some will congratulate us on having taken a step in the right direction; but they will not be the leading minds of the community; they will be simply those towards whom we have moved.

Thinking people will ask themselves, if these things were ever so important as we professed to believe, why are they not so now, and especially why do we still, as a Society, uphold them with one hand and throw them down with the other? Space will not permit me to trace and show the severe loss of influence all this must bring with it, but any one can work the problem out for himself.

We shall exhibit something of the weakness of a certain political orator, who is said to have concluded an address to his constituents with these words, "Gentlemen, those are my sentiments; if you don't like them they can be changed;" a mode of concluding not calculated to inspire either respect or confidence.

Put this tersely, and the unwisdom of such a proceeding is at once apparent; but carry out the policy by slow steps, and the minds of many being thus gradually prepared, will fail to see any impropriety.

WM. HEATON.

WERE a man sent out with sealed orders, and told that he must be ready for a recall any moment, would it not be folly to establish himself like a long resident, in a house with great preparations for the future? And are we not sent into this world liable any moment to be recalled by the Power that sent us here?

Some Curious facts With Regard to the Peculiarities of Snakes.—Most Americans who have heard the rattlesnake's rattle, will recognize the truth of the description given by a writer in the April "Quarterly Review" that it is like the sound which would be produced by the rattling of a number of peas in a paper bag. This represents the slowness of the sound. We are accustomed to pictorial representations in which the reptile is made to look very angry and energetic, the tail erect in a manner to suggest a loud alarm. Accordingly when one hears it for the first time, one is surprised to find the noise so slight. The sound, instead of being a rattle, is rather a tinkle, and it perhaps has a rather more metallic character than the notion of the shaking of peas in a paper bag would represent. But slight as the sound is, the person who has never met one of these reptiles before and who, without seeing the snake, hears, for the first time, among mountain rocks or prairie grass, its delicate yet wonderfully distinct warning, knows instantly who and what his neighbor is.

The pit vipers, to which family the rattlesnake belongs, are venomous no matter where found. The Indian pit vipers, which, like our American pit vipers, the copperhead and the moccasin, have no rattles, are poisonous. They are robust and short-bodied snakes, in this respect resembling our Western rattler, but they live mostly in trees and cause very few deaths. The pit vipers are so called because they have on either side of the snout, between the eye and the nostril, a deep pit, the use or origin of which mark is unknown. The rattlesnake exists throughout the American continent from the Canadas to Patagonia.

When the "Quarterly" writer says that snake charmers always extract the fangs of the cobra, we presume that he does not refer to snake charmers in India, for it is understood that Indian snake charmers perform with unmutated cobras. Of course these creatures, when under the hands of the charmer, they move erect with distended hood, do not go through the evolutions of a "dance," but follow and try to bite the hands which provoke them. It is to the cobra is mainly due the fearful Indian mortality from snake bite of 20,000 people a year. And yet the cobra is not aggressive. There is at least one Indian snake which is far more dangerous than the cobra, although fortunately less common. This is the hamadryad, so named, we presume, from its being found in trees. This is said to be the largest and most dangerous poisonous snake known, with the possible exception of the bushmaster of Brazil. It is sometimes fourteen feet long. This story, if true, may give some notion of its disposition. An intelligent Burman told Dr. Mason that a friend of his had recently tumbled upon a nest of these snakes, and that an old female gave chase. The man fled far and wide over hill and dale and at last plunged into a river, hoping that on the other side he should escape his furious enemy. When he reached the other side, the hamadryad emerged from the river and rushed upon him. The man bethought himself of his turban and flung it at the serpent, which darted upon it and for some moments wreaked vengeance upon it with furious bites, and then departed.—New York Times.

Raising Skunks for Their Fur.—Luther Michael, of Smithfield, has gone into the novel business of raising skunks. He began this year with 130 skunks in a fifteen-acre enclosure, and not counting the old and young, he has something like 800 of the odoriferous animals. He expects to enlarge the enclosure to 100 acres, and leave the skunks undisturbed for four years, the end of which time he counts on having between 40,000 and 50,000 skunks. He will then kill many for their skins. He has been in the fur business for years, and evidently knows what he is about. The skunks are fed and looked after carefully every day. They have become tame and quite neighborly, though none have yet been domesticated as pets.—The Public Ledger.

Plants.—A paper in the "Proceedings of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia on the nature of annual plants, shows that there is no constitutional difference between annual and perennial plants, and the question between the two classes is wholly one of nutrition. The excessive seed bearing in an annual is exhaustive, and the plant dies. If annual plants are prevented from flowering, they live an indefinite number of years. On the other hand perennials are in a sense annuals. They send out new buds instead of new seeds, and then old portions die. The potato is used in illustration. Every part of the potato dies annually, the tubers newly produced alone continue the plant.

Modern Scientific Warfare as Affecting Peace.—Modern scientific means of warfare are tending to eliminate from international conflicts the opportunities of personal bravery and heroism which the past have especially invested the warrior's career with a glamor and romance so attractive to the populace, to the poet, and to the historian. Instead of stirring scenes of hand-to-hand fight a few serried battalions in closely drawn combat, the awful artillery and far-reaching explosives of recent invention will enable armies to destroy each other whilst miles apart and at such distances in great degree, to render the combatants mutually invisible, or at least to make the particular effort of individual action imperceptible to the bystander. And as the chances of proving personal claims to valor become fewer and fewer, the soldier's life will lose much of its charm for the multitude.

The cool manipulation of electric weapons at vast distance from their victims, and the wholesale destruction of multitudes, by dynamite or by other new and terrible forces, directed from afar, by unseen operators, will at once intensify the dread and diminish the attractiveness of soldiery.

Opium Trade.—The Pope has issued a decree forbidding absolutely the use or manufacture of opium, or the trade therein, by Roman Catholics in China. "The use of opium," he says, "as existing in China is held by the Church to be a detestable abuse, and therefore illicit." It can only be used medicinally.

"A Shocking Proposal."—It is stated that the Passion Play, as performed at Oberammergau, in Bavaria, is to be made a feature of the Chicago Exhibition of next year. On this the Sun says editorially:

The whole Christian world must be shocked at the report from Chicago that the "Passion Play" as performed at Oberammergau, in Bavaria, is to be made a feature of the Chicago Exhibition next year. It is not possible that the Christian people of the United States will tolerate a thing of this kind. The very suggestion of it must fill them with amazement and horror. The "Passion Play" as solemnly performed under appropriate circumstances and amid becoming surroundings before worshipful assembly in the secluded Bavarian village of Oberammergau, is an impressive spectacle. But the hideous notion of performing it in Chicago as one of the attractive shows of the Exhibition, what damnable blasphemy is this! What outrage upon American Christians of every creed! What a shock to every reverent soul, to every ver in Him who was sacrificed in the awful tragedy of Calvary!

To every word of the above we say Amen, and with it in the further declaration that every Catholic Priest and Protestant minister in the land could raise his voice against it, and that any attempt to carry out this sacrilegious project will elicit a shudder in every Christian home, every church and Sunday-school, and every pious soul. A carnival of Sabbath breaking, rum, and blasphemy, under National auspices, is now threatened to the honor of this land of promise and its discoverer! Christian Advocate.

Barmitzvah.—The Jewish law commands the father of a child to take the full responsibility for every sin of the child from his birthday to the day of his thirteenth year. With the entrance of the fourteenth year his boy becomes barmitzvah, a son of commandment, bar meaning son, and mitzvah man. He takes upon himself the responsibility to fulfil the whole duty of the Jewish law, to be a religious man or a sinner, to be rewarded or punished by God, happy or unhappy, and being in this day barmitzvah, the father is redeemed from all the responsibility, and by its celebration thanks God that He has redeemed him from accountability of sin-doing by his son. On such occasions the boys make a little speech. Any of them are intelligent enough to do this without help. Here is one that was made by a boy in Patterson, N. J., not long ago:—My dear parents and friends: To-day I have arrived at that important station of my life when, becoming barmitzvah, "a son of the commandment," I take upon myself the obligations of the Jewish law. To-day I proclaim with heart and soul, in this holy place and in presence of this congregation, the unity of God. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord is our God, the Lord is one." To-day I am happy to acknowledge myself as one of the community of Israel. To-day I turn over an entirely new leaf in the history of my life. But, believe me, that it is my earnest desire to remain a faithful son of Israel, and that, as I enter day into the congregation of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, I will try to prove by my good deeds that I truly deserve to claim fellowship with the people of Israel. O, dear parents, can I ever forget all you have done for me? May God bless you, my relatives and friends and this entire congregation, now and forever. Amen.—Christian Advocate.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 20, 1892.

We have been interested and pleased with the remarks made in the United States Congress by W. S. Holman, a representative from Indiana, in opposition to the increase of the United States Navy. He shows that our war vessels already number over one hundred, that since the year of Third Month 1885, fifteen have been added to the number, that twenty-eight additional vessels have been authorized which are not completed; that the appropriations for the navy for the present year are more than $2,000,000, and yet there is a demand for more vessels! The demand of the "Policy Board" for the construction of our American Navy involved an expenditure of $349,000,000, according to the estimates of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs.—When these vessels are constructed and placed in commission there must be a greatly increased number of men and officers, and a corresponding increase of expense. While this while we are in a state of perfect peace with the whole world.

But besides the expensiveness of a navy, W. S. Holman argues that its increase would certainly be followed by a corresponding increase in the land forces—"The same drift of opinion among public men in the two Houses of Congress in favor of a great navy will render the other step inevitable, a great army. They are connected inevitably together in a nation bordering on the high seas, both equally express the absolutism of physical force in government. Standing armies and great navies are the instruments of power which have cursed the world for centuries."

While we sympathize with the view expressed by the representative from Indiana, yet the moral bearings of the subject seem to us, still more important. So long as the United States Government is controlled by that Christian principle, which leads it to treat all with justice and kindness, we have no fears of its being drawn into war with other nations. Its isolated geographical situation frees it from many of the sources of dispute which have led to quarrels among the nations of Europe; and it has grown to be so powerful a nation, that no one among them would be likely to assail it. The silken chains of commerce, which tend to bind together in common interests, peoples widely separated from each other, are constantly growing stronger. But if we should unhappily permit the growing up of a large body of people amongst us, whose business is war, who have little to engage their attention in times of peace, and whose hopes of fame and profit are intimately connected with military operations, we shall be cherishing an element of great danger to the perpetuity of our peace and prosperity. The military instinct leads those actuated by it to crush their opponents by violence, instead of removing causes of dispute by kind treatment and conciliatory explanations. Like Job's horse, they "smell the battle afar off," and are disposed to aggravate every occasion of difference, and to rejoice in conflicts which may open up to them the way to acquire distinction and wealth. So that we believe it a truth which may confidently be stated, that the effect of military preparations is, not to secure peace, but to provoke war.

Nor, in the consideration of this subject, must we omit a reference to the protecting power of the Ruler of the Universe, who is abundantly able to care for and protect those who trust in Him.

Notwithstanding the many millions that have been invested in our navy, we believe the United States would be in a better position, and it would be to its pecuniary advantage, if every war vessel and all the armor in its possession were to be destroyed by dry rot, rust, or other natural agencies,—provided that the people would remain contented with this condition of affairs, and not seek to replace the ruined vessels and guns.

The four Memorials for deceased Friends, that were approved by the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia in the Fourth Month, last, have been published in a neat pamphlet of forty pages, which may be obtained of Jacob Smedley, at the Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia—price ten cents.

We have no doubt that many of those who knew and valued these dear Friends, will be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity of procuring these brief accounts of their lives and characters.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Treasurer of the World's Fair, at Chicago, has received a bid of $4,000,000 for the $2,500,000 in souvenir half dollars voted by Congress. The bidder is Leo A. Alton, of that city. Bids of $150 for the first of the souvenir coins minted has also been made.

The United States Minister to Mexico has made a report to the State Department showing that in 1891 more American steamers entered the Mexican ports than those of all other nations of the world combined.

A special train carrying twenty millions in gold from San Francisco arrived in New York on the morning of the 9th inst., and the coin was transferred to the vaults in the Sub-treasury building without accident.

On the 12th inst. silver bullion sold in New York for 82 cents, and in London for 37½ cents per ounce. These prices are the lowest ever recorded, and the bullion of the U.S. silver dollar is now only 63½ cents.

The figures on South Dakota's prospective yield, given out by competent men, range from 50,000,000 to 60,000,000 bushels of wheat, besides immense quantities of other grains.

A Topeka despatch says that in some of the counties of Kansas the corn crop will be the largest in years, while the yield of wheat will be "the largest ever known in the State."

According to a San Antonio despatch, the recent rains in Mexico have so enhanced the value of the corn crop in that country that Texas farmers are beginning to be anxious about a market for their abundant crop.

A New Orleans despatch says the strict enforcement of the Anti-Lottery law, and the consequent exclusion of lottery matter from the mails, has reduced the revenues of the Post Office $103,000 per annum.

The New Orleans Times-Democrat says it costs the saloons of New York $500,000 a year to replace their broken glasses.

The switchmen employed in Buffalo on the New York, Lake Erie and Western, the Lehigh Valley and the Buffalo Creek Railroad are out on strike for higher wages and a 10-hour day. The switchmen are those employed to couple cars, make up and send out trains, and in a general way perform the work around the yards. They are not, as the name would seem to imply, those who turn the switches. A number of freight cars were derailed and several incendiary fires started in the freight yard of the Lehigh Valley road, and a number of loaded cars were burnt. Many others were wrecked. On the 15th inst. two militia companies were ordered to Buffalo, the Sheriff being unable to control the rioters.

A number of armed miners went to Inman, a mining camp of the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railway Company, on a branch of the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis Railroad, on the 15th inst., captured 282 convicts and 27 guards, and sent them by rail to Nashville. A force of guards sent to reinforce the guard at Inman were on the way at the time, but their train was stopped by a force of miners. There was no conflict at Inman, and none of the company's property was destroyed. The Sheriff telegraphed to Governor Buchanan that he was utterly powerless, either to protect the property or to bring any of the members of the mob to justice. The Governor called out the local militia.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 504, being 191 less than the previous week, and 28 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 270 were males and 234 females; 140 were under one year of age; 78 died of cholera infantum; 39 of consumption; 27 of marasmus; 26 of diseases of the heart; 22 of old age; 20 of inanition; 18 of diphtheria; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of cancer; 14 of convulsions; 13 of pneumonia; 13 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 12 of casualties; 11 of dysentery; 10 of Bright's disease; and 7 drowned.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 115½ a 116½; currency 6's, 106½ a 117½.

COTTON was quiet but steady, on a basis of 7½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, at $16.50 a $17.50; spring bran, in bulk, spot, $15.50 a $16.00.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.25 a $2.50; do., extras, $2.75 a $3.10; No. 2 winter family, $3.25 a $3.65; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $4.00 a $4.30; Western winter, clear, $3.75 a $4.10; do. do., straight, $4.00 a $4.30; winter patent, $4.40 a $4.75; Minnesota, clear, $3.35 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.85 a $4.35; do., patent, $4.50 a $4.75; do. favorite brands, higher. Rye flour sold in a small way at $3.75 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 80½ a 81 cts.

HOGS continue dull and high.

FOREIGN.—William E. Gladstone having been summoned by the Queen of England to the Isle of Wight to form a new ministry, has proceeded to that island.

A despatch from London, dated the 15th inst., states that a British ship named the Thracian, the building of which has just been completed at Glasgow, and which was being towed to Liverpool, has been lost off the Isle of Man. Her crew of 21 men, also the captain and his wife, went down with the steamer.

The British ship North, Captain Newson, at Sligo, from Portland, Oregon, reports that on Sixth Month 11th, in latitude 44 S., longitude 47 W., she passed two enormous icebergs, while many more were visible ahead. The North sailed parallel with a solid ice barrier, the bergs ranging from 20 to 200 feet in height, while the open water was filled with great quantities of broken ice. At 10 o'clock on the night of Sixth Month 11th, the vessel was entirely surrounded by ice, and it was feared that she would be crushed, but fortunately toward morning the wind changed, and this enabled her to clear the bergs. She had many remarkable escapes from destruction. The bergs formed a breakwater 50 miles long. This report of the North bears out the reports from other vessels from around Cape Horn, that the ice drift from the Antarctic Ocean this season is unprecedented, and that it has reached the most northerly point ever known.

An outbreak of phylloxera is reported in the Avize-Crament district of France, the vineyards of which are among the finest in Champagne.

The Independence Belge has a report of an uprising of Arabs in Central Africa, who object to the suppression of the slave trade. Whole tribes are in insurrection, and a number of whites have been killed in a conflict. There are fears for the two anti-slavery expeditions and the missions.

A special despatch to the London Times from Calcutta says that the leading papers there, in view of the alarming fall in the rates of exchange, urge the Government to immediately close the mints to the free coinage of silver. They complain that the Government is doing nothing to face the great crisis.

The cholera returns from the whole of Russia for the 11th inst. show a large increase in the number of new cases, as well as in the mortality. There were reported 9,177 new cases and 5,009 deaths. The official report shows that throughout the cholera-infested districts of Russia, the daily average is 8,601 new cases and 4,288 deaths from the disease. The disease is in St. Petersburg; as many as 300 deaths a day were reported for several days.

At Tabriz, capital of the Province of Azerbaijan, in Northern Persia, cholera is raging with the most fatal effect. The city contains about 175,000 inhabitants, and they are dying at a frightful rate. Every day the deaths amount to several hundreds, and the disease shows no signs of diminution in its violence.

A despatch from Simla says another collision has occurred on the Nezetach Pamir between Afghans and Russians. No particulars of the encounter have as yet been received.

The rumor is reported in Gilgat that China has ceded the Pamirs to Russia.

A Simla despatch says: The revolt of the Hazara tribes in Afghanistan becomes more serious daily, and many of the great tribes have now combined their forces against the Ameer, who is collecting all his resources to put down the rebellion. In addition to 20,000 regular troops and an equal force of irregulars, the Ameer is trying to raise further levies by holding out to the loyal tribesmen promises of great reward if they will assist him to combat the revolting Hazaras. Among other things, the Ameer holds out the prospect that in event of the subjugation of the rebels, the country will be divided between the tribesmen who assist him. These promises and the prospect of getting possession of Hazaraland have induced many of the tribesmen to join the standard of the Ameer.

It is reported here that the Ameer is anxious to meet General Sir Frederick Roberts, who, with a large detachment of troops, has been despatched by the Indian Government to meet the Ameer at Jellalabad. This mission is accompanied by a political agent, and its main object is to arrange plans with the Ameer against internal foes and against the advance of Russia in Afghanistan, which is the road to India. It is also reported that in view of the despatch of general reports, the Ameer will publish generally throughout Afghanistan that the Viceroy of India has sent him and a large force of British troops to his assistance.

A local scientist says that one of the most wonderful discoveries of recent years is that made by a poor blacksmith of Quebec, named Ferdinand Allard. It is the long lost art, known to the Pyramid builders of Egypt, of hardening copper. Axes and other edged tools made of hardened copper have been exhibited by him, which in edge and temper rival the best steel of the present day.

At a meeting of the Dominion Cabinet, held on the 13th inst., at Premier Abbott's residence, in Montreal, it was decided "to make a proposition to the United States Government assuring it that Canada was desirous of having most friendly relations, and that, in order to avoid all difficulties, the rebate on grain passing through the St. Lawrence canals be withdrawn at the end of the present season of navigation." An effort will then be made to have a conference between the two Governments for the adjustment of all differences.

DIED, at their residence, Norwich, Ont., Canada, the 3d of Eighth Month, 1892, ASENATH H. CLAYTON, wife of Joshua Clayton, and daughter of the late Joseph and Margaret Heacock, of Greenwood, Columbia County, Pa., aged nearly sixty-six years. A member of Norwich Monthly and Particular Meetings of Friends. She bore a lingering illness of heart disease with patient resignation to the Divine will, and passed away in a peaceful state of mind. Her family and friends have the consoling belief that their loss is an eternal gain.

—, at his residence, near Cardington, Moravia County, Ohio, ZENAS WORTHINGTON, eldest son of the late Jacob and Lydia Worthington, of Moravia County Ohio, on the 14th of Second Month, 1892, the fortieth year of his age. He lost his right in society by marrying contrary to Discipline when about twenty-two; after which he seemed to take but little interest in religion, never joining himself to any nomination. On the 17th of Seventh Month, 1891, he was thrown from his wagon, and struck by it in such a way as to break his back. From that time to his death he was entirely helpless, suffering as but few persons are called on to suffer. From the first, he thought he would not recover, and his earnest prayer was that his Heavenly Father would spare his life until he could feel the full assurance of a happy eternity; and he was mercifully spared to leave his friends that assurance. In speaking of a ministering friend who visited him during his sickness, he said: "I fully shut myself off from such influences, and how I regret it now!" At another time, "I wanted badly to die a member of Society." A few days before his death, he said: "Tell everybody to prepare for eternity while in health, and not leave it as I have done, for such a bed of suffering. Through all my life I have never done anything wrong that I did not feel the gentle reproof; but I did not heed the reproof." He several times spoke of believing his accident to be providential, and desired that whether life or death be his portion, it should be to the glory of God.

For "THE FRIEND."

Inward Revelation the Primary Rule.

The editorial in THE FRIEND of Seventh month 9th, starts anew the question which it may be profitable to consider at this time; as what is meant by the "primary and secondary rule of faith" as used by early Friends? In the presentation and defense of this doctrine William Penn adhered almost entirely to arguments drawn from Scripture. But Robert Barclay, whom even casual readers know, puts his arguments after the manner of formal logic; in most of his propositions on this subject in the forms of philosophy. Many of his terms, "self-evident," "formal object," "primary" and "secondary," "subjective" and "objective" common principles," "original truths" and a priori and a posteriori," are strictly philosophical, and without understanding them as such, we fail to understand his meaning.

Attention is again called to this phase of the original statement of Quakerism, under a feeling that it may help to broaden the view and deepen the regard of some thoughtful young Friends for the principles of Friends by giving a higher sense of the great value of the doctrine of Inward Revelation in the solution of the great problems concerning religion and morality, and the relationship of man to God, now claiming the attention of the most advanced thought in religion and philosophy.

The literature of Friends during the heated agitation of this century shows no trace of any proper recognition of this philosophical aspect of original Quakerism, and its remarkable bearing on some of the questions at issue. But though overlooked by our own people, it has attracted the attention of some most eminent men outside our Society.

Carlisle said of George Fox, "If De Alembert asserts Diogenes was the greatest man of antiquity, surely George Fox by stronger reasons was the greatest of the moderns. He was one to whom under pure form the Divine idea of the universe was pleased to manifest itself and shine through unspeakable awfulness and unspeakable beauty in his soul." And he speaks of his mission as a more "remarkable event in modern history than the Diet of Worms or the battle of Austerlitz"—Sartor Resartus, 163.

Noah Porter said Quakerism is stated "in the philosophical dictum and method of a Christianized Platonism"—Appendix Uberweg's History of Philosophy. But no other modern writer has given such care to the analysis of the System of Faith of George Fox as Bancroft, the great American Historian. He says that when George Fox taught that "truth was to be sought by listening to the voice of God in the soul, it was the same principle for which Socrates died and Plato suffered." "That the voice in the heart of George Fox as he kept sheep on the hills of Nottingham, was the spirit which had been the good genius of Socrates." That "the Quaker doctrine is philosophy summoned from the cloister and the college, and planted among the most despised of the people." That "the method of the Quaker coincided with that of Descartes and Leibnitz, who founded their systems on consciousness; but Descartes drifted to the sea of hypothesis on the barren waves of ontological being; and Leibnitz lost his way among the monads of creation. But the illiterate Quaker starting from the same point of philosophy attended strictly to his method, and never ventured to sea except with the certain guidance of the cynosure in the heart." That "it was wonderful to witness the energy and unity of mind and character which the strong perception of speculative truth imparted to illiterate mechanics." For with unconscious sagacity they developed the system of moral truth which they believed existed as an incorruptible seed in every soul.—History of the United States, Vol. II., Ch. 16.

When George Fox saw in the "invisible power of God how all men were enlightened by the Divine light of Christ" (Fox's Jour. p. 16), he by insight passed beyond the induction of Bacon and the sensationalism of Hobbs or Locke, and reached the end and foundation of the true philosophy of Christianity for his beginning, by recognizing the inward revelations of the Divine power in man, as the a priori of all spiritual intuition.

Guided by the fundamental principle of George Fox, Robert Barclay announced its application to the solution of the problems of faith, knowledge and life. With almost prophetic discernment, he avoided the skeptical idealism of Berkeley and Hume; and the atheistic materialism of Priestley and Mill and Spencer; and anticipated the intuitional philosophy of Reid and Kant by almost a hundred years.

These propositions of Barclay contain the most spiritual conception of the genesis and process of the Divine work in human consciousness, expressed in the forms of philosophy, ever made among men. And it ought to humble the minds of all who love the truth to know that at this time the Christian philosophers of the world are mostly in agreement with almost all of Barclay's philosophical propositions.

In the Thesis to the 2nd Proposition of the Apology, Barclay affirms that the inward revelations which he makes the foundation of knowledge and faith, are self-evident; as philosophy teaches in regard to the intuitions. He says, "This Divine revelation and inward illumination is that which is evident and clear of itself, forcing by its own evidence and clearness the well disposed understanding to assent; irresistibly moving the same thereunto even as the common principles of natural truths do move and incline the mind to natural assent, as that the whole is greater than the part." In short, we know these revelations just as the mind knows natural intuitions.

In Barclay's reply to the students of Aberdeen, is a comparative statement of the distinction he makes between these inward revelations and the Scriptures. It answers the question, why the inward revelations are called primary and the Scriptures secondary, in philosophical language so clear that to deny his position is equivalent to taking the position of materialistic atheism that there are no spiritual intuitions, or inward revelations in the soul. He says, "That we know the Scriptures' testimony by the spirit tantum a priori as we know the effect by the cause; and we know the spirit's testimony by the Scriptures' tantum a posteriori as we know the cause by the effect; because the objective evidence of the spirit is SELF-EVIDENT and PRIMARY, the objective evidence of the Scriptures is but DERIVED and SECONDARY—Works, 608.

In Proposition 2nd of the Apology, Barclay says, "The spirit is that alone by which the true knowledge of God can be revealed; by the immediate manifestation and revelation of God, enlightening and opening the understanding; subjectively helping us to discern truths, and objectively presenting them to our minds as the formal object of the saint's faith."

In the language of Barclay's philosophy, these inward revelations are the "primary rule of faith, and the foundation of all true knowledge of Divine things," because they are "self-evident" like natural intuitions; and the Scriptures are not so; because they are from a Divine spring, as a priori causes, or sources of knowledge which arise within us and are seen by insight; while the Scriptures, without these inward intuitions, are only outward testimony derived through the outward senses as other outward testimony.

When Robert Barclay thus makes these inward revelations the true basis for faith, and the foundation of all true Divine knowledge, he makes the highest possible application of that which Bancroft calls the "speculative truth" of Quakerism.

It was not until Hume, with his daring speculations, by applying to religion both the theory of Locke, "that there is nothing in the mind but what enters it by the outward senses," and that of Berkeley, "that nothing exists but the ideas of things that thus enter the mind," and had thus cut away the foundations of knowledge and faith, that philosophy was driven upon the ground of Barclay, and constrained to recognize the intuitions in consciousness as the foundation of all knowledge. When Kant and Reid recognized not only the natural intuitions, but also those of the moral law, they laid in philosophy the foundation for a most wonderful revolution in religious thought. The far-reaching words of Kant, "that the categorical imperative of the moral law is the light of all our seeing" seem, in tones of scientific prophecy, to echo the words of Paul, that "that which might be known of God was manifest in them." This great German philosopher said, "Two things fill my soul with always new and increasing wonder and awe, and often and persistently my thought busies itself therewith, the starry heavens above me, and the moral law within me."—The Practical Reason.

These sublime words of Kant are imbedded as no other words are in modern philosophy, for they are quoted approvingly by Joseph Cook, Dr. McCosh, Sir William Hamilton, Professor Harris, Farrar, Diman, Porter and Hermann Lotze. The intuitional philosophy of Kant is now victorious, for the fact of the moral intuitions is now accepted by every school of philosophy. Joseph Cook says, "Germany has gone back to Kant, and dares to build no metaphysical structure except on his foundations or their equivalents." Samuel Harris, Professor of Divinity in Yale University, in his late great work on the "Self Revelation of God," says philosophy in Great Britain and America is of late using consciousness as "the light of all our seeing."—P. 31. And Tulloch says there is not a school of philosophy except those who deny all reality that does not now accept the intuitional philosophy.—Theism, p. 317. Even Herbert Spencer, the high priest of materialism, says in his "Data of Ethics," that there are "certain fundamental moral intuitions" "responding to right and wrong."—P. 120.

To name those who, on this fundamental fact of the moral intuition, are in unity with Barclay's philosophy, is to call the roll of the greatest philosophers of this century. In our own land the list embraces the names of McCosh and Harris, and Havens, Porter, Diman, Bowne and Winchell.

It was only when driven by Hume's skeptical philosophy, to seek a new basis for knowledge, that these moral intuitions came to be recognized as a universal fact in all humanity; and now again it is by the effort of Mill and Spencer to account for them by evolution, that philosophy has been driven to search deeper and deeper into the hidden springs of these intuitions; until now it is almost universally conceded that they arise within man by the immediate revelation of the spirit of God in all men.

Harris says, "it has been overlooked by theologians; that it is the teaching of Scripture and philosophy; that it is primarily God who seeks man, not primarily man who seeks God."—Self Revelation of God, 31-57.

Max Muller condemns theologians who overlook the great fact of the primary intuition of God in all men. He says that "he knows of no heresy more dangerous than the denial that a true concept of God is within reach of every human being as the common inheritance of mankind." And "that its recognition by theologians may produce as great a revolution in our world of thought as the Copernican System did in Astronomy."—Physical Religion, p. 331.

Theologians, because of the power of denominational creeds, have been slow to admit or accept the full force or value of the moral intuitions. The first great theologian to accept the moral intuitions of Kant and apply them as Barclay applies them to Christian doctrine and experience, was Schleiermacher, of the University of Berlin. Harris says of him, "In Schleiermacher, theology turned its face toward the sunrise, and has ever since been advancing with the light of the Sun of Righteousness on its brow."—Self Revelation of God, p. 141.

But the greatest name among theologians who built on this doctrine was Julius Muller. Joseph Cook says of him, "He looked upon the revelations in the constitutional intuitions. He explored conscience. He brought to light the surface of the rock of intuitive moral truth. He built around its edge after the plan shown in the adamant. To-day Germany calls him her greatest theologian, because it has found that the rising walls of Muller's building are seen to be contemporaneous with the foundations of the Celestial City floating above, and the walls of the two palaces are one."—Transcendentalism, p. 67.

In order to open the way for the reception of Quakerism, and show that it represented the highest Christian thought of the ages preceding its proclamation by George Fox, Robert Barclay and William Penn make nearly one thousand quotations from ancient philosophers, the Fathers of the Primitive Church, Church Councils and religious writers which had preceded them. It is for a like purpose that the following quotations from philosophers and theologians, since their time, are here given.

On the office of the spiritual intuitions, and the inadequacy of the Scriptures alone in the conception of spiritual Truth the testimony in support of Barclay that the spirit is the primary rule is very clear.

Harris says, "It is only [by] the imprint of truth on the heart that it becomes truly legible. Without this inward imprint, the Bible, indeed every sort of truth, leaves the heart as dry as an arid desert. But when a psalm, a passage or a text, a poem, a golden apophthegm, a deep principle, or some lesson of sorrow or other experience of life is flashed as Divine light in the inmost soul, it ever afterward seems as a window opening into the Unseen, through which God's glory shines."—Self Revelation of God, p. 115.

Schleiermacher.—"The feeling from which religion springs is the feeling of supreme power by which man discovers the existence of God. It is not reason, or letter, or text, it is the touchstone by which dogma must be tried."—Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia, Art. Schleiermacher.

Sir William Hamilton.—"It is only as a spark of divinity glows as the life of our life in us that we can rationally believe in an intelligent creator and moral governor of the universe."—Lectures, p. 22.

August Dorner.—"Ethics is not a historical science, no merely external authority, however venerable, can be the immediate source of knowledge for it; not the Holy Scriptures, still less the Church. The material given by the Church and the Holy Scriptures must first be appropriated spiritually."—Christian Ethics, p. 51.

Dr. McCosh.—"There is nothing in the mind till the intuitions are in energy. Truths seen by intuition shine by their own light like the luminary of day, and any attempt to make them clearer, is like going out with a taper to see the sun. The argument for deity built on the conviction of the moral law is the strongest of all, Kant yielded to it, and Chalmers dwelt on it."—Intuitions of the Mind, pp. 77, 297.

Harris.—"It is a law of the mind that it cannot comprehend in thought what it has never known in intuition. The knowledge of spiritual things begins in intuitions which are known in their self-evidence. The action of the Spirit of God is primarily on and in the human spirit. The true ground of spiritual faith is the witness of the spirit, and the witness itself is spiritual."—Self-Revelation of God, pp. 31-35, 40-57, 117, 209.

James Martineau.—"Insight passes into self-evidence. Revealed religion is simply co-extensive with human intuition."—Seat of Authority in Religion, pp. 323-449.

"To enter on self-denial as a work, or with any purpose short of inward communion and love to God, inspired by insight, is to turn the moral problem of life into a sham, and introduce a dry rot into life."—Types of Ethical Theory, vol. 2, p. 269.

Hermann Lotze, regarded by many as the greatest living German philosopher, says: "Impressions of religious faith are comparable to intuitive sense perception, and are often confirmed to us by immediate revelation. As the physical stimuli by which we have impressions of color; so may the faith impressions be from direct Divine operation within our hearts. Thus, faith would be an intuition of the super-sensible facts revealed to us by this operation. Much of the inner life of the believing heart must remain purely subjective experience, uncommunicable to any—just living emotions superior to all forms of knowledge, a wealth of inner experience."—Microcosmos, p. 662.

Tulloch.—"The science of the Divine originates in a divine intuition, which guarantees its own content. It is the spiritual eye by which we look out on the spiritual world. The primary data of Philosophy is the breath of a higher and diviner reason."—Rational Theology in the 17th Century, vol. II, p. 148.

Such is the surpassingly beautiful, varied and powerful testimony of modern theology and Philosophy witnessing to the great fundamental principle of inward revelations, self-evident in themselves as the primary rule of faith; and also that, without these intuitions, the Bible is inadequate as a foundation of spiritual faith. But the testimony to the intuitions of conscience and the universality of the moral law is an inward revelation from God, is even more wonderful than what we have just seen.

James Martineau says: "In the present day it is no longer possible to treat the question of the genesis of the Ethical experience as morally indifferent. The anxiety has widely spread since the principle of Evolution came to be applied to morals, and attests the prevalent belief resting upon their sacred source."—Studies in Religion, vol. II, p. 303.

As these Ethical experiences that find their expression in conscience as the moral law, have been investigated as facts of man's inner nature, the Divine power is more and more seen to be a necessity in order to account for them. In the definition of conscience and the analysis of the contents of its testimony, we see the present approach to the doctrine of immediate Divine revelation.

In the list of definitions of conscience, that of Kant, which Dr. McCosh calls the "Felicitous expression of the Categorical Imperative," must ever stand at the head.

Dr. McCosh himself calls it "the Viceregent of God;" Farrar, the "Aboriginal Vicar of Christ;" James Martineau, "A living voice from the Sacrament of the universe;" "The oracle of God's will;" Rothe, "The Divine activity within us;" Hermann Lotze, "The mysterious sparkle of independent substantiality which shines within us and makes it plain by its monitions that we are more than an aimless vegetation."—Microcosmos, p. 109.

August Dorner.—"Conscience, in the true use, cannot err, for God's voice cannot contradict itself."—Christian Ethics, p. 257.

Julius Muller.—The conscience, acting in the time of an immediate feeling of moral instinct, just give the final decision and decide what is man's clear, definite duty in a given circumstance.—Doctrine of Sin, p. 33.

Joseph Cook.—"At this miraculous hour, the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world is, not was. It is scientifically known at this light has its temple in conscience, for "The subtlest in the conscience is Thyself and that which toucheth thee."

—Lectures on Conscience.

James Martineau.—"From a little seed of intuition, conscience, the greatest among herbs in the garden of our nature, has sprung and read its branches. The ideal higher than ours awakens in conscience. Wherever conscience is, we stand in the forecourt of existence. Let us approach it on the tip-toe of silence. For in conscience we know a sanctuary, and an invisible incense breathes upon our hearts, and involuntarily we worship; for there we meet with the Almighty Holiness that lifts us up to God."—Seat of Authority in Religion, p. 48.

Professor Harris.—"In the I ought of conscience, man hears the voice of God. It is God's most intimate presence in the soul, and his most perfect image in the world. In the moral consciousness of every man is the revelation of God. For man's conscience is the reflex of God's law."—Self-Revelation of God, pp. 265-78.

Julius Muller.—"The moral law embraces the whole human life; so far as it depends on the will, it is above it; so lofty is its throne, that, as we take our stand there and look broad, all minor things vanish, and fundamental moral truth posits itself in simple yet majestic lines. The unconditional thou shalt! abides firm even before the will that will not yield. And the unconditional authority of its demands witnesseth that the will confronting man's will is the will of God. The internal perception of the moral law is so essentially a part of human consciousness that were it wholly wanting in any one we should be compelled to doubt his humanity."—Doctrine of Sin, pp. 33, 7, 88.

Dr. W. Ashmore, Missionary to China.—"In my long experience in China, I found a common ground in natural religion between the missionary and the heathen about them. It is my conviction that the heathen have not only the moral law but to a certain extent the gospel nature."—Recent address.

I will close these testimonies with the remarkable words of Harris, near the close of his great work on the Self-Revelation of God. They are so like Fox and Barclay that it is difficult to realize they represent the very latest conclusions of religious science in one of the greatest of American universities: "Christ, the glorified head of the redeemed and renovated humanity, reigns at the right hand of the Majesty on high; from Him proceeds unseen the Divine Light, Life, and Love, in the Holy Spirit to all mankind. The kingdom of righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost comes to all men and opens itself to every one who is willing to receive the grace and enter into his service and kingdom. It is the work of the Spirit to bring on all the influences and energies of redemption." p. 544.

It is said when Jenny Lind, the great Swedish singer visited Niagara, that at sight of the falls, all unconscious of the crowd, she fell on her knees with clasped hands and eyes raised to Heaven, and sobbed out a prayer in broken English: "Almighty God, will Thou be pleased to accept my heartfelt and grateful thanks for allowing me to look upon this, one of Thy greatest works; and if there is an unbeliever on the face of the earth, be pleased to bring him forth and show him this mighty work of Thine."—Bible Theology and Christian Thought: L. T. Townsend; p. 94.

And as we behold the marvellous work of God now being wrought in the world of thought, can we avoid a prayer of thanksgiving like that of the great singer at sight of the wonders of Niagara? And as our hearts have been stirred to their inmost depths, and we have felt our love quickened for the old faith of Barclay,—the oldest of the old and still the newest of the new,—have we not felt that if there is a Friend on the face of the earth that denies this faith, that we, like the great singer, could pray that "God may so bring them forth face to face with this mighty work," that doubt may flee away and they be faithless no longer.

The material is at hand, from these and many other authors, to greatly extend these testimonies. But we can see from these how "God, who never leaves himself without a witness," is leading the thoughtful men of this age to recognize his inward immediate revelations as the foundation of faith. To know that we have a faith to maintain and transmit, that thus takes hold of life's bases and unfolds its deepest mysteries, should uplift the soul of all to a renewal of allegiance to such a trust. To abandon this trust can never be to advance. It would be to go downward and backward into the shadow of a theology and philosophy like that of Paley, who denied the intuitions of the moral law. Such a move would be, as Bishop Wilberforce said of the Romeward movement of English Ritualism, "neither grand," "sublime, or impressive," but "deceitful," "feeble, and contemptible." With its face away from the light; with no eye to see the Divine in man; with the avenue of universal communion closed; only a base in Rationalism would remain for such a movement. Yet one now exists under our name, so grounded in outsight and lost to insight that in all this great modern revival of spiritual philosophy and theology, not one of its leaders, authors, ministers, or college professors has had any part: and some have gone so far as to condemn as heresy the principles on which it all rests; but it is heresy for these only against a traditional literalism borrowed from the ecclesiastical sources of medieval history.

Cheered by the prophecy of a coming day, may Friends not thus go backward and become a barrier in the way of the truth; but henceforth join with renewed faith to lead in this age, as early Friends led in theirs, in the advancement of these higher lines of thought, that the day may be hastened when, in the Sanctuary in all men, where God puts his name, they may learn to meet with the "Almighty Holiness that lifts us up to God." And there, in touch with the Infinite Presence, exclaim with Fichte, when thus he met with God: "I veil my face before Thee, and lay my finger on my lips."—Haven's History of Philosophy, p. 376.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 271.

PATIENT IN TRIBULATION.

Martha Schofield, of Aiken, S. C., published in The Friend's Intelligencer and Journal, the following account, given to her by a colored man whom she met in that section of country:—

My owner was a hard man, but God made me able to bear it. He had a butler who used to go round and preach and pray with de people. He was letter-learn't; he teach 'em the catechism. After while Mass'r told him he wouldnt have singin' and prayin' on his plantation. (He had a good many young gals, he sort a wild, beast-like, fraid the singin' and prayin' break his evil progress.) He had 'em all called round the steps and made the butler tell 'em. The spirit of the people fell, and the butler wasent strong in the faith, an' he give up.

I told 'em I had a little house; come there and I would try and pray for 'em. Den the people meet, and we went on. Master, he domineer and do all he could to punish me for it, but I couldnt stop; if I could ha' stop I would, but God wouldnt let me stop. I went on for five year, and Mass'r everlastin' domineer an' cuss me about it, but I couldnt stop—de Lord wouldnt let me. At de end of five years, gwine into de six, Mass'r went to driver and told him if I sing on that pace agin he punish him. Driver cum an' told me, den I feels struck. I didn't know what to do. I takes de people and went out in de wilderness 'bout a mile from home, and made a brush tent, and we sing and pray and preach dare. Master find it out: his son saw de light when we going, and told he father, and Mass'r taken his horse and ride and ride in every swamp until he find where we make the camp. Next day he sent driver fetch me to house. I was down in swamp cuttin' wood; soon as driver holler for me, my mind struck me, dar is a mountain for me to clime. He asked me, when I had meetin'? I told him las' night. Where about? I point, and say right in there. He say that man find it out, I tole him, he didn't find out where I kill a hog—(meaning not stolen one). He say I mus' tie yer han' behin' yer back an' fetch you to house. I answer he wouldnt tie me han' for breakin' de law (stealing corn). I walk home dat mile, behin' his horse, but I feel empty, empty as a chip, feel like a dead man; couldnt even pray. After I got to de house, driver call and tell him I come; he cum out in de hall and pick up de whip off de table, an' ask de driver, "where de han' cuff?"—he "didn't know;" he ask, where de stock, dat what ye have people feelin', and ye lay on your back and ye han' stretch out to another one—so. I told him none here, but one made for Lee Walker (he run away) an' dat was too big for me. Den he jump right out de piazza an' ketch me by throat to chock me, he find I talkin' too strong. I raise me han', and me conscience told me to remember Peter, an' I hold me han' down, jus' so; he chock me long as he could, and I felt tho' I gittin' some life—not so dead like. He carry (took) me in his barn, and strip me naked as I born in de world, took his hankerchief an' tie me eyes, tied me han's up to the bars, pulled me up tight as he could. He giv' me ten cuts an' stop an' say, "what is de order?" I told him, "Master, I carry de people in de woods because de shouter worried you." Him ask me whether I think he would rather he have 'em in de house or in the swamp where dey catch de pluriy? It was mighty cold.

He giv' me ten cuts more, t'ank God I feel den I no longer dead. I was growin'. He ask me again, and said, "I ain't to preach on de earth, I ain't to preach on de tree top, I ain't to preach in de cloud, I ain't to preach in heaven." He gave me ten cuts again; dat was thirty lash. When he gib me de last he ask me the same again. I tell him, "Master, your judgment severe against my flesh, but de wrath of God is still worse for my soul, and I 'bliged to pray." He drop de whip and let driver loose me. Marks are there now; every lash cut de flesh and brought blood. I put on my clothes an' come out; he was in de lot and stop me, talkin' about elders and bishops didn't die in de faith, an' I wouldn't either. While he was talkin', you mayent believe it, Missus, but God knows, de eye of faith, de eye within, see me breast fly open, and a white dove fly in me breast, de spirit of God cum as a dove. I fell against de fence, and when he see me fall and me eye burst in tears, he told me to go to my work. I went home, and after sundown people all run to me and ask what I gwine to do, an' I tell 'em de devil has run for me for five years, dis one de six, he carry me to de slaughter pen, but I ain't give up my shield. I tell 'em, I take 'em back in my house an' sing an' pray just as long as God able me to do it; ain't my work, its God's work. If you'll come I'll sing and pray and talk with you. If you'll come, and if they fetch all de whip an' all de han'-cuff dey ain't gwine to hurt none of you. I'll be de one dey'll destroy. An' dey did come, we went on more dan we was before. He find he couldent stop me, the Lord wouldent let me stop, and he sent me to Columbia, an' I worked on the State House three years. (Carpenter.)

After I left a young man converted under me went in and did the best he could for the people. Master see de Spirit of de Lord in me, an' he break down; he let the young man do it. In Columbia de church put me in high position, an' when Massa took me back he let me have the whole swing. He come down nateral, den, and tell me how good religion is, he wants it hisself, but he had so much property he couldn't get it. He tell me to pray for him, and I tell him I pray so often and it don't seem to do him no good. Den he say de Scripture tell us after long rain it peck hole in de rock. I thank God for that whippin'; tho' I was sore it gave me so much within, and I've got it yet; I only want to get it stronger and stronger; my ups and downs is great; when I whip de devil he won't stay whipped, and when he whip me I won't stay whipped, I keep prayin' and fightin' with all my soul, believin' God will give me grace to conquer him. Many a time I eat a piece of bread and water, but if anybody know the goodness of God I know. He strengthens our bodies and souls. Dis summer I like to die, an' dey start for de doctor. I tell 'em no, my doctor always with me, and sure enough, I git up an' go on wid the crop. Thank God I ever was born, to be born again. Says he "was ten years old before the Jackson war."

The Indian Missionary of First Month, 1885, contains a notice of an Indian named Wesley Smith, who at one time took an active part in the heathen customs, but was converted and then turned away from such practices.

His former friends begged him to remain with them, but to no avail. They finally threatened him, but in response he informed them that he was "engaged in a great work so that he could not come down." They threatened to kill his only cow and feast upon her at their green corn dance if he did not come and take part with them. He still refusing, they put this threat into practice—killed this poor Indian's only cow, on the milk of which he and his family, to a great extent, subsisted. They knew he had always been a brave and revengeful man, so they expected his anger to be aroused, and he demonstrated the same, but he spoke to them kindly, expressing his sorrow without any retaliation. By this means he gained a great victory over them, causing them to repent having treated him so shamefully, and were ever afterwards his warm friends, most of whom, under his influence, became Christians.

Westtown Boarding School.

In the last Annual Report of the Committee in charge of Westtown Boarding School, allusion is made to the desirability of increasing the fund at the disposal of the Committee, particularly with the view of admitting more children from other Yearly Meetings than Philadelphia. It may not be improper to state, that owing to the liberality of some of our own members, an addition has been made to the fund for that special purpose, enabling the sub-committee having this subject in charge to considerably increase that class of pupils for the ensuing winter term; quite a number of these are paid for in part by themselves or their friends. The payment of a portion is encouraged from our own members, as well as others, as it enables the Committee to assist more pupils in getting an education, and, it is thought, gives a feeling of self-respect in the knowledge that they are doing what they can to assist themselves. Too many, it is feared, who have and are the recipients of this bounty, do not sufficiently appreciate the benefits thus conferred upon them. May they be like bread (or seed) cast upon the waters to be found again after many days.

In one instance, at least, the expense of board and tuition was repaid by a pupil after arriving at man's estate,—an example worthy of imitation.

Some papers relative to Westtown were sent to the venerable and beloved John G. Whittier. He acknowledged the receipt of them as follows:—

"I thank thee for thy letters and papers relating to Westtown School, where the principles and testimonies of our Religious Society have been always maintained."

How desirable, yea, how important it is, that the principles of Truth, as always held by the Society of Friends, should continue to be upheld there, paramount to the intellectual development. Not that the latter should be neglected, but subordinate to the former. It was with this view that our predecessors planned and planted Westtown.

That the children of the Society should be sheltered from the contaminating influence almost inseparably arising from intimate school associations with those who do not receive at home the guarded care which, we trust, is extended to the children in most Friend's families. May Westtown continue to deserve the blessing expressed by Thos. Scattergood in its early days:

"This is a plantation which the Lord will bless!"
Ah! He has blessed it! May his gracious care,
Through all life's journey, its loved inmates share;
May He ne'er weep for these as when He told Jerusalem's children's fate in days of old!

FOR "THE FRIEND."

SUN-BOUND.

BY MARY E. MOTT.

'Twas Summer, and for many a day
The glorious sun of heaven
Had risen, with resplendent ray,
And traversed all his cloudless way,
Had heat, and light, and radiance given,

And set in splendor in the West
When the long day was through;
The sky in fiery beauty dressed,
The clouds with crowns of glory blessed,
Of many a varied hue,

From softest light to richest blaze,
Until the mind of man might dream
That from afar his mortal gaze
Could see, through billowy conds of haze
The gilded gates of glory gleam!

For many a moon the nights had passed
Unmoistened by a drop of dew;
And, grateful for the shadow cast,
The parched earth slept; while all too fast
The moon sailed thro' clear fields of blue.

For many a day hot winds had sped
O'er forest, field, and plane;
Had sung the requiem of the dead,
The beauteous flowers and grasses fled,
—Whose veins of life-blood they had bled,—
In many a dismal strain.

And now the river-beds were dry,
And vegetation hung its head;
'Twixt torrid earth and brazen sky
The fleecy clouds went sailing by,
But not a drop of moisture shed.

Great herds, by famine sore accursed,
Rush bellowing o'er the plain;
Still driven on by madd'ning thirst,
Till strong limbs fail, and eye-balls burst,
They rend the throbbing air in vain.

The seekers after western homes,
Who may yet these ravines tread,
May marvel at the heaps of bones
That, bleaching, gleam like white grave-stones
Along the winding river-bed.

The farmer turns the dusty sod,
And tills his hardened fields in vain;
Lo! man, and beast, and plant, and clod
Each turns a sun-parched face to God,
And mutely plead for rain,—for rain!

When bound by ice, or rain, or snow,
The hearth-stone doth our steps invite,
Where firelight's play and lovelight's glow
Are wont to ever come and go
In home's sweet, magic light.

But when the glorious sun hath bound
The earth with his unflinching eye,
Not even there is solace found,
For fevered Famine stalks around
And hoarsely whispers, "Thou shalt die."

And Pestilence, grim-eyed, is there;
He daily sits beside your bed,
With hands that pity not, nor spare,
Although your moans, your shrieks, your prayer
Ring wildly on death-freighted air;—
And what is home, if love is dead!

For many days the sages old
Their dire predictions did unfold
Of when the rain should come again;
How it would come with thunder's crash,
And with the fearful lightning's flash,
The hurricane's tumult and roar:

But no; God's discipline is loving,
And in his time, his mercy proving,
Softly, gently fell the rain.
Each loving flower, and shrub, and tree
Trembled and wept in ecstasy;
The dying world took life again!

'Tis well that such sad years be given
To teach thy power, Lord, God of heaven,— Teach boastful man his true estate;
For though his skill may wondrous be

To span the plain and plow the sea,
Sun-bound, he must acknowledge thee,
That thou, alone, art great!

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Memoranda of William Kennard.

Twenty-third of Seventh Month, 1841. This morning left Saratoga at 4 o'clock; took the stage for White Hall, about forty miles, where I took the steam boat on Lake Champlain for Vergennes (sixty miles), State of Vermont.

Twenty-fourth of Seventh Month. Landed at evening at this place, half-past two o'clock, anxiously waiting for a passage to Ferrisburgh. After a fatiguing journey, we landed at Benjamin Taber's, nearly dark, the whole family much rejoiced to meet their son [Louis] again, and to receive him safe and sound; but our joy was soon all turned into mourning. On taking a late number of THE FRIEND paper, saw account of the decease of Margaret Wright Pickering, in Upper Canada, who was returned on the return home with her husband, William Wright, who kindly carried us in their wagon twenty-four miles to Toronto. She was valuable and a virtuous woman, and an elder of good esteem.

Twenty-ninth. Returned seventeen miles to T's, and in the afternoon attended Starksborough Preparative Meeting, held at Lincoln. Thirtieth of Seventh Month. Attended Starksborough Monthly Meeting, held at Lincoln, at which we had the company of a committee from New York, appointed in the Select early Meeting, whom we first met with at Monkton, whose services have been useful. * * * Eight miles to Starksborough. Whilst on the way, and on their return home, two aged friends, a man and his wife, riding in a buggy (both near eighty-three years of age), and another wagon passing caught in their wheel, upset the vehicle and threw them both out; broke the woman's arm; the company splintered it up, and then drove five and a half miles home; the doctor was brought quick and set it.

Eighth Month 2d. I was kindly carried by Mel Battey, with his wife and two children, out forty miles, to his son, Jonathan Battey's, in Peru, N. Y., on the main leading road from Albany and Troy to Montreal; a very lightful location; the scenery beautiful; the surrounding mountains in appearance romantic; the farms in a high state of cultivation; the buildings good.

On our journey, dined at Robert Hazard's. From there to Lake Champlain, where we met with Thomas and Elizabeth Robson; crossed the lake in a boat, together with a number of our Friends, going over to the Quarterly Meeting of Ferrisburgh, held in Au Sable. Landed half-past nine o'clock in the evening at J. B.'s, and lodged.

Eight Month 3d. Attended the Select Quarterly Meeting.

Fourth of the month. Attended the Quarterly Meeting for Discipline.

Fifth of the month. Attended the public meeting that usually follows the Quarter, in which dear Elizabeth Robson was exercised in Gospel authority, so that Truth reigned triumphant over all; that my soul rejoiced in the Lord; and feeling that this was not merely a brook by the way," but a "river to swim in," a river that could not be passed over!

Seventh of Eighth Month. We had a meeting at Ferrisburgh, which was small, but a refreshing season. Our great and good Master was near, and spread the table and prepared a feast of fat things, so that all eat thereof, and many with broken and thankful hearts unto the Lord. Blessed be his holy name forever!

First-day, morning, 8th of Eighth Month. Attended Lincoln Meeting, in which I was favored with a lively testimony; feeling in my heart the virtue of the Holy Spirit moving in Gospel love toward the people, and a solemn season it proved to be. The blessing was not of man, but from the all-bountiful hand that reigns above.

Ninth day of Eighth Month. Now waiting on the motion of my dear companion to leave his father's house and near connections in the State of Vermont, wishing to have a few days with them, so as to satisfy his feelings, and then return with me on the balance of the visit until reaching my home and far-distant land, Ohio, the place of my abode.

Eleventh of Eighth Month. Made several social visits, and attended Ferrisburgh Meeting, which was a low and dull season, many drowsy and sleeping on the backs of the benches, for which they met with a sharp rebuke; the Lord enlarging my mind, and opening my mouth in testimony to the relief and peace of my soul. Blessed forever be his high and holy name! * *

Thirteenth of Eighth Month. Left Benjamin Taber's half-past one o'clock. Passed through Middlebury, a large village in which there is a college for making ministers of Christ; which, when made, can only be ministers of the letter, and not of the Spirit, and therefore "darken counsel" and obscure the openings of the true light, and greatly retard the heartfelt work of the soul. * * *

Fifteenth of the month. Being First-day, attended Granville Meeting. The state of the meeting at a low ebb, although a few well-exercised members, amongst whom I was favored to relieve my mind. Returned in peace, and left this place at three o'clock in the afternoon. Went twenty miles over a country lying between the Green Mountains and the Catskills, or Alleghanies; and several times crossed a branch of the great Western Canal, and lodged at Solomon Haviland's on the Hudson River, near Glen's Falls, Warren County, N. Y. * *

Seventeenth of the month. From the falls, two miles to Roger Haviland's, where I made a call; and at two o'clock attended the Select Quarterly Meeting, held at Saratoga, in which I do not know that I ever felt a greater degree of Divine love to fill my soul, until all that was within me was bowed in rapturous devotion. Thus my inner man was renewed and strengthened in the heavenly visitation, in which there seemed to be an audible voice speaking to the intellectual ear of my soul. After this precious season seemed to pass away, my mind then became exercised in the state of the meeting, with an opening which made me to tremble; that "your silver is become dross, and your wine mingled with water;" but giving up thus to expose myself, had a lively testimony which carried its own evidence.

Eighteenth of the month. This day attended the Quarterly Meeting for Discipline, which, through Divine favor, was a comfortable and refreshing season.

Nineteenth of Eighth Month. Attended a public meeting, which was large and a blessed season, in which we were watered and refreshed, even with the Master's blessed presence, in which He was felt near in supplication. Holy is his great name!

Twenty-fifth of Eighth Month. Attended Half-Moon Meeting, held near to the dwelling-house of William Carey, which was small, and the pure Gospel stream at a low ebb among them; but through the goodness of the unsleeping Shepherd of Israel, I was opened to declare the way of life and salvation to the peace of my own soul.

Dined at T. C.'s, and carried by him across the Hudson River, through a handsome plain and glady country, to Abner DeVoll's in Rensselaer County, Schaghticoke Meeting, about eleven miles.

Twenty-sixth of Eighth Month. Attended the meeting pronounced Scattecook, which was silent a long season; such a high and restless spirit had soared aloft above the truth. At length, through a long silence, it flagged down, and a way opened, in which I had a lively testimony, Truth gaining the victory.

After the close of the public meeting, I requested the members to stop, which proved a season of refreshment. Blessed be the Lord!

Dined at Abner Potter's, whose wife, Freeborn, having been a minister in good esteem, having an excellent gift, but having given way to despondency, which at times has run into a state of mental derangement, so that she gets no more out to meetings for a number of years. Thus the enemy has got the advantage over one, by his subtle insinuations, who once stood as a star in the firmament of heaven.

(To be continued.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Visit of J. E. Rhoads to Oregon, &c.

Jonathan E. Rhoads and Ephraim Smith sat with Friends of Portland, Oregon, on the evening of the 15th of Seventh Month. The meeting was small, but satisfactory.

From Portland to Newberg on the 16th. On First-day, the 17th, they attended a meeting at Dayton, about eight miles distant. This was a small company, not much like a Friends' meeting; but after attention had been called to our mode of worship, the meeting became more quiet, and J. E. R. had a full opportunity to preach the Gospel.

In the evening they attended the meeting at Newberg, held in the Fair Building, about three hundred being present. Singing was engaged in while the company were gathering. After a time of silence, J. E. R. appeared in prayer, and afterward was favored in testimony.

John Henry Douglass, the appointed pastor, asked a blessing upon the strangers, and that the word rightly preached might be blessed.

On the 22d were at Marion, and on the 23d attended two meetings at Salem.

In the morning opportunity was given J. E. R. to relieve his mind, which he was enabled to do to the satisfaction of those who retain any attachment to the doctrines as held by Friends in former times. The meeting in the evening was exceedingly trying. In addition to singing, the organ was kept at work in connection with it, and the sermon and other exercises of the pastor far from comforting. At one stage of the proceedings, the pastor said: "We will now have silence, and if the strangers or any one else had anything to say, he hoped they would be faithful." After a very brief silence, singing was again called for.

From Salem they went to Sacramento City, where Samuel Morris joined them, and attended a public meeting on the evening of the 28th.

The next day they proceeded to San Francisco, where they attended, on First-day morning, the meeting of Friends, about thirty in attendance,—a favored opportunity. In the afternoon had an appointed meeting, where Samuel Morris was engaged in testimony, J. E. R. in prayer. The audience were very attentive, and those interested in arranging for the meeting expressed much satisfaction.

An appointed meeting for the public, to be held at Oakland on the evening of Eighth Month 2d, closed the labors on this continent.

Of their visit, E. S. writes: "We have been hospitably received; much kindness and attention have been shown us, and in nearly every place we have visited have met with those with whom we could feel near unity and fellowship."

"J. E. R. has been remarkably strengthened to set forth the doctrines of our Society with clearness and power. Many have expressed satisfaction with his services, and the desire to be in possession of the Quakerism thus set before them."

"To the humble, honest-hearted, some of whom we visited in isolated situations, he has been the messenger of comfort and encouragement, and under the precious covering of Divine favor, these seasons have been mutually strengthening."

"The attendance of many meetings has been accompanied with deep exercise, and at times distress. It is sad to find bodies of professing Friends adopting doctrines and practices out of which the Society of Friends was called."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Western Quarterly Meeting.

With the prospect of attending this meeting, to be held at London Grove on the 19th of Eighth Month, I left home on the 17th of the month, designing to visit a friend who resided at West Grove, a pleasant village on the line of the Baltimore Central Railroad. As the train, west of the Brandywine, swept past the neighborhood where formerly resided my beloved friend, William Walter, and a little later passed the farm on which dwelt William and Hannah Jackson, tender recollections were awakened of these dear Friends, especially of the first named, with whom I was well acquainted. I recalled the sweet feeling of tenderness and unity which had been experienced in his company. He was a valuable elder, who maintained an exercise of spirit for the spread of the kingdom of the Redeemer, and the increasing submission of the hearts of the people to his government. He passed away in the eighty-ninth year of his age—and the Lord, whom he had long endeavored faithfully to serve, was with him when on a dying bed, supporting him in his affliction and giving him faith to believe that there would be those preserved who would be enabled to uphold and maintain the Christian testimonies of the Society of Friends.

The worthies of a former generation have passed away, but the same Divine power which enabled them to shine as lights in the world, is still at work, and is able to raise up worthy successors in the Church,—a truth which Samuel Fothergill, in one of his beautiful letters, speaks of as "the joy and song of many generations."

I found sources of instruction and information in listening to the conversation of some of my former friends. One young man had lately become the owner of a high-spirited colt, which had been before somewhat injudiciously handled. The father of the lad, who was an experienced horseman, said the only way in which such an animal could be properly trained was by unvarying gentleness and patience. This the young man knew very well, and being impressed with the importance of not spoiling so valuable a beast, he was forced to keep his own temper in subjection, and the father thought the horse and man were mutually training each other.

A considerable number of foxes live in that section, finding woods and broken grounds as places of refuge. Their depredations on poultry yards were said not to be frequent—their principal food being young ground hogs, field mice, and other small animals; so that my friends seemed inclined to think them rather useful to the farmer than otherwise, and were not disposed to molest them.

At one of our visiting places a colony of purple Martins has for several years made its summer home. They had left a day or two before our visit. These birds are very regular in their times of coming and going. They make their appearance in this section of country about the 12th of the Fourth Month—seldom varying more than a day in the time of their arrival—and they depart about the 15th of the Eighth Month, one of the family said, they gave notice of giving up their possession of the bird-house by sailing round and round and round in the evening, uttering their cries. Next morning not a Martin could be seen.

The Quarterly Meeting was a solemn and interesting occasion, in which prayer was offered for the Divine blessing, and praises for the favors bestowed. Much tender exhortation and persuasive appeal was uttered, endeavoring to bring the members individually to live in communion with God, and in subjection to the leadings of his Spirit.

In the business meeting, the subject of removing the place of holding the Quarterly Meeting to West Grove, was considered. A committee made a report favorable to the change. Being on the line of the railroad, West Grove was thought to be easier of access to a number of their members. Although this change will probably be made in the future, it was evident the meeting was not prepared, unitedly, to favor it at this time—and so the proposition was dropped. The present house is a large stone building, beautifully situated on high ground. It was built about 1743, and enlarged in the early part of the present century. Although, after the separation of 1827, it remained under the control of the party who endorsed Elias Hicks, yet our Friends have continued uninterruptedly (I believe) to hold their Quarterly Meetings in it.

Another subject of interest was the report of a committee who were authorized a year ago to build a meeting-house at Kennet Square. A suitable lot of ground had been presented by one of their members (Abraham Gibbons of Coatesville). On this they had erected a substantial meeting-house, suitably furnished it, and had graded and otherwise improved the surroundings at a cost of nearly $3,000—leaving unexpended a small balance of the amount contributed for the purpose by interested friends.

The closing business of the meeting was the reading, in joint session, of an Address to the members of the Western Quarterly Meeting, written by the late Morris Cope, about two years and a half before his death, and left with directions that it should be offered to the meeting after his removal. The purport of much of the Address is shown by the quotation from the Proverbs, with which it commenced: "Remove not the ancient landmarks which thy father hath set."

During his active life, Morris Cope had been a firm and fearless defender of the doctrine, testimonies, and principles of the Society of Friends, and had faithfully opposed the effort to change these, from whatever direction the came. It seemed to be a fitting conclusion to such a life, thus to exhort his fellow-members to hold fast to the truths which they had received, and it manifested the continuance of his convictions, amid the infirmities of decaying nature, that he had "not followed cunningly-devised fables." His concern was similar to that of the Apostle Peter, who, when he knew that he must shortly put off his tabernacle, thought it meet to stir up the believers, and to endeavor that, after his decease, they might have the things in remembrance.

Connected with this appeal on behalf of the original principles of Friends, was earnest persuasion that his fellow-members might individually yield a faithful obedience to the word of grace—and thus be prepared to receive admission into the mansions of everlasting blessedness.

It was a clear and impressive document which awakened much interest in the audience and was attended with a precious solemnity. It was directed to be recorded on the minutes of the meeting.

Natural History, Science, etc.

An eye-witness of a combat between a Secretary bird and its prey, thus describes it: "E was one day riding when he observed a snake eater, while on the wing, make two or three circles at a little distance from the spot at which he then was, and suddenly descend to the ground. He found the bird watching and examining some object near the spot where he stood, which he continued to do for several minutes. After that it moved, with considerable apparent caution, to a little distance, and then extended one of its wings, which it kept in continual motion. Soon after this, the observer saw a large snake raise its head to a considerable distance from the ground, which the bird had seemed to expect, and wait for. At the moment the snake reared its head, it instantly struck a sharp blow with the end of its wing by which the snake was knocked flat on the ground. The bird, however, did not appear confident of having slain its enemy, or gained the victory, but kept its eye fixed on the reptile for a short time; when the snake, reviving again, lifted up its head, and the bird, as before, repeated the blow. After this second blow, it appeared to gain more confidence; for almost the moment it was inflicted it marched boldly up and struck at the snake with its feet after which, finding it disabled, though not quite dead, it rose almost perpendicularly to a very great height, taking its prey in its beak when it let the reptile drop, and as it fell with great violence to the ground, the snake-eater seemed satisfied, and accordingly followed it to the earth and commenced its meal."—Anecdotes of Birds.

Lark Seeking Protection.—"A gentleman was travelling on horse-back in the west of Norfolk when a lark dropped on the pommel of his saddle, and, spreading its wings in a submissive manner, cowered to him. He stopped his horse and sat for some time in astonishment, looking at the bird, which he supposed to be wounded; but on endeavoring to take it, the lark crept under him, and placed himself behind; turning himself on the saddle to observe it, the poor animal dropped between the legs of the horse and remained immovable. It then struck him at the poor thing was pursued, and, as the last source, hazarded its safety with him. The gentleman looked up, and discovered a hawk hovering directly over them; the poor bird again mounted the saddle, under the eye of its protector, and the disappointed hawk shifting station, the little fugitive, watching its opportunity, darted over the hedge and was hid an instant."—Anecdotes of Birds.

Items.

Malt Liquors.—The books of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue show that, during the year ending Fourth Month 30th, 1892, upwards of 60,000 barrels of beer were consumed in the State of New York, of which New York city swallowed nearly 4½ millions.

Inconsistency of War and Christianity.—"Why you come here, Wolfe?" said a Jew to that missionary in Jerusalem. "To preach the Gospel of peace," replied Wolfe. "Peace!" retorted the Jew; "look there at Calvary, where your different sects of Christians would fight for an empty sepulchre if the sword of the Mussulman did not restrain them. When the true Messiah comes He will banish war."

The same noted missionary, who had traversed several continents, said: "I once gave a Turk the Gospel to read, and pointed him to the fifth chapter of Matthew as showing the beauty of its doctrine. 'But,' said he, 'you Christians are the greatest hypocrites in the world.' 'How so?' 'Why, here it is said, 'Blessed are the peacemakers,' and yet you, more than any others, teach us to make war, and are yourselves the greatest warriors on earth! How can you be so careless?"

The Horrors of Sport.—"Sport is horrible. I have advisedly. I speak with the matured experience of one who has seen and taken part in many and varied kinds in many and varied parts of the world. I can handle gun and rifle as well and efficiently as most 'sporting folk,' and women and not many men have indulged in a life of the shooting and hunting in which I have been engaged, both at home and during travels and expeditions in far-away lands. It is not, therefore, as a novice that I take up my pen to record why I, whom some have called a 'female prodigy,' have come to regard with absolute loathing and detestation any sort or kind or form of sport which in any way is produced by the suffering of animals.

Many a keen sportsman, searching his heart, can acknowledge that at times a feeling of self-reproach has shot through him as he has stood by a dying victim of his skill. I know that it has troubled me many and many a time. I have watched over my fallen game, the result of, alas! too much sport. I have seen the beautiful eye of deer grow dim as the different kinds glaze and grow dim as the light of life my shot had arrested in its happy course onward into the unknown; I have ended the sharp yet merciful knife the dying sufferer of poor beasts who had never harmed me, yet whom I laid low under the veil of sport.

I have seen the terror-stricken orb of the red fox, dark, full of tears, glaring at me with mute reproach, as it sobbed its life away; and that same I have seen in the glorious orb of the guanaco of Patagonia, the timid gazelle, the graceful and beautiful koodoo, springbok, etc., of South Africa, and, finally, as it were, reproaching me for thus taking the life I could never bring back. I have witnessed the angry, defiant glare of the wild beast's fading sight, as death, fast coming, deprived him of the power to wreak his vengeance on the human aggressor before him. And I say this: The memory of those scenes brings no pleasure to my mind. On the contrary, it haunts me with a huge reproach, and I wish I had never done those deeds of skill and cruelty."—Lady Florence Dixie in Westminster Review.

The Drama and the Public School.

A variety theatre performer, who had a narrow escape from a horrible death at the recent burning of the Central Theatre in Philadelphia, detailed to a reporter how he had received his education at the Lincoln Public School, that "that school had turned out a great many variety performers," having two social clubs, one of which was a minstrel organization, and that he started on his roving stage life by joining Barnum's circus.

Nearly at the same time that the "Central" was burnt, the graduating class of the Reading High School decided that they would vary the ordinary routine by giving a tableau somewhat after the spectacular order, by the use of red fire. This startled the audience; a cry of fire was raised, women fainted, and a number of persons were injured.

At Westchester, Pennsylvania, an operetta was given before a large audience by a numerous company of school children. The subject was by no means a sensational one, being of a pastoral character, and the rendition of the performance was generally deemed to be a great success. Nevertheless, the effect must obviously be, to make it an easy matter when the query is presented to the professing Christian student or graduate, "Shall I attend or not attend the theatre?" to decide in the affirmative.

It is to be very much regretted that our popular magazines have so much to say concerning actors and actresses, while the daily papers, with rare exceptions, devote columns to dramatic doings, anecdotes and advertisements. The public school children, therefore, drift easily into the current, and unfortunately, the teachers in many cases stand prepared to help them rapidly along that way. Can it be that the teaching of music in the public schools, which of late years has become so general, has had a tendency to accelerate the trend which has been noted? It may be properly added that the operetta given by the Westchester school children was under the direction of the teacher of music. Will the stageward inclination in the school stay right where it is, or will it break bounds toward the red fire and the ballet?—Josiah W. Leeds, in Christian Statesman.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 27, 1892.

In the present number we have inserted an article furnished by our friend, Cyrus W. Harvey, which is evidently the result of much labor and research. The object of it is to show that the most advanced thinkers and writers on philosophical subjects are gradually approaching the position taken by early Friends,—that the foundation of all real knowledge of spiritual things is the Divine revelations made by the Spirit of God in the heart of every man. This great truth is in harmony with the statement of the Apostle Paul in his epistle to the Romans,— "That which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath showed it unto them." The necessary introduction into this article of terms not much in common use, but constantly employed by writers on such subjects, may be distasteful to some of our readers; but we hope there are many who will read it with interest, and with an increased appreciation of that spiritual insight into Divine mysteries granted by the Head of the Church to many of our early members who were unlearned as to the wisdom of this world, but deeply instructed in those things that belong to the Kingdom of God.

It has often seemed to the Editor a remarkable and most interesting circumstance, that so many of the young and illiterate men and women, on whom a gift in the ministry was bestowed in those days, should have become, through the power of the Spirit, able and dignified ministers of the Gospel, richly endowed with wisdom and skill, so that they were competent to stand their ground against opposers who were eminently equipped with the advantages which the training of the schools could give them.

We would suggest to our readers to follow the article of C. W. Harvey by reading the 5th and 6th Propositions of Barclay's Apology, in which the doctrine of the Universal and Saving Light of Christ is more fully set forth.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Secretary of State, on the 19th inst., on the receipt of a telegram from the United States Charge d'Affaires at Constantinople, stating that the house of Dr. Bartlett, an American missionary, in Konieh, Asia Minor, had been burned, and that the lives of the missionaries were in danger, cabled instructions to the Legation to demand of Turkey effective protection, indemnity, punishment of the guilty parties, and reprimand of the authorities found remiss. The United States cruisers Newark and Bennington, now on the way to Genoa, will be ordered to the vicinity of the outrage to support this demand.

On the 20th inst., President Harrison issued a proclamation, under the authority of the Act of Congress of Seventh Month 26, 1892, authorizing retaliation for Canadian canal discrimination, directing that "from and after September 1, until further notice, a toll of 20 cents per ton be levied, &c., on all freight passing through the St. Mary's Falls Canal in transit to any part of the Dominion of Canada, whether carried in vessels of the United States or of other nations." The President further suspended the right of free passage through the canal of any cargoes in transit to Canadian ports.

There are now about 7,000 troops at Buffalo, N. Y., guarding the properties of the railroad companies at that place. The switchmen of the New York Central and the Western New York and Pennsylvania are on strike. Efforts have been made, as yet without success, to induce the firemen to strike from motives of sympathy. Freight is being freely moved on all the railroads.

On the 17th inst., the convict mine stockade at Oliver Springs, in Anderson County, Tennessee, fell into the hands of the miners, and the convicts, guards and 23 militiamen from Knoxville were put on the train and shipped to Nashville, via Knoxville. The State militia were sent against the miners, and some skirmishing ensued, resulting in the loss of several men. The miners were dispersed, and 54 of their number have offered to give themselves up on condition that a reasonable bail will be accepted. This offer has been refused by Judge Moon, who demands unconditional surrender.

The largest advertisement ever published in New York was published in the World on the 21st inst., and was paid for by the Mexican Government. The advertisement covered eight pages, and was a handsomely illustrated article, in regular news form, describing Mexico. Its history, in brief, its government, its climate, soil, mineral wealth, agricultural resources, &c., are set forth, and reasons are given for emigrating to this comparatively new republic. For this remarkable advertisement, which gives a flattering description of our Southern neighbor, about $16,000 was paid.

A telegram from the Lick Observatory on Mount Hamilton, California, says that "on the night of August 17, Professors Schaeberle, Campbell and Huesey made three independent drawings of Mars, each of which shows the canals marked on Schiaparelli's map," thus confirming the discovery of the Italian astronomer.

A good deal of dissatisfaction has been created among the Pennsylvania Railroad employees at Columbia, numbering 600 men, by the posting of the following bulletin: "The use of intoxicating liquors by the employees of the Philadelphia division on duty must be stopped at once. Any employee found visiting a saloon or a place where intoxicating liquors are sold will be severely disciplined. Trainmen are on duty from the time they are called out."

The New York World of the 12th inst. says: "Nicholas O'Brien, who lived with his wife and two children in a dilapidated farmhouse two miles from Litchfield, on the Milton road, came home drunk late Tuesday night. He grabbed his wife by the hair, kicked and beat her and drove her outdoors. There he kicked and pounded her again, choked her until she was nearly insensible, and pushed her into the weeds by the roadside. Two hours later Mrs. O'Brien was found covered with mud and blood and in a dying condition. She died soon after, and her husband has been arrested for murder. Six years ago when O'Brien married Miss Katie Heron, of Litchfield, he was industrious and sober. He formed a taste for hard cider, the tipple of the neighborhood, and, notwithstanding his wife's warnings, became a hard drinker. His crime is the sixth murder caused by cider drinking in Litchfield, Conn., during the last ten years."

The address of Andrew D. White, ex-President of Cornell University and Minister to Russia, delivered at Chautauqua on the 16th inst., contained pointed allusions to three prominent men of N. Y. City. Minister White's address was on "The Murder Problem in the United States," and was a remarkable paper when we consider the high standing and learning of the speaker. "Reliable statistics and testimony," he said, "prove that among all nations of the Christian world, in the United States the highest crimes are most frequently committed and least punished. The number of deaths by murder in the United States," he declared, "is more than double the average in the most criminal countries of Europe. Only about one in fifty murderers receive capital punishment, and monstrous growths of crime are the local result of a system in which violated law is so lightly regarded. The young 'ward tough' in New York city," he said, "who glories in making himself what he calls 'a holy terror,' who rejoices in being paraded in the newspaper headlines as 'nervy,' who loves to be pointed out as a 'killer,' looks up with admiration to various eminent men in high political places in our Metropolitan city, and especially to three political leaders, managers of a great party organization, omnipotent in caucuses, powerful in conventions, who first swore friendship with each other while all three were lying, charged with murder, in 'Murderers' Row' in the Tombs prison, of the city of New York. What wonder, then, at the growth of a class whose joy is crime, and whose crowning glory is murder?"

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 413, being 91 less than the previous week, and 16 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 218 were males and 195 females; 135 were under one year of age; 50 died of consumption; 49 of cholera infantum; 33 of marasmus; 24 of diseases of the heart; 18 of inanition; 15 of convulsions; 11 of old age; 11 of Bright's disease; 11 of apoplexy; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; and 10 of pneumonia.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 115½ a 116½; currency 6's, 106½ a 117.

FEED.—Winter bran, $16.50 a $17.50 per ton.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.25 a $2.50; do., extras, $2.75 a $3.00; No. 2 winter family, $3.25 a $3.65; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $4.00 a $4.30; Western winter, clear, $3.75 a $4.10; do. do., straight, $4.00 a $4.30; winter patent, $4.40 a $4.75; Minnesota, clear, $3.35 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.85 a $4.35; do., patent, $4.50 a $4.75; do. favorite brands, higher. Rye flour is quiet and barely steady at $3.70 a $3.75 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 77½ a 77½ cts.
No. 2 mixed corn, 57½ a 58 cts.
No. 2 white oats, 41 a 42 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 5½ cts.; medium, 4½ a 4½ cts.; common, 4 a 4½ cts.; culls, 3½ a 3½ cts.; fat cows, 2½ a 3½ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 5 a 5½ cts.; medium, 4½ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4½ cts.; culls, 2 a 3½ cts.; Lambs, 4 a 7½ cts.

HOGS.—Chicago, 8½ cts.; other west, 8½ a 8½ cts.

FOREIGN.—The new British Cabinet contains the following named persons:—

W. E. Gladstone, Lord Privy Seal and First Lord of the Treasury.

Earl Rosebery, Foreign Secretary.

Baron Herschell, Lord Chancellor.

Sir William Vernon Harcourt, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Herbert II. Asquith, Home Secretary.

H. Campbell-Bannerman, Secretary of State for War.

Earl Spencer, First Lord of the Admiralty.

John Morley, Chief Secretary for Ireland.

A. J. Mundella, President of the Board of Trade.

Sir Charles Russell, Attorney-General.

The Earl of Kimberley, Secretary of State for India and Vice-President of the Council.

The Marquis of Ripon, Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Sir George O. Trevelyan, Secretary for Scotland.

Arnold Morley, Postmaster-General.

Arthur Herbert Dyke Acland, Vice-President of the Council on Education.

Baron Houghton, Viceroy of Ireland, without a seat in the Cabinet.

The House of Commons met on the afternoon of the 18th inst. There was a change in the seating of the members, the Liberals going over to the ministerial side of the Chamber. The Irish members, however, did not change their seats, but remained on the Opposition benches, as did also Keir-Hardie and Burns, Laborists.

There were only thirty members present in the House of Commons in the evening, when Parliament was formally prorogued until Eleventh Month 4th.

The Standard's Shanghai correspondent says: "Countess Li, wife of Li-Hung-Chang, died at Tientsin on the 3d inst. She was attended by an English physician and an American lady doctor. She was one of the most remarkable women of the day. She had the greatest influence at court, and was a trusty adviser of the Dowager Empress."

A special to the Times from Calcutta says that the Government has informed the Currency Association that it is unable to comply with the request of the Association that the Government appoint a commission to inquire into the advisability of establishing a gold standard in India, and that, in view of the alarming condition of affairs and the dangers of a crisis, the Government declines to declare what steps it proposes to take to allay the panic existing in the country.

Intense heat is prevailing throughout Central and Southern Europe, particularly in Austria and Northern Italy. In Austria the military manoeuvres have been postponed on account of the sufferings of the soldiers, a number of whom have been sunstruck. In Vienna the temperature is greater "than has ever prevailed here within the memory of the living."

The official cholera report states that there were reported from the various infected districts in Russia on the 17th inst., 8,458 new cases of the disease and 3,207 deaths. The returns on the 21st, for the previous 24 hours, was 6,510 new cases and 3,077 deaths.

For "THE FRIEND,"

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 272.

UNSPOTTED.

The scrupulous care which an upright judge will feel to avoid anything that might improperly influence the mind in deciding between man and man, is well illustrated in an anecdote preserved of Judge Sewall, of Massachusetts, who died in 1800. He went one day into a hatter's shop, in order to purchase a pair of brushes. The master of the shop presented him with a couple. "What will your price?" said the judge. "If they will answer your purpose," replied the other, "you may have them and welcome." The judge, upon hearing this, laid them down, and bowing, was leaving the shop, upon which the hatter said to him, "Pray, your honor has forgotten the principal object of your visit." "By no means," answered the judge; "if you please to set a price, I am ready to purchase; but ever since my brush has fallen to my lot to occupy a seat on the bench, I have studiously avoided receiving the value of a single copper, lest at some future period of my life, it might have some influence in determining my judgment."

When a man has yielded to the power of the vine Grace, and by it has been enlisted in the Lord's army, he must feel a similar tenderness of conscience, which will lead him to avoid everything which can bring reproach on his profession. G. F. Pentecost relates an incident of a man who was brought under the power of religious conviction at a meeting in America. He was a commercial traveller. The day after the meeting, he was standing in front of one of the large hotels in Boston, when he was accosted by one of his fellow commercial men. "How are you, old fellow?" said his friend, in the style of an old acquaintance; "come in and have a drink," and started at once toward the bar-room.

Here was a crisis. Instantly it occurred to the newly-converted friend, who was going to keep his conversion a secret, that to go into a public bar with an ungodly friend, and hold fellowship with him over a glass of whisky, would be utterly inconsistent with his new life in Christ. What was he to do? He thought he could excuse himself; so he said:

"No, thank you; I think I will not drink to-day."

This did not satisfy his friend.

"Why, what's up? I never knew you to refuse a drink before."

"Well, I don't feel like drinking to-day; that's all."

"Well, come and have a cigar, then."

But this also was declined. He was unwilling to go into the public house and fraternize with his friend over the bar. Again the astonished questioner asked:

"Why, what's the matter with you? Come along."

"No, I can't go to-day," said our secret convert, in great confusion, and then stammered out, hardly knowing what he said: "I have a friend with me."

"O, that's all right. Bring your friend with you; any friend of yours is welcome to drink at my expense."

"No, I cannot bring him in; in fact, he would not go in there," said the young convert, things beginning to clear a little in his mind.

"Then come without him; it will take you but a moment."

"No, I will not go without Him."

Looking about among the by-standers, the inviter said:

"Where is your friend? and who is he, that he won't come and have a drink, and that you can't leave for a moment to have a glass with an old friend?"

There was nothing for it now but to confess; and so, with some trembling, and yet with perfect frankness, he said to his acquaintance:

"The fact is, I only last night became a Christian; I did not mean to say anything about it, but you compel me to speak. My friend is the Lord Jesus Christ. He would not go into that bar-room and take a drink, I am sure; and, by the grace of God, I do not mean to go anywhere or do anything that will make me part company with Jesus Christ."

It is said of that upright judge, Sir Matthew Hale, that he would never receive any private addresses or recommendations from the greatest persons in any matter in which justice was concerned. One of the first peers of England went once to his chamber and told him, "That having a suit in law to be tried before him, he was there to acquaint him with it, that he might the better understand it when it should be heard in court." Upon which, Sir Matthew interrupted him, and said, "He did not deal fairly to come to his chamber about such affairs, for he never received any information of causes but in open court, where both parties were to be heard alike"—so he would not suffer him to go on. Whereupon the Duke went away not a little dissatisfied, and complained of it to the King, as a rudeness that was not to be endured. But the King bade him content himself that he was no worse used, and said, "He verily believed he would have used himself no better, if he had gone to solicit him in any of his own causes."

In one of his circuits, a gentleman who had a trial at the assizes had sent him a buck for his table. When he heard his name, he asked,

"If he was not the same person that had sent him the venison?" And finding he was the same, he told him, "He could not suffer the trial to go on, till he had paid him for his buck." To which the gentleman answered, "That he had never sold his venison, and that he had done nothing to him which he did not do to every judge that had gone that circuit"—which was confirmed by several gentlemen then present; but Matthew would not suffer the trial to go on till he had paid for the present. At Salisbury the Dean and Chapter, having, according to custom, presented him with six sugar loaves in his circuit, he made his servants pay for the sugar before he would try their cause.

A beautiful testimony to the unspotted life of Archbishop Ussher was borne by Bishop Burnet, who said of him: "In free and frequent conversation I had with him, for twenty-five years, I never heard him utter a word which had not a tendency to edification; and I never saw him in any other frame than that in which I wish to be found when I come to die."

The influence which true religion exerts over a man in all the relations of life, is well shown in a conversation between two workmen, over a piece of work which one of them was doing:

"Are you going to let that pass?" said one workman to another, a shade of surprise in his voice.

"Why not?" was the answer, "it will never be seen."

"Would you buy the article if you knew just how it was made?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because it might give out in a year, instead of lasting five years."

"And are you going to let that job pass, when you know that whoever buys it will be cheated?" said the fellow-workman.

"Oh, you're more nice than wise," returned the other, with a toss of the head. "You draw things too fine."

"Suppose Mr. Gray, down at the store, were to sell you stuff for pants that he knew would drop to pieces in less than six months; wouldn't you call him a swindler?"

"Perhaps I would."

"Is there really any difference in the cases? Whoever buys this article that you are making, will be cheated out of his money. You will not deny that. As much cheated as you would be if Gray sold you rotten cloth."

The journeyman shrugged his shoulders and arched his eyebrows.

"We must draw things fine," resumed the other, "if we would be fair and honest. Morality has no special bearing, but applies to all men's dealings with their fellow-men. To wrong another for gain to ourselves, is dishonest. Is not that so?"

"You slight this job, that you might get it done in a shorter time than would be possible if you made it strong in every part. Thus in order to gain a dollar or two more than honest work will give, you let an article leave your hands that will prove a cheat to the man that buys it. I tell you it is not right! We must do as we would be done by in our work, as in everything else. There are not two codes of honesty—one for shoppers and one for workmen. Whoever wrongs his neighbor out of his money, cheats him."

The other journeyman turned away from his monitor, looked half offended and bent over his work-bench. At first he went on finishing his job; but after awhile his fellow-workman saw him take out a defective piece of wood and then remove another which had not been properly squared and jointed. Observing him still, he saw him detach a piece which had simply been driven into place and which gave no real strength, and after selecting another, three or four inches longer, set it by mortise and tenon firmly into the article he was making.

All this was done at an expenditure of time not exceeding half an hour. "There," said he, in a tone of satisfaction, speaking to his fellow-workman, "if that does not last forever, it will not be my fault."

"A good honest job," remarked the other, "and you feel better about it than you would have done had it left your hands to cheat the purchaser out of his money?"

"Yes, I do," the answer came frankly.

"How much more time has it cost you to do this work well?" was asked.

"Oh, not over an hour or two."

"And the thing is worth ten dollars more to the buyer. In other words, it is a well made article, as it should be, and will cheat nobody. Now you have done as you would be done by; have acted as a Christian man should."

"Oh, as to that, I don't profess to be a Christian," said the other, "I'm no hypocrite."

"A Christian profession is one thing and a Christian life another," answered the fellow-workman. "All professors are not Christians. Religion is a thing of daily life, and unless it comes down into a man's work and business, it is not worth a copper. No amount of church-going or praying or singing will save a man, if he is not honest in his dealings. He must do as he would be done by—must begin just as you have begun—by refusing to wrong his neighbor, though tempted to do so that he may get an advantage for himself."

"A new kind of religion that," remarked the journeyman.

"As old as Christianity," said the other, "and the only kind that will save men. 'As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets.' He who said this knew all about it. And I am sure that if we begin to be just to our neighbor, to try all things, to do as we would be done by, our feet will have entered the way that leads Heavenward—and though we may be a long way from that happy country, if we keep walking on, we shall surely get there in the end."

Our physical life consists in hungering, and silencing hunger; and as long as this alternation keeps on, we need fear but little from disease. Thus, too, with our souls. Great passions we must have, but we equally must be constantly overcoming them. The soul's health consists not so much in freedom from passions, as in victorious struggle with them. And herein is the wisdom of Heaven best seen, in making our lives so that we do not properly live unless we have passions, but are not content until they are conquered. God thus gives us plenty to do. And is this not the secret of life, to have plenty to do?

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Twenty-ninth of Eighth Month. We were taken twelve miles; crossed the North River at Cossackie; we continued our journey into Green County, New Baltimore township to the meeting of Coeymans, which was tolerably large and a favored one. The great Head of the Church deigned to be near, both in testimony and supplication, in which I was engaged, to the sweet peace of my own mind, with a thankful heart unto the Lord for all his benefits.

Near this meeting there is a most splendid landscape scenery, looking toward the east, a distance of twenty or thirty miles, if not fifty, which appears to be a gradual rise extending from north to south, perhaps two hundred miles in view, the fields and farms largely interspersed amongst the green timber. * * *

Second of Ninth Month. Attended Stanford Meeting, which [was] very small. From here we were taken by Stephen Upton four miles to Paul Upton's, near the Creek Meeting, which, through the blessing of the Divine Master, was a refreshing season, in which we were brought near together in the love of the Gospel of his dear Son, who was near unto us, filling our hearts with joy and gladness.

The weather is extremely warm; the thermometer stood at 89 to-day.

Was taken by our kind friend, Paul Upton, eight miles [to] Isaac Thorne's, at Nine Partners, and lodged.

Fourth of Ninth Month. Last evening received a letter from David and Margaret Lupton, dated 23d of Seventh Month, which was truly acceptable; but I was much disappointed in not getting some of later date.

Fifth of Ninth Month—First-day. Attended Nine Partner's meeting, and dined at the boarding school, Benjamin and Mary Griffin, superintendents; said to be very suitable for that station. James Chase teacher of the boys, and Mary Hoag of the girls.

We also attended in the afternoon the reading meeting of the scholars to good satisfaction; and then were carried by our kind friend, Isaac Thorne, sixteen miles to D. Dickinson's, and lodged; his wife in a decline—weak and low.

Sixth of Ninth Month. Three miles to the landing in Poughkeepsie, on the North River. The boat which we expected to have taken was broken down, so that we had to wait for the Albany, at twelve o'clock; and, missing her quick motion, I was left. Was taken by a Friend to Isaac Powell's; his wife a Friend, and he a Hicksite. Went after tea to see Daniel S. Dean, a minister who was sick and discouraged; my visit to him was reviving, and as he expressed, "as a brook by the way." I then went down to the hotel at the wharf, and waited until ten o'clock in the evening, when the Columbia arrived. I immediately went aboard of her, and landed three o'clock in the morning at New York, eighty-two miles, which was on the 7th of Ninth Month. * * *

Eighth of Ninth Month. [To] Purchase Monthly Meeting, which was considerably large, and a favored opportunity, in which the beloved Master deigned to be near to our humbling and refreshment together. Blessed be his great name! * * *

Ninth of Ninth Month. Attended Chappaqua Monthly Meeting; a goodly and honest-hearted body of Friends, who were brought to the witness of Truth. * * *

Tenth of Ninth Month. This place [Ama-walk] lies near the Croton River, where the inhabitants of New York have erected a very high breastwork to raise up an artificial lake (to supply the city of New York with water).

Attended the Monthly Meeting of Amawalk to good satisfaction.

* * * * *

Fourteenth of Ninth Month. Went and dined with Silas Downing, and at four o'clock had an appointed meeting at Beakman, which through the favor of our blessed Lord, was good meeting, and peace was the companion of my mind, with a thankful heart unto Israel God. * * *

Attended Oswego Monthly Meeting, held in Poughkeepsie, a village of about eight thousand inhabitants, which, in the forepart, was a long and suffering time, on my part, in silence; but at the close of the business, I requested the opening of the partitions between the men and women, which was united with, and a time of relief to my exercised mind it proved to be through the goodness and mercy of the Lord.

Dined at David Sherman's; and, after looking over a very fine cabinet and general assortment of rich sea-shells, received a present from his wife (Hephzibah) of those shells; and then was carried by him across the North River to Samuel Adams's in Ulster County, and lodged. * * *

Eighteenth. Called and lodged at Jacob Heaton's—a good Friend, adhering to the ancient landmarks.

Nineteenth of Ninth Month. From here we were taken seven miles to Marlborough Meeting, where Samuel Adams belongs; a very suffering time, in which I felt that if there was not a deepening in the root of life, and a coming into a more lively exercise of mind in service to the Lord, that "their house would be left desolate;" and that, in the sifting of Satan, "man would be blown away as the chaff of the summer threshing-floor."

From here, returned seven miles back again to J. H.'s, and had an appointed meeting in Plattekill, at four o'clock in the evening, which was largely attended; and a blessed season of heavenly favor, through the mercy of the ever-slumbering Shepherd of Israel. * * *

Twenty-second of Ninth Month. Four and a half miles to the Monthly Meeting of Marlborough, which was considerably large, and time of renewed favor, in which I was sensible of his love and power, who is stronger than death, to bear me up, as "upon eagle's wing whilst bearing testimony to the Truth as it is in Jesus, to the refreshment of many hearts, the acknowledgment of thanksgiving and praise upon the bended knees to Him who is God over all, blessed forevermore!

After which, we dined at Smith Pine's, a farm thence down the North River; passed through Newburgh, and put up at Nathan Adams's, at Cornwall, fourteen miles.

* * * * *

Twenty-third of Ninth Month. Attended the Monthly Meeting of Cornwall; the state of the meeting at a low ebb. The world and the spirit of the world have got the upper room in many minds, and the seed suffers—pressed down as the wheels of a cart load with sheaves.

I had much service amongst them, to the relief of my mind, and to the rejoicing of the honest-hearted.

Twenty-fourth of Ninth Month. Attended Cornwall Select Preparative Meeting, in which I had considerable labor, and a part of it el-and plain dealing, which brought peace to my mind, and was acknowledged to be the truth; and the meeting closed in solemn supplication by Anna Adams.

We were then taken to Newburg hastily to meet the steamboat Albany at half-past one o'clock; but she breaking her engine five or six miles up the river, disappointed us and many others, so that we were under the necessity of waiting for the Highlander at five o'clock to leave Newburg; and to go up the river to take the passengers of the wreck back,—which made us late in New York, eleven or twelve o'clock at night.

Twenty-fifth of the Ninth Month. Went to John Hancock's and rested, being Seventh-day of the week. This evening, when going to bed, was taken with a violent chill, and fever followed. * * *

Twenty-eighth. Some better; made some social visits to John Wood's, and Solomon Griffith's, and Henry Hinsdale's.

Twenty-ninth. Still unwell. Attended the reparative Meeting in this city; a low, suffering time in silence; but when the business came on, still more so. My dear companion at the house had a few words to drop, I thought, suitable to the state of the meeting; but for some days past, I have felt like unto a man having been much engaged in the harvest field, and now having a little respite, or rest, with quietness, as a canopy covering my mind, and feeling, according to my measure, gratitude of soul unto the great giver of all good.

Thirtieth of Ninth Month. Still unwell, but left New York at six o'clock this morning, and landed in Philadelphia between twelve and one o'clock, and lodged at Joseph Elkinton's.

First-day of the Tenth Month. I still continue unwell, and lay by two days. * * *

Now 5th of Tenth Month. Here I had an appointed meeting (Abington, Montgomery county, Penn.), which was a season of renewed vigor. Dined at Margaret Shoemaker's, and in the afternoon was taken by Charles Shoemaker to Plymouth. At this place we had a four-o'clock meeting to satisfaction, and lodged at Hannah Williams's.

Sixth of Tenth Month. Here we had a meeting to good satisfaction, and dined at the house of the Widow Spencer, whose husband lately deceased; and had an opportunity with her children and widow, with some others, to express humbling admiration. Blessed be the Lord forever! * * *

Now First-day morning, Tenth Month 10th. In the forenoon, at ten o'clock, attended North Meeting [Phila.] a large, plain, and solid body of Friends; but a way did not open to say much of the ministerial line.

In the afternoon, attended Arch Street Meeting, which also is large, in which I was silent. Took tea at Thomas Kite's, North Fifth Street, No. 32.

Made some other social calls, and returned to George M. Elkinton's, North Seventh Street, No. 349; and my dear friend, Thomas Kite, accompanied us there, and a number of other friends coming in to spend the evening; and whilst in the midst of conversation, a solemn silence took place, in which Thomas Kite bore a pretty lively testimony to the Truth; after which I felt my mind drawn to speak of the things of the enemy; that when our blessed Lord was personally with his disciples, he forewarned them, with a "Verily, verily, I say unto thee Peter, addressing him in the name of the disciples, that Satan desireth to have you, that he may sift you as wheat," and enlarged somewhat upon it; showing that the same old adversary was desiring to have us, that he might sift us as wheat; and also He who then spoke to warn his disciples was now speaking in the ear of the soul, warning us that Satan desireth to have us, that he might have us, and make his inroads among us, &c., &c. After which, dear T. K. had a comfortable testimony, showing his unity with what was said; and the favor it was, after being so long engaged laboring in the field, that preservation was witnessed through the goodness of the Lord, or to this import. After which, I was drawn forth in the spirit of supplication, which, through the goodness of Him who dwelt in the bush, and consumed it not, so this holy flame of Divine love came over our souls, humbling us in great bowedness of soul, consuming only the chaff.

I now felt easy to return home.

Eleventh of Tenth Month. Took the car at the depot in Eighth Street on Market, six in the morning, with a peaceful mind and a thankful heart unto the Lord. All through the course of the day was my soul filled with gratitude and praise to Him who had been my shield and strong tower in this day of warfare and conflict. Also remembering at times, that this day twelve months have elapsed since the decease of my dear wife, and that very soon I must follow; and, oh! that I may be in readiness at all times to meet my Judge in the heavens above!

Landed at Harrisburg, one hundred and six miles, before three in the afternoon, and lodged at a hotel.

Twelfth of the Month. Took the canal boat for Hollidaysburg, where we took the car across the Alleghany Mountains, thirty-six miles, to Johnstown, where we again took the canal boat for Pittsburgh, where we landed last night near twelve o'clock, and have been waiting for the boat New Haven, which was advertised to leave at ten o'clock Seventh-day, 16th inst.; but here we have waited all day, whilst about fifteen or eighteen hands have been lading her with freight, bound for Louisville and Nashville. Now in the evening of the 16th, the boat New Haven moved off about one mile, and then lay at anchor all night.

Seventeenth. This morning the Captain put the boat in motion down the river, and against dark we were within eleven miles of Wheeling, where the Captain again hauled in his boat for the night.

Eighteenth of Tenth Month. A very foggy morning, which caused a delay. At length we landed in Wheeling between ten and eleven o'clock, where I had to wait until five o'clock in the evening for the stage, in which I landed at Parker Askew's, Saint Clairsville, in the evening. * * *

Twentieth. Once more met my dear friends in a Preparative Meeting capacity, which was grateful; and so home in the evening, one hundred and twenty-five miles from Pittsburgh.

William Kennard was born 25th of Third Month, 1787; died 13th of Eighth Month, 1862.

THE vine saith unto me, "Oh, clip me not! oh, lop me not!" But I know better than to listen to thy pleading. Thou shalt bear fruit the richer for the clipping and lopping. Man saith, "Oh, my God, afflict me not, hurt me not!" But God saith, "Thou, too, art better for the lopping and clipping."

Be gentle. The sea is held in check not by a wall of brick but by a beach of sand.

From Slavery to Freedom: The Story of Martha Ann.

BY ALICE M. BACON.

Away back in 1814, while the sin of slavery still rested lightly upon the national conscience, and little thought of the blood and ruin that was to grow out of it, disturbed either North or South, there was born on a plantation in Hanover County, Va., a little slave girl who was named Martha Ann. Things were comfortable enough on the plantation in those days, and the little mulatto, as she trotted back and forth on errands, "toted" water from the springs for the great house, and did whatever other work she was able to do, never worried her head much about her position or prospects. To be sure, she remembered afterwards, when her children, free and with a fixed standard of comfort, thought they were badly off when they had to go bare foot in the summer, how not a hand on her old master's plantation was allowed a pair of shoes until Christmas, and how her own path to the spring was often marked in early winter by blood-tracks through the snow when her uncovered feet had cracked with the cold. She remembered too, how on those cold days she would stand with her bare feet on the spring branch for the sake of the warmth that its waters afforded.

But these memories were not painful nor were they recounted as a part of the hardships of slavery, they were only brought up before the children to show them how little they really needed the things that they had come to regard as absolute necessities. The real hardship that sank like a hot iron into the woman's soul came later, and her girlhood and early womanhood on the old plantation, were as happy probably as girlhood usually is when no great wrench comes to break off the steady, even current of healthy animal life, amid well-known surroundings and turn it out of its accustomed course.

The curse of slavery to the slave is that he can in no way control his destiny. He is helpless in the disposition of his own affairs, and his entire happiness in life may hinge upon the thoughtlessness, caprice, or death of some individual who cares nothing for the person whose fate is so indissolubly linked with his own.

At sixteen years of age she was married to Washington Fields, a slave on a neighboring plantation. Two children were born to her, and in her care and love for these children Martha Ann grew into the strong, brave womanhood of which she was capable.

When Martha Ann was eighteen, death came to the old plantation and carried off the master. The young mother and her offspring were divided up between three heirs, sisters fortunately, so the family was not separated at once. As soon as he was old enough, however, her eldest son, John, was hired out in Richmond, and Tinsley, the younger boy, was sold by his mistress to a man living in the next county. This sale nearly broke the poor mother's heart and her grief over it so endangered her life and usefulness that an arrangement was made by which the boy should be allowed to visit his mother. The visits occurred at longer and longer intervals, until at last danger to life and reason seemed to be over and the visits were discontinued. She has often told her children since, how, on the night before Tinsley was taken away from her, she sat up all night making him a pair of shoes of rabbit skin, and how, as soon as he was passed over into the hands of his new master, these last gift of his poor slave mother were taken from him and he was forced to make his journey to his new home barefooted through the cold Virginia mud.

This experience set Martha Ann to thinking, and she resolved to do her best to prevent, if possible, similar grief in the future. She went to her mistress and by tears and entreaties obtained from her at last a promise that she should never be sold nor treated cruelly, nor be separated from any of her children. This promise her mistress faithfully kept, and when she found herself growing old and feeble, she did her best to insure a kind mistress and considerate treatment for Martha Ann in the future. One day she called for the slave woman and told her that as she herself could not live much longer Martha Ann might choose some person to whom she and her children should be given.

"Why not free me and my children?" was the question of the slave. "I can't do that," was the reply, and so Martha Ann must be content. She used the privilege of choice deliberately and carefully, and after a search of many days' duration she finally found a young relative of her mistress who agreed, should the slave family be given to her, to make the same promise to Martha Ann that her old mistress had made and kept so faithfully.

Accordingly Martha Ann and her children were passed over to the new mistress, a comfortable house was built for them, and it seemed as if the great fear of her life was gone by, for she had now a young mistress who had bound herself by a solemn promise before accepting the gift of the slave family from her dying relative. All went well until the young mistress married and removed, taking Martha Ann and her children with her, to a neighboring plantation. Here they lived for five years—years in which Martha Ann learned, too late for her own good, that the promise of her young mistress meant nothing at all, and that she had by her own choice, placed herself in the hands of a heartless woman, who did not hesitate to inflict incessant cruelty upon her children as well as upon herself. If the slave ventured, as at times she did, to remind her cruel mistress of her broken promise, the only answer she received was: "You are a nigger, and so are your children. If you don't believe it, go look in the glass."

At the end of five years the master purchased a farm and tavern at Hanover Court House, to which he removed all hands. During her stay there things went worse than before. The work was harder, the punishments more frequent. At last Martha Ann's oldest daughter, Louisa, was sold from her for the sake of buying horses and carriage for her mistress. Poor Martha Ann saw her forlorn hope, to which she had clung through all the dark days of cruelty and suffering—the hope of keeping her children together—shattered wholly at last. "You said you would never sell any of my children," she said to her mistress. "You're nothing but a nigger, and if you put on any airs, I'll make your master slash your back," was the only comfort she received in her sorrow. For six months she was on the verge of insanity. She prayed night and day, and Sundays went into the woods and with strong crying and tears, writhing on the ground, she besought the Lord for help to carry her burden. At last one Sunday she came out of the woods laughing and said that the Lord had told her that she should see her daughter Louisa again, and that she and all her children should be free. Confident in the heavenly vision, her courage never waned after that, and the strong faith in the promised freedom carried her through the fiery trials and the deep waters in safety.

THE CHILDREN.

[On seeing long trains, in their innocent beauty, passing orderly along from school to their respective homes.]

BY C. S. COPE.

Hail, ye bright and beauteous creatures,
Basking in life's early spring,
Fancy fain would give your features
More than youth and health can bring.
As I see you rising round me,
Adoration swells my soul;
May the One whose hand has blessed you
All your ways and works control!
May the precious pearl of promise,
Heaven's own pure, imperial gem,
Ornament each soul immortal
As a royal diadem!
'Round unrivalled mental beauty
Virtue's heavenly mantle throw;
It will give to every feature
Grace, which folly can't bestow.
Have your lamps, then, trimmed and burning,
Step by step your light diffuse,
Time is given us by the moment,
And not one to waste or lose.
All the actions of our lives
Make their mark as they retreat,
As each puncture leaves a dot
On the telegraphic sheet.
I have passed by happy childhood,
Past wild passions, youthful rage,
Crossed bold manhood's haughty summit;
Down along the line of age
I have watched the countless columns
Intertwining as they go,
Seen the humble hands exalted,
And the haughty head laid low,
Wept o'er pride and vain ambition
Tossed on Time's tempestuous wave,
When I thought how short the transit
From the cradle to the grave.
Still I number with my blessings
Sparks around life's smoldering hearth,
A heart that throbs in fond affection
And still bows to sterling worth;
Still can feel that love abounding
Envy never can destroy,
That is blessed in others' blessings,
Can rejoice in others' joys.

WEST CHESTER, Fifth Month 25th, 1892.

A LITTLE WORD LOST.

I lost a very little word
Only the other day:
A very naughty little word
I had not meant to say.
If only it were really lost,
I should not mind a bit;
I think I should deserve a prize
For really losing it.

For if no one could ever find
Again that little word,
So that no more from any lips
Could it be ever heard,
I'm sure we all of us would say
That it was something fine
With such completeness to have lost
That naughty word of mine.

But then it wasn't really lost
When from my lips it flew;
My little brother picked it up,
And now he says it, too.
Mamma said that the worst would be
I could not get it back;
But the worst of it now seems to me,
I'm always on its track.

Mamma is sad; papa looks grieved;
Johnnie has said it twice;
Of course it is no use for me
To tell him it's not nice.
When you lose other things, they're lost;
But lose a naughty word,
And for every time 'twas heard before,
Now twenty times 'tis heard.

If it were only really lost!
Oh, then I should be glad
I let it fall so carelessly
The day that I got mad.
Lose other things, you never seem
To come upon their track;
But lose a naughty little word,
It's always coming back.

A TESTIMONY OF THE MONTHLY MEETING OF FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA, CONCERNING OUR LATE FRIEND, REBECCA S. ALLEN.

We feel that our beloved friend, Rebecca S. Allen, was an example of piety and virtue, and that in the various relations of life she adorned her Christian profession.

As we reverently believe that she has gone to receive a better inheritance, we think it may be meet for us to issue this testimony, that her survivors, and especially those in early years, may thereby be encouraged to a similar life of dedication, believing that as they bow their neck to the yoke and cross of Christ, and look to the Lord for their support, they also will be enabled to dignify their calling, and know the Lord to be their shield and stay and exceeding great reward.

She was the daughter of Samuel and Ruth Leeds, of New Jersey, the former an approved minister in our religious Society, and was born the 4th of First Month, 1815.

In early life she was engaged to choose the one thing needful, that good part which Marchose, and which our blessed Lord declare should never be taken away from her. This promise, we believe, was realized by our dear Friend, for it was evident to those who knew and loved her, that her many and varied cares and interests, the enjoyments and sorrows that were her portion, had not power to deprive her of this precious treasure; but that through a her love for her Redeemer and his cause, remained steadfast.

In the year 1837, she was united in marriage to our esteemed friend John C. Allen, to whom she proved a loving and faithful companion for more than fifty years. In her family she was an example of meekness and faith, of patience and kindness. As a mother she was greatly concerned for the religious welfare of her children; not desiring great possessions for them, but ever fearful of their being too much engrossed in the things of this world, or of becoming too deeply interested in matters, which however good in themselves, might claim the attention too closely.

Her heart and her home were open to entertain strangers, to whom, as to those who shared more closely her watchful care and sympathy, she was felt to be a loving friend and counsellor.

She was endowed with good intellectual abilities, which under the sanctifying influence of Divine Grace, qualified her for usefulness in the church. In our meetings for discipline the clear expression of her deliberate judgment, resulting from familiar acquaintance with our Christian discipline, and a watchful seeking for the mind of Truth, rendered her a valuable helper in conducting the business of the meeting. She was concerned to perform faithfully the duties of overseer, watching over the flock of love.

As an elder she was lively in spirit, and ready to enter into sympathy with ministers in their exercises, handing forth tender caution and encouragement; and to these the sweetness and savor of her spirit were particularly acceptable.

In the autumn of 1886 she was brought low by illness, and grave doubts were entertained of her recovery. At one time during this sickness she remarked, "My shortcomings have been very great." The reply was made, "Not greater than his mercy, that none of us have anything to trust to but mercy," to which she fully responded and said, "Nothing but infinite mercy," and "We must pray that every defilement may be washed away." At one time she referred to the 90th Psalm, particularly to the words, "Thou hast been our dwelling-place for all generations." On its being read to her, she remarked, "It contains a great deal," and repeated the verse, "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

At her request her beloved friend, Abigail Hutchinson, whom she survived but a few weeks, came to see her. After a little conversation and a short season of silence, A. H. spoke words as follows:—

"I feel it a privilege, my beloved friend, to be by thy side and partake of this precious, precious feeling, and I have remembered the words of our dear Redeemer, 'Peace I leave unto you, my peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.' I believe thy dear Saviour is with thee. The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath thou hast been, and art, and will be, the everlasting Father. He whom through a long life thou hast loved and served will not leave thee, but will fulfil his promise, 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee.' Whether thy art raised from the bed of sickness or not, I believe thou wilt fully be admitted into a mansion of rest."

From this attack her strength again returned in a time, so as to enable her to mingle with her family and friends, and not unfrequently to attend our religious meetings. A close trial was awaited her, in the decline and removal of a beloved daughter. This affliction was borne with loving submission to the Divine will.

During a gradual decline of some months, which had been preceded by several slight attacks of paralysis, she was frequently unable to give much expression to her feelings, but the earnestness and sweetness of her spirit remained.

We believe her work had been done in the right time, and when the release from suffering came, that she was permitted, through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, to join the innumerable multitude "which came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." She died on the 31st day of Seventh Month, 1900, in the seventy-sixty year of her age.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Found in the right place and at the right time. Opportunities for discovery of whatever is right and best for us to enjoy, if once lost, produce great unhappiness. The Bible confirms the fact, that "time and chance happeneth unto us." The wise King said: "To every thing there is a season and a time to every purpose under the heaven." Failing to observe the times and seasons which are in Divine hands contributes in large measure to lower in the scale of being. Whereas it is found that in order to rise, every chance should be improved for rising in the scale of being.

The providences of God to individuals are abundant, if only sought for. And even without being sought for, in mercy they come, and oh, how great is the importance of entering into mercy's door when in mercy it is opened for us. Both man's and child's necessity often proves God's opportunity to bless, as in the instance of Samuel, the Prophet, to whom the Lord spake when but a child. He, not acquainted with the voice, was told by one who knew the voice of God, that should he again hear it, to answer, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth," and he obeyed. My first knowledge of God embraced an opportunity not to be forgotten. When a school girl without an opportunity for more than a limited education, except by pursuing long walks, going and returning from school each day, there came a time when in a lonely spot and all alone, out of sight of human dwellings, before me a piece of woods through which my path led, with great timidity of feeling, and at all times, especially when the Evening Star twinkled behind me. This one time of which I now speak, a sudden overshadowing seemed in my whole being to rest upon me. Filled with wonder, I stood with feelings of awe, querying what does this mean? The tears trickling down the cheeks as the spirit within me was broken and contrited as never before. Love divine, universal in its flowing, became the ruling element of the youthful heart. In this condition of feeling I resumed my walk, querying within, how can it be that the Heavenly Father loves me, but an unworthy child, that has never sought his favor, only as taught to live in his fear and made sorry for little matters of offence against what I called conscience. Ever since that blessed day, through years many, have I kept in view that "God" is Love. Yes, Love ineffable, inconceivable, unchangeable.

"Lo this God is the God we adore,
Our faithful unchangeable friend,
His Love is as great as his power,
And neither hath measure nor end."

FROM "THE AUSTRALIAN FRIEND."

To the members of the Society of Friends in any part of the world, in any portion, even the most lonely, whatever concerns the prosperity and usefulness of their own Society, must have a special interest. Viewed in this light the condition of what has hitherto been a portion of our branch of the Christian Church in the Western States of America is a proper subject for enquiry by anyone who is solicitous for its well-being. To us, dwellers in the Southern Hemisphere, rumors have for many years reached us of serious and surprising departures from the practices of our forefathers, in those far away Western States. We have been unwilling to believe them; we hoped that it was circumstances of their position alone which gave color, through misapprehension, to differences in method which seemed when they reached us to be strangely at variance from our own testimonies. Those important testimonies apart from which we have no claim to a separate existence, but which upheld in faithfulness abundantly justify us. In spite of all our charitable hopes, however, the evidence increases from year to year, and is becoming too convincing to be longer ignored. Our Friends, as we still call them, are manifestly on the "down grade," and going down the incline with constantly accelerated speed. It is painful to bring forward the evidence. It is sufficient to recall the fact testified to by many witnesses, that in places at least, their meetings for worship have no longer any correspondence with a genuine Friends' meeting. They have become a "service," in which the worshippers look no longer directly to the Lord to feed them, but to man for a stated performance. We desire to be not wanting in Christian charity, we can believe they are a zealous, earnest, warm-hearted Christian people; but they are abandoning us and our cause and service, and accepting an easier and more popular position. What can have led to all this? Is it not the vain and unworthy desire, by all means to increase in numbers? To have from year to year to congratulate themselves on so many added to their own ranks. They might have taken hundreds with the gospel net, without embracing them all as members, and perhaps thereby swamping the very cause they join. We believe it is Professor Huxley who writes to the effect that, "unless a religious body stoops down and popularizes its ideas there will be little response. The mass are not able or willing to accept a purely spiritual religion." This would appear to be the aim of our Western Friends—to stoop down and popularize their ideas; and the Quaker idea is vanishing in the process.

When Robert Douglas, of Indiana, was in our parts some fifteen years since, the writer of this paper, in quiet conversation at his own house, endeavored to ascertain from him what was the condition of those new recruits, which even then they were enlisting in large numbers. R. Douglas confessed they, most of them, knew very little of the principles of Friends; but, said he, we try to teach them. How is it now? Have the pupils taught the teachers; or, is it, that the leaders of the people cause them to err? Anyhow, whilst willing to hope that much good has been done to many souls, it is lamentable that in this day, when such determined efforts are being made to exalt the mediatorship of man; whilst ritualists are rapidly increasing in numbers and in power, and saying in effect believe in me, confess to me, look to me, therefore only indirectly to Christ; it is lamentable to hear that numbers who by conviction and by training ought to be loyally upholding the principles especially given to our Society to maintain and to display before the universal Church, should be deserting them for something less lofty and pure. From much that we hear from authentic sources, it seems evident that many persons who have recently joined the Friends of the "Far West," can actually know nothing of a genuine Friends' Meeting, and would be greatly surprised and mystified if they attended one. They would wonder when the "service" would begin, and what had become of the "pastor." Such being, as we have reason to believe, the case, the addition of numbers, of which we hear so much, is not a gain but a loss. The "Friends" are congratulating themselves on their numerical increase, and in the same breath congratulating themselves on their progress towards extinction as Friends. No church of Friends can exist, apart from loyalty to pure, that is spiritual Christianity. The Friends, I am speaking of, are apparently drawing near to the Wesleyans or Salvationists; now if a smaller body draws near to a larger body, it can only be a question of time, how soon the smaller body will be absorbed by the larger: this is a natural law. Can nothing be done to turn the tide? Will it continue to ebb and ebb, until nothing is left of Friends but the old name traced on the deserted shore? If it must be so; if those we have called our brethren and sisters in religious profession, will drift away from us, we are at all events at liberty to bid them a friendly farewell.

Now what is the lesson for us in Australasia to learn and profit by when adverting to this decadence in America. We are not tempted to stoop down and popularize by any prospect of being numerous, and without lowering and popularizing there is certainly no chance of our being numerous. Let us endeavor to hold our own, and to be something genuine if we are anything at all. We have a case; an impregnable standpoint if we only know it. What is truth? It comes from and through Him who is "the Truth:" and not from man. We profess it, and if we can be shown any higher truth than we yet know, we are free to go higher. But this is a widely different thing to letting down the truth to please the natural mind; a widely different thing to accommodating our practices to the tastes of mankind. We must be content to be few at present. There are circumstances where five can speak as loudly as fifty or five hundred. In every position we are placed, in every case we have to deal with, we should revert to our principles and act up to them. This tells. Hardly anything is more surprising than the influence, it may be the unacknowledged influence, of Friends in England, earnestly and consistently put forth on public questions: an opinion that secures respect though it may often gall those in high position: and yet how few are their numbers in proportion to the nation at large.

So it is everywhere, the true voice commands respect and attention. The influence, we speak of, is only gained by consistency to principle: mere numbers have no such influence. We should remember this. Conscious of possessing enlightened views on many subjects we should accept our responsibility. We should let our light be seen. The penetrating power of the light depends upon its own quality, and not on those who display it. For those amongst whom we live, and for ourselves how profitable is a "religious life and conversation consistent with our Christian profession." Truly, Christianity is a life to live. And so living, we are in fellowship with all that makes for righteousness, on the side of the good and true, and may hope that our presence in the world, however humble and retired is our position is helpful to our fellow men and to the glory of God. Let us not be discouraged. Our cause is the cause of truth: to lower it is to make it contemptible; it must be real and genuine, or it will be despised as a spurious article, which has no intrinsic value, and is presented under a false label.

We will hope and trust that our Society will continue to live on in the world as the exponent of genuine Quakerism. Its testimony is of immense value. We use the word Quakerism, as a convenient one, to express our apprehension of Apostolic Christianity. A Christianity wholly apart from priestism and from sacraments. This Christianity is independent of the Society of Friends. It is self-existent. It will live on, if all men appear to have forsaken it. The communication of the Divine Spirit with the spirit of man; what we mean by immediate revelation: the making known to the individual man or woman the will of God for him or her for comfort, guidance, instruction or service, is an absolutely imperishable fact of experience. "I know it—God told me," is the testimony of many an humble Christian disciple in all walks of life. The assurance only comes of experimental knowledge. In a lowly walk this voice is heard: "this is the way, walk thou in it." We Friends may abandon our testimony to it: we may like others lose our faith and cease to listen, but assuredly if we do, others will arise to bear their testimony, to stand where we once stood, and to lift up and to display our fallen banner.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Visit to Edgepelick.

Through the kindness of a friend residing near Medford, New Jersey, an opportunity was furnished, on the 18th of Seventh Month last, to visit the old Indian Reservation at Edgepelick, in Burlington County, situated a few miles S. E. of Medford, on the waters of Edgepelick Creek, a branch of Springer's Creek, which is a tributary to the Batsto River, whose waters enter Great Bay on the sea coast, through the Mullica River, into which it empties.

As Edgepelick was one of the last resting places in the State for the New Jersey Indians, a short historical narrative may properly introduce a description of our visit.

The relations between the Indians of New Jersey and the white settlers had always been amicable. The land that was needed was fairly purchased and paid for, and mutual kindness was manifested. Henry Armitt Brown says: "At the same time at which the savages of Virginia were punishing cold-blooded murder with passionate bloodshed, and scourging with fury every plantation from the Potomac to the James; and on the northern sky the light of blazing villages, from one end of New England to the other, marked the despairing vengeance of king Philip, the banks of the Delaware smiled in unbroken peace, and this simple-hearted native, conscious of the fate which would speedily overtake his people,—which no one foretold sooner or more touchingly than he,—was saying in a council in Burlington, 'We are your brothers, and intend to live like brothers with you. We will have a broad path for you and us to walk in. If an Indian be asleep in this path, the Englishman will pass him by and do him no harm; and if the Englishman be asleep in it, the Indian shall pass him by and say, 'He is an Englishman, he is asleep, let him alone.' The path shall be plain; there shall not be in it a stump to hurt the feet.'"

As the number of white settlers increased, tract after tract of land was purchased from different Indian chiefs. These were not always contiguous to each other, but would be described in the deed by natural boundaries, such as the head waters of certain streams, etc.,—which left intermediate and undefined patches, to which the Indian title had not been extinguished. To satisfy the Indians, and remove any cause of dispute, at a treaty held at Easton, Pa., in 1758, the commissioners for New Jersey purchased of the Minisinks and Wapings the title to all the patches of land in northern New Jersey, which had been before unsold, for $1,000, and a similar purchase was made of the lands in the southern part of the province.

"In consequence of the expectations given the Indian inhabitants, the commissioners, with the consent of the Indian attorneys, purchased a tract of upwards of 3,000 acres, called Brotherton, situated in Burlington County, in which is a cedar swamp and saw-mill, adjoining to many thousand acres of poor, uninhabited land, suitable for hunting, and convenient also for fishing on the sea coast. The deed was taken in the name of the governor and commissioners and their heirs, in trust for the use of the Indian natives who have or do reside in this colony south of Rariton, and their successors forever, with a clause providing that it shall not be the power of the Indians, their successors any of them, to lease or sell any part thereof and any persons (Indians excepted) attempt to settle there, to be removed by warrant for a justice of the peace; no timber to be cut by the Indians, under penalty of 40 shillings fine for every tree. The Indians, soon after purchase, removed to the settlement, and there remain (A.D. 1765) to their satisfaction, having their usual means of living very convenient. They were assisted by the government in the removing and buildings. There are about 100 persons seated here, and 20 at Weekpink or tract formerly secured by an English right, the family of Henry Charles, an Indian Saem."—Smith's History of New Jersey.

This Brotherton tract in some of the records is called Edgebilloek, and is the same more recently known as Edgepelick.

From a statement contained in the history of Byberry, Pa., it seems that these Indians, like many persons in our day, enjoyed an occasional outing from home. For a number of years it was a custom for some of them to visit Byberry every spring and occupy an orchard, where they erected wigwams and spent the summer. They were very peaceable and inoffensive, and employed themselves in making wooden trunks, barn shovels, barrels, and baskets. They were fond of hunting and fishing, and among the game they captured were the common land turtles. They would cut timber without license from the owners under the plea current among them, that when the Indians sold the country to Wm. Penn they reserved the privilege of cutting basket stuff.

In the journal of John Hunt, a minister who resided near Moorestown, N. J., under date of First Month 22d, 1777, he says: "I went with my friend, Joshua Evans, to see the poor Indians at Edgepelick, and we found them in very low circumstances as to food and raiment. Joshua took them a considerable parcel of clothes, with which the poor naked children seemed exceedingly pleased. He had also collected a number of blankets for them, and obtained money, with which he bought corn for them. This he did, because these poor creatures are too apt to lay out their money for strong drink. This visit to the Indians was an instructive lesson to us. Though they were poor, they seemed to be innocency, unity, quietude, and peace among them, even at a time [the Revolutionary war] when it was so much otherwise with the white people. Amongst the elderly women there were countenances that bespoke gravity, humility, innocence, and tranquillity."

"This visit was very satisfactory to me, though it caused me to think how lavishly we feed and pamper their horses with corn, while the poor Indians are so needy; yet are they on the whole as happy and contented, if not more so than we are, and as likely, for aught I know, to answer the end of their creation."

"First Month 2d, 1778. Joshua Evans and I went again to Edgepelick to see the Indians. We found them in a very poor, suffering condition as to food and raiment; but as to quietness and peace, they seemed much happier than many of the white people who were rich and abounded with plenty, yet were disquieted and afflicted in mind, because of the great destruction there was in the land."

"Twentieth. Joshua Evans and I went to Indiantown to carry some blankets and clothes, which Friends had bestowed to the Indians; and the poor, almost naked creatures med to receive them with abundance of thankfulness.

"Twelfth Month 7th. With the approbation of our Monthly Meeting, I joined Joshua Evans and Benjamin Smith in a visit to the Indians at Edgepelick. We had a meeting with the Indians, which seemed very open and well. We also visited the Indian families, and had some favored seasons,—the Indians appearing very tender and attentive."

On the 4th of Seventh Month, 1802, Johnant mentions that he was at a meeting appointed for the Indians at Edgepelick, who were about to remove to Oneida.

There is interesting evidence that these visits are appreciated by the Indians in an account of a visit paid in 1842, by some Friends, to the Indians residing near Fort Leavenworth, Missouri. They met with an aged Indian woman named Catharine Everett, who told them that, when a child, she lived at Evesham, New Jersey, and that she was well acquainted with Friends; and said she knew that dear old friend, Joshua Evans, the man who wore a long beard. She said she thought him the best in the world, he was so very good to the Indians.

About 1802, nearly all of the New Jersey Indians then living removed to Stockbridge, New York, and from thence to Statesburg, near Green Bay, Michigan. In 1832, being in want of money to purchase agricultural implements, they petitioned the State of New Jersey to pay them for the relinquishment of their rights in the State, and the legislature granted them $10,000. Samuel L. Southward, in presenting his claim before the legislative committee, said: "It is a proud fact in the history of New Jersey that every footstep of her soil has been acquired from the Indians by fair and voluntary release and transfer."

North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

At the late Meeting of this Body, L. Lyndon Hobbs acted as Clerk, with Josiah Nicholson and Robert C. Root as assistants.

The Yearly Meeting concluded to address a notice to the aged, feeble and sick members who were unable to attend.

David E. Sampson and wife were liberated to pay a religious visit to London and Dublin at the Yearly Meetings.

A favorable report was presented of the operations of the School, &c., located in the mountainous district of southern Virginia, and known as the Blue Ridge Mission.

It was decided to send delegates to a proposed conference of Yearly Meetings.

Two hundred and six students had been enrolled during the last year at Guilford College, of whom 119 were Friends.

Letters from North Carolina state that the business meetings and the regular meetings for worship were more satisfactory than those of a year ago; but that the morning and evening meetings [the Devotional, so-called] were "wild. There is no place for a real Friend, only to suffer." The proposed changes in the Discipline were laid over for further consideration another year, under the care of the same committee. The sum of $100 was ordered to be raised for Evangelistic work—and those Friends who were conscientiously opposed to the movement were to be excused from contributing to this fund. The visit of George Grubb (of Dublin Yearly Meeting) "was timely, and of great help to us." "We were favored at times to feel comforted with the blessed presence of our Divine Master breaking the heavenly bread amongst us."

Respectably Connected Criminals.—The Editor of the Universalist has had a conversation with a gentleman who has had much to do with criminals, who has studied them in their various phases of enforced criminality, of vicious criminality, of offensive and defensive league against society, of pretense, of reform, of penitence and extraordinary heroism, of thrilling triumph and pathetic failure. One statement is of great importance to all: "The number who descend from respectable estate to a life of crime is, in the aggregate, very large. It is not a majority of the whole class of criminals, but it comprises many more than one would expect. Poverty and material misfortune do not by any means sum up the causes of irregular life. Some form of moral defect is not only a phase of the descent, but it is the more frequent initial cause. It is surprising and depressing to observe how many criminals are respectably connected—have fathers of exemplary life and mothers of saintly character. Not heredity so much as lack of judicious oversight and firm family discipline explains the lapse and collapse of so many respectable people." There is something beyond that—the demoralization of the whole communication by lax ideas of sin and its consequences, and the general lowering of the tone of professedly religious people.—Christian Advocate.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 3, 1892.

A few days ago we listened to the conversation of a Friend who had spent a part of his summer vacation within reach of a meeting, nominally of our Society, which was equipped with a pastor, and conducted on the principle of having the services prearranged and prepared. On a few occasions he attended this meeting, and became acquainted with the pastor, whom he found to be a genial man, open and communicative. The impression formed on his mind from their intercourse was, that this preacher was a well-meaning man, but that he had no conception of what Quakerism really meant, and no appreciation of its vital principles. As an illustration of this, the man at one time undertook to serve two congregations at the same time—one professing to be Friends and the other Congregationalists.

On the same day, we had the privilege of reading a letter written by a valued Friend, who had been visiting meetings in a section of country where the old Quaker method of holding meetings for Divine worship had been discarded, and where it was no longer considered needful to wait in silence upon the Lord, looking to Him for ability to offer spiritual worship, and wrestling in spirit for a blessing; but where a form of vocal service was planned and prepared for in advance, and carried out in the wisdom of man, without full dependence on the leadings of the Spirit. The writer of the letter spoke in no uncharitable way of those who thus conducted their meetings, but he thought that among the majority of "Friends" there, there was little prospect of our distinctive doctrines and principles being revived—for they had started in a course that is calculated to lead them further and further away from them; so that, unless they are checked by an Almighty power, no one can foresee to what length their love for human inventions in matters of faith and worship will carry them.

One of the principal reasons advanced for the imitation of other denominations in their modes of worship is, that these will be more attractive to people in general than the less demonstrative meetings held after the manner of Friends, and that thus more can be added to our list of members. But the object of our existence as a Society is not so much to gather a large membership as to uphold those Christian doctrines and testimonies which we regard as "Primitive Christianity revived." Those who are drawn into the Society by a practical lowering of its standard, do not necessarily become "Quakers" by so joining; and there is little comfort or satisfaction to be derived from such accessions, which furnish no evidence that the truths of Christianity are spreading and extending their influence in the earth.

In the Australian Friend of Sixth Month 29th, we find a valuable editorial on this subject, which is inserted in another part of our paper, and which we commend to the attention of our readers.

On page 23 of the present volume of "THE FRIEND," is an Editorial article on the Discipline of our religious Society, which was intended to caution against making changes therein which would weaken the testimonies which we have upheld from the time we were first a separate people.

We have learned that some Friends have thought the language used was calculated to convey the impression that every one who desired any change in the Discipline was actuated by an unworthy motive. The Editor desires to say, that such a sweeping charge was not in his mind. There may be some advices in the Discipline which were issued to meet particular difficulties or cases of a local or temporary nature, the need for which may no longer exist, in the changed circumstances in which we live; and it may be an open question whether such advices may not be dropped without the Society or its testimonies suffering loss. Again, there may be obscurities growing out of the changes which years have made in the use of language, which may be properly remedied.

In making the revision authorized by our late Yearly Meeting, we trust a guard will be maintained against what William Levis, in the extract quoted in the Editorial referred to, calls "that libertine spirit which would lay all waste;" and that the changes made will be such as not to give uneasiness to any well-concerned Friends.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A report has been made to the Treasury Department, showing that the production of tin and terne plates proper in the United States for the year ending Sixth Month 30th was 13,646,719 pounds, while there were manufactured and tinned articles of American sheet iron and steel amounting to nearly 5,000,000 pounds. The net imports amounted to 251,854,367 pounds.

The total amount of sugar produced in the United States during the last fiscal year was 378,115,217 pounds, of which all except 13,285,806 was cane sugar. The amount of bounty paid on this production was $7,342,077. It is estimated that $9,000,000 will be required to pay the bounty for the fiscal year 1893.

A despatch from Cincinnati says that a party of capitalists from that city, Philadelphia and New York, has secured possession of a tract of land along the St. Johns and Indian rivers, Florida, 83 miles long, and from 3 to 6 miles wide. The land is to be drained at an expense of $4,000,000 and devoted to the cultivation of sugar, "enough of which can be grown on the strip to supply all of the United States."

A resident of Florida, speaking about the many attractions of that State, relates that there never had been a case of sun-stroke there nor a mad dog.

It is said that the State of Maine has wild land estimated to be worth $20,000,000.

A company has been incorporated under the laws of New Mexico for the purpose of constructing a dam across the Rio Grande River for the purpose of irrigating both in Mexico and the United States. William Hamilton, of New York, is at the head of the project, and the company is incorporated with a capital of $10,000,000. The dam will be built about five miles above El Paso, in Mountain Gateway. It will be 560 feet long, of solid masonry from cliff to cliff, resting on a solid limestone foundation and will be seventy feet wide. It will make a lake fifteen miles long and twenty-five feet deep. The cost of dam and irrigating canals is estimated at $2,500,000.

It is estimated in Mexico that $5,000,000 has recently been sent to this country in payment of grain imported.

The Tennessee Board of State Prison Inspectors have decided to return the convicts to the mines from which they were released by the rioters.

After the conference of labor leaders in Buffalo on the 24th ult., Grand Master Sweeney was informed that the other railway orders would not join the switchmen's strike. In consequence of this the strike was officially "declared off" by Grand Master Sweeney. A few days later all the New York troops were relieved of duty at Buffalo, and returned to their homes.

In his letter of acceptance as the candidate for the Presidency of the Prohibition party, John Bidwell says: "The liquor traffic is an enormous incubus upon the nation, amounting in cost and consequences to the annual sum of not less than two billions of dollars—four times the amount requisite to pay the annual expense of the National Government, even under the recent expensive administrations. But it is not necessary further to enumerate, so suffice it to say that the liquor traffic is a standing curse, a danger to public health, the source of untold political corruption, crimes, diseases, degradation and death, a public nuisance and a public immorality; in a word, it is an unmitigated and measureless evil, without a redeeming feature."

Our National Government, as also the authorities of New York and Philadelphia, are taking vigilant measures to prevent the introduction of cholera from Europe into our country.

The deaths in this city last week was reported to be 472, being 59 more than the previous week, and 75 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number 155 were under one year of age: 256 were males and 216 females: 69 died of cholera infantum; 43 of consumption; 37 of marasmus; 24 of heart disease; 21 of inanition; 16 of old age; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of pneumonia; 13 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of diphtheria; 13 of casualties; 12 of typhoid fever 10 of apoplexy, and 10 of cancer.

FOREIGN.—The election at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 25th ult., resulted in the return of John Morley, Chief Secretary for Ireland, whose seat for Newcastle in the House of Commons became vacant upon his taking office. In the general election, J. Morley received 10,950 votes, but on the 28th he received 12,983 votes. John Morley was opposed by Pandeli Balli, Liberal-Unionist. He received 11,244 votes, making Morley's majority 1739.

On the morning of the 25th ult., an explosion occurred in the Parkslip Coal pit, near Bridgend, Wales. The month of the pit was closed by the explosion, and the interior of the mine took fire. One hundred and fifty men had just gone into the mine, of whom 43 were rescued, two of the number since dying. All hope of rescuing the remaining 107 has been abandoned; 31 bodies have been recovered, and some of them identified; the galleries in the mines are flooding with water.

The French newspaper Paris says that the liquidator of the Panama Canal Company has concluded an agreement with Hielard, the Vice President of the Paris Chamber of Commerce, providing for the formation of a new company with a capital of $30,000,000 to resume work on the Panama Canal. Work will be resumed immediately in order to prevent the lapsing of the concession granted to the old company by the Government of Colombia. Operations will be concentrated at two points, Culebra and Rio Chagres. When nearly the whole capital has been employed, 45 of the 70 kilometers of the canal will be open. The agreement was to be approved by the Tribunal of Commerce.

A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 28th ult. says:—It is stated in well-informed circles here that M. De Staal, the Russian Ambassador to England, has entered upon an exchange of views on the Pamirs question with Lord Roseberry, the British Foreign Secretary, and that a satisfactory settlement is likely to result.

A ukase has been issued, annulling the prohibition against the exportation from Russia of rye, rye meal, and all kinds of bran.

A despatch from Hamburg dated Eighth Month 23rd says:—The warning conveyed in these despatches yesterday that the so-called cholera prevailing in this city would bear watching on the part of the United States immigration authorities, has received official justification. To-day the authorities in this city, in response to inquiries made by the American Consul here relative to the character of the disease, admitted that it was true Asiatic cholera. Upon learning this the Consul at once telegraphed the facts to the State Department at Washington.

Cholera, it is now admitted is in Havre, Antwerp and Hamburg. At the last named port, there are a large number of deaths daily. A few cases have appeared in English and Scotch ports, causing much apprehension, both in Great Britain and in this country, of the spread of this much dreaded disease.

Official reports of cholera in Russia, make the number of new cases daily, to vary from upwards of 3000, to upwards of 6000; of deaths daily, from upwards of 2700 to upwards of 3400.

Marshal Deodora Da Fonseca, the first President of the Republic of Brazil, is dead.

EVADING RESPONSIBILITY.

An anecdote is told of a woman who wished to cross a bridge, which was in so crazy a condition that cautious persons chose rather to make long circuit than run the risk of crossing it. One day, however, a very nervous lady, hurrying home to dress for the evening, came suddenly upon the spot without, till that moment, remembering the danger. The sight of the bridge minded her of its ruinous state, just as she was about to set her foot upon it. But what was she to do? If she went on the frail arch might give way under her; to go round would be fatiguing and attended with much loss of time. She stood some minutes trembling in anxious hesitation; but at last a lucky thought occurred to her. She called for a Sedan-chair, and was carried over in that conveyance.

We may laugh, perhaps, at her odd expedient of escaping danger by shutting out the view of

But does not something of the same kind happen when people, who are alarmed and perplexed at the danger of having to judge for themselves in religious matters, think to escape that danger by choosing to take some guide as an infallible one, and believe or disbelieve as he bids them? What is this but crossing the crazy bridge in a Sedan-chair?

But the man who is truly awakened to a sense of the responsibility of life, and feels the burthen of sin, which must be removed ere peace of mind can be felt, cannot content himself with such a fallacious dependence. This is illustrated by the case of an aged Brahmin pilgrim, as related by Jacob Chamberlain, a missionary in the East Indies. He says:

Never shall I forget an interview that I had, thirty years ago, with a venerable Brahmin pilgrim, an earnest seeker after relief from the burden of sin.

It was in 1861, that two of us missionaries were out on a preaching tour, in a part of the plugh country lying on the edge of the Mysore kingdom, a region in which the gospel of salvation through Jesus Christ had, so far, never yet been proclaimed.

Our tent was pitched under a spreading banyan tree. We had been there for several days, and had preached in all the villages and hamlets within three miles of our camp. That morning we had left our tent before sunrise and gone out several miles to preach in a cluster of villages nestled in among the hills. In each village, after the oral proclamation, we had offered Gospels and tracts in their own tongue to the people who had listened; but only a few would receive them, so suspicious were they, at that time, of everything new.

We returned to our tent weary with our morning work. The burden of our thoughts was: Lord, "who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?"

As we came near we saw a venerable gray-haired Brahmin, engaged in his devotions, on a large stone platform around the central trunk of an adjacent banyan tree, where there was a small shrine. Slowly, with beads in hand, he performed his circumambulations, keeping his face toward the shrine, reciting his prayers, his petitions. Each time that he came in front of the shrine he fell prostrate upon the ground, and then, sliding one bead on his rosary, he would slowly and reverently go around the tree again.

Much struck by his reverent demeanor and evident earnestness, we watched him through the corded meshes of our tent window, and when he had finished his devotions, and had sat down to rest, we went out, and, courteously addressing him, asked him what he sought by these prayers and circumambulations.

"Oh, sirs!" said he, in a tone that struck us as one of intense earnestness, "I am seeking to get rid of the burden of sin. All my life I have been seeking it; but each effort that I make is as unsuccessful as the one before, and still the burden is here. My pilgrimages and prayers and penances for sixty years have all been in vain. Alas! I know not how my desire can be accomplished."

Then, in answer to our inquiries, he gave us the story of his life. He told us how in early life he had been sorely troubled by the thoughts of his unexpiated sins; that his parents had both died when he was seventeen years of age, leaving him, an only child, sole heir of their wealth; that the priests whom he consulted told him that if he would give all his property to endow a temple the burden of sin would be removed.

He gave his property—all of it. He endowed a temple. But the burden of sin was no lighter. His mind was not at peace. Obedient to further advice from the priests, his counsellors, he made the pilgrimage on foot all the long way to Benares, the holy city of the Hindus, lying on the banks of the sacred Ganges. He spent two years in the precincts of the temples in worship. He spent two years in bathing in the holy Ganges. "But," said he, "the Ganges water washed the foulness from my skin, but not the foulness from my soul. And still the old burden was there un eased." He told us how he had gone from thence, on foot, all the way to Rameshwaram, begging his food all the two thousand miles—for he had given all his money to the temple—and thence again to Srirangam, and thence to other holy places.

He told us how he had spent his whole life in these pilgrimages, and in penances and in desert wanderings, apart from his kind, living on roots and nuts and jungle fruits, remaining for years at a time in the forest jungles, in the vain search for relief from the burden of sin.

"And now, sirs," said he, "my life is almost gone; my hair is thin and white; my eyes are dim; my teeth are gone; my cheeks are sunken; my body is wasted; I am an old, old man; and yet, sirs, the burden of sin is just as heavy as when, a young man, I started in pursuit of deliverance. Oh, sirs, does your Veda tell how I can get rid of this burden and be at peace? Our Vedas have not shown me how."

How gladly did we tell him of our gracious "Burden-bearer," and of his loving call "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." How eagerly did he listen, as we told him of Jesus Christ, the God-man, the Saviour of the world, and told him what He had done for our salvation. How gladly did he pore over the Gospels we gave him, and what earnest questions did he ask during the day as to points in their teachings which he did not quite understand. During that night he left and went upon his way, taking the Gospels with him, and we never again saw him.

Though so many years have intervened, his earnest, reverent countenance remains photographed in my memory, and I shall look for him up there among the redeemed; for I believe he was in earnest in seeking deliverance from the burden of sin—in vain, indeed, as he said, through Hinduism. I trust not in vain through the Gospel of Jesus Christ; for that is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

John Churchman's Journal contains much instructive matter, and its perusal is commended to all who are interested in tracing the footsteps of Zion's travellers. The same care and concern felt by him is equally incumbent upon all at the present day, if preservation is experienced, to stand upon the alone true foundation and to witness for ourselves the clear direction and qualification for religious service from the Head of the Church.

In the preface is a quotation from the Testimony of his Monthly and Quarterly Meeting, as follows:

"He was cautious of being forward in his public appearances. Being deeply sensible of the weight and solemnity of the Gospel ministry, he manifested great circumspection and care that it might be preserved pure and unblemished from mistaken or false appearances in himself or others."

While he was quite young in the ministry he exhibited depth and maturity of judgment. He relates in his Journal, at page 35: About this time, as I sat in one of our own meetings, I felt a flow of affection to the people—for many not of our Society came there—perhaps out of curiosity, several young ministers having come forth in public testimony, in which extraordinary flow of affection I had a very bright opening, as I thought, and expected to stand up with it very soon, but being willing to weigh it carefully was not very forward, viewing its decreasing brightness, until something said as it were within me, "is the woe in it, and therefore woe, if thou preach not the gospel."

This put me to a stand, and made me feel after the living presence of Him in whose name and power I desired to speak and appear in testimony, and not feeling the pure life and power of Truth to stand up, the brightness of the vision faded and left me quiet, humble and thankful for this preservation.

It is only as this godly care is maintained that our Society can be preserved on its original foundation. What is of man only may be compared to chaff, or a mere dream. He that hath a dream let him tell (it as) a dream, but he that hath my Word let him speak it faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? "He that hath an ear let him hear."

Soon after the beginning of the war the master called all his slaves together and said to them: "There is going to be a war, and some people called Yankees are coming here to kill me and your mistress, and I want you all to promise me that you will not let them do it. They are no friends to niggers, and if they catch you, they'll cut your ears off, and pin your eyes together."

"We'll stand by you, master," was the reply, and so they did, until the master's own cruelty drove them away from him at last. The battle of Hanover Court House, in May, 1862, was the first experience that either master or slaves had with Yankees. To the surprise of all, they proved themselves quite friendly to master, mistress and slaves, but when they went away only two of the slaves went with them as wagoners, the rest remaining to keep the promise they had made to their master. War, and the fear of losing his slaves, made the master considerate, but no sooner was McClellan safely out of the peninsula than the old time cruelty and oppression began with redoubled vigor. Suspecting that the friendliness of the Union troops might have set his slaves to thinking, the master told them that they should never again see the face of another Yankee, and that he intended to beat out of them all Yankee notions. Too late the slaves regretted their faithfulness, and longed for another troop of Yankees to appear, that they might march away with them to freedom.

A brutal and unprovoked beating sent Martha Ann's oldest remaining son, James, off into the woods, declaring that he would have no other master upon earth. For weeks he hung about the old plantation, his mother carrying him supplies by night, and on a cold night sometimes bringing him up to her cabin to warm himself. Other runaways, too, she fed and cared for, risking serious hurt and even death itself, for the sake of those of her own people who had already made their strike for the freedom for which she herself so longed. Twice she was nearly caught. Once the overseer walked in when runaway Uncle Dick was sitting crippled by frozen feet behind the door in her cabin, but he asked her a question and walked out, never looking to see the old man screened from him by the open door.

Once runaway Sam had taken refuge in her loft from the pursuit, which had grown uncomfortably close. Martha Ann was about her work below, when the Lord spoke to her and told her to tell him to come down. Never hesitating an instant, she called, "Sam, come down, and make for the woods." He obeyed, and in five minutes after he was out of the house four men walked in and climbed up to the loft to find it empty.

And so, while she bided her time, for she would not go without her children, she did what she could for the rest. Her mistress had lied to her twice, her master once, she felt that she owed no duty to them, and when the Yankees once more came near enough for her to reach them with her little ones, she should go and nothing should keep her.

About this time her master died, and in the settling up of his affairs it was decided that Martha Ann and her children were to be sold at auction, with other goods and chattels pertaining to the estate. Once upon the auction-block, Martha's dream of freedom would be over, and there would be no escape from that scattering of her dear ones that had been her life-long dread. How the poor slaves watched and prayed for help during this period of darkness and despair, it is hard for us to imagine, who live so secure from oppression and injustice.

But her prayers were answered in due time, and one bright spring morning in 1863, just two weeks before the day fixed for the sale, an unexpected body of Union cavalry dropped down upon Hanover Court House. The time was come at last, and the slave mother seized it with a will. Calling her children together, she prepared them for the journey. Each was given something from her slender household stores to carry, and everything else in the little house was destroyed. Then marshalling her seven children in a line before her, she marched out.

The mistress called to her as she passed along: "Martha Ann, are you going to leave me and take all the children too?" "Yes," was the reply, "you have lied to me twice, and you'll never have the chance to do it again." At this the mistress fell down before her, praying and beseeching her to stay on with them, but Martha Ann turned a deaf ear to all entreaties, as she, with her little children before her, proudly followed the sons of freedom. But it is not easy for a woman and seven little children, laden with household goods, to keep up with a cavalry regiment that is moving in a hurry through an enemy's country, and when Martha Ann reached Little Pages Bridge that spans the Pamunkey River, about two and a half miles from Hanover Court House, she found it in flames, and the Federal troops safe on the other side, moving rapidly down the river bank.

The Confederate troops were not far behind, and to avoid capture Martha Ann and her seven little ones descended into the river bed, and made their way as best they could, through mud and swamps and swollen tributaries for miles along the river's course, until at last she reached a place where a distant relative of her's John Thornton by name, lived near the river bank. Hiding her children among the bushes and bidding them keep quiet until her return, she crept up through the darkness of the night, which had by this time fallen. By one of the innumerable signs by which the slaves communicated with each other in those days, she made her presence known, trembling the while lest the great blood hounds for which the plantation was noted should give warning to the whites of the runaway's approach. But not a dog stirred, and the pitiful, mud-covered, scratched and bedraggled little woman told her difficulties. From the river's bank she could see the campfires of the Federal troops, bivouacked only four miles away; but they were on the north side of the river, and she, with her little ones, was still on the southern side.

John Thornton had a little boat so small that only one person besides himself could safely cross that swollen stream in it, and after cutting steps to secure them a footing in the steep clay banks he ferried the family over, one by one, in the darkness — the mother last of all, with her youngest in her arms. At last they were all safe on the northern side, and lay down together among the reeds and the rushes to wait for the dawn, because they dared not approach the Federal camp by night. At day-break the tired little ones were roused once more, and picking up their household goods, they hurried forward.

There were four miles to be gone over, and delay was caused by the search for one of the older boys, who had been sent back after something dropped, and who in his turn had to be gone after by the mother while the other children lay hidden in the bushes. So well had Martha Ann trained her little ones, that when she left them in a strange country, telling them neither to speak nor move till her return, no one thought of disobeying her injunction, but all lay motionless while she found the missing boy and brought him back. The tired little feet travelled those muddy four miles very slowly, and when at last they reached the Federal camp, the last baggage wagon was just pulling out. But the despairing cries and the signs of distress stopped the wagon, and the officer in charge inquired what she wanted. She wanted to go with them to freedom. "But you can't take all those children," old lady, was the man's answer. "Yes, I can, or I don't go at all," responded the mother, who felt that as she had brought her children thus far, the rest of the journey was easy for them.

So they put her into the baggage wagon with the three little ones, while the four largest ran behind, holding on to the tailboard of the wagon. For thirty miles they ran through drenching rain over the heavy Virginia road until they reached a point on the Pamunkey river not far from the White House. Here the whole troop camped for the night. Martha Ann had told her friend the officer about her troubles, and the supper of hard-tack, corn-bread and coffee that was served to her and her children that night, was an entertainment that the children will remember to their dying day. Around the big camp fire they sat and ate their meals, and as the water dried out of their clothes and went off in steam, the mud that the boys carried from their long run at the tail-board of the wagon, fell off from them in great cakes.

A good night's sleep brought the whole family out with fresh courage for the rest of their journey. Martha Ann felt that her troubles were nearly over and that freedom would soon be theirs. So sure of this was she, that when she passed in the road an abandoned iron pot, trivet and griddle, discarded as too heavy to carry by some refugees, she picked them up and carried them along on her head. The soldiers laughed at her. "What are you going to do with those things, old lady, they said, as she marched along with her load. "I 'se goin' to be free," she said and I shall want something to cook in." She carried her things safely through, and her children men show to-day with pride the old iron pot that their mother brought along to start the family in the new life of freedom.

When they reached the White House in the morning, three barges loaded with refugees were in the river, ready to start for Fortress Monroe. Martha Ann and her children were put on board the hindmost one, and they started down the river in tow, the people singing, as they realized that they were safely out of the hands of their masters, "Slavery's chain done broke at las'." But alas, even as they sang, another chain "done broke," and that was the chain that connected the hindmost barge with the rest of the tow. Suddenly the shout of triumph was changed to wailing, there was praying and weeping among the great multitude, for there were rebel gunboats not far up the river, and the hand of the master seemed about to fall upon them again. But they were soon missed, and a tug was sent back to them. It picked them up and carried them along so rapidly that they soon passed the heavy tow from which they had broken off. Great was the joy of the excitable multitude when the first Union gunboat was passed, greater still the rejoicing, when, at last, the barges were unloaded at Fortress Monroe, and they slept free men and women upon free soil, with the flag of freedom floating over them. No more of the master's lash, no more selling of husbands from wives, of children from mothers, of brothers from sisters. Hardships, want, troubles of all kinds were ahead of them, but "slavery's chain one broke at las'," and nothing else could matter to them.

Curious Slips of the Tongue.

The tongue is unruly in other ways than that pointed out in such vigorous terms by James the apostle. It seems to sometimes take the bit in its teeth, if so mixed a metaphor may be permitted, and to run away from the directing hand with results that hardly ever fail to cause no less confusion to the speaker than amusement to the hearer. The incident of the gentleman who, cordially inviting some friends to hear his pastor preach, said to them: "You say occupew my pie," is perhaps already familiar. Equally laughter-provoking was the transposition made by a friend of mine who had undertaken to recite Bret Harte's "Heathen chinee," and surprised both himself and his audience by the statement that

"For ways that are dark
And tricks that are vain
The heathen pecu is chineliar."

It is probably because they more frequently appear before the public as speakers than any other class of men that clergymen are the heroes of the majority of the stories told as to slips of the tongue.

Brother B—— is tall and gaunt of figure, and pale and serious of countenance. Once in giving a meeting of special solemnity to a cove, he caused many a smile by saying, impressively: "Now let us pronounce the Doxology, and I will sing the benediction." Then, after realizing that something had gone wrong, he drew himself up, and looking, if possible, more solemn still, added: "No, I mean I will give the benediction, and we will pronounce the Doxology." The quick wit of a hearer, who at once started "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," in stentorian tones, rescued the others from disgracing themselves by an outburst of laughter. After the meeting dispersed, said Brother B—— to Brother A——:

"Now, you know, I saw that thing coming wrong end first, but for the life of me I could not turn it round."

Here are some amusing stories of a similar character. It was but a very insignificant change of a letter, but it spoiled what was intended to be an eloquent denunciation against idolatry, when the preacher cried with impassioned earnestness: "Bow not thine eye to a needle," having meant to say: "Bow not thy knee to an idol." In the same way the young clergyman with the same correct Oxford pronunciation, in giving out the hymn, "Conquering Kings," merely stumbled over the first vowel; but being unable to save himself, was hurried over the precipice, and startled his congregation with the announcement: "The concluding hymn will be 'Kinkering Congs, Kinkering Congs.'" After that experience he was in a position to fully sympathize with his brother clergyman who, in place of saying: "Behold the fig-tree how it withereth away," asked his bewildered audience to "Behold the whig-tree how it fithereth away."

In similar case did the preacher find himself who, describing conscience, and desiring to get his listeners to recognize the promptings of its inward voice in the half-formed wishes of the mind, appealed to them whether there was one present who some time or another "had not felt within him the effect of a half-warmed fish."—Harper's Young People.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Our visit to this classical locality was made under favorable circumstances. Two bright and intelligent young women formed part of the carriage-load, and enlivened our journey by their enthusiasm and their remarks; and our kind host was a born woodman and familiar with "the Pines" from childhood. About the time the Indians had removed to New York State the New Jersey authorities directed the land to be surveyed and divided into farms of one hundred acres, and sold for the benefit of the Indians; and some of this land had descended to him from his ancestors.

A few miles below Medford we crossed a low ridge, which marks the dividing line between the branches of the Rancocas, which flows westward into the Delaware River; and those of Mullica River, which flow eastward more directly to the ocean—the common receptacle of all the drainage.

One of the first points of interest was a bushy bog, the source of Edgepelick Creek, which itself is a branch of Springer's Creek, so named I suppose, from the family who formerly owned an extensive tract of land in that section of the country, and from whom the Indian reservation was purchased. As an illustration of the loose manner in which the surveys were made in early days, when land was held at very low prices, it may be mentioned that a re-survey showed the purchase to contain more than one thousand acres beyond what had been previously estimated.

While much of the land was too poor to be profitably cultivated, yet there was a considerable body of productive land on the reservation, and the fields of corn and grain looked well. It contained some cedar swamp, which is valuable in New Jersey for the timber it yields. The White Cedar (Cupressus thyoides) is an evergreen tree, with very small, scale-like leaves. It is a native of the swamps, and grows where its roots can be always bathed in water. The plants come up so close together, that in their effort to reach light and air they shoot up tall, straight and slender, with no branches or foliage, except a little cluster at the summit. The wood, although soft, is exceedingly durable, and will last almost indefinitely without rotting. It must not be confounded with the Arbor Vitæ, which is sometimes called White Cedar, but which is a more northern tree.

During the day's ride we visited several Cranberry bogs—some of which were heavily laden with berries, giving promise of an abundant crop, if no accident or disease should befall them. The essential feature of a good bog, is a low, swampy piece of sandy land, with a stream of water running through it, so that by the erection of banks and dams, the owner can flood it at pleasure. In making a new one, it is customary, after erecting the banks, to flood the land for a year or two, so as to kill the natural growth. Often a coat of sand is then spread over it, and the cranberry vines are planted. A situation which is naturally springy, seems to favor the growth of the plant.

The Cranberry belongs to the same genus as the Blueberries, or Blue Huckleberries (Vaccinium). It is the V. Macrocarpon, "large-fruited," so called because its fruit much exceeds in size that of the other species of Vaccinium. It differs also from them in this respect—that it is not an upright shrub, but a creeping vine, which trails on the ground from one to three feet, and sends up numerous short branches on which the flowers and fruit appear. It was an interesting sight to see many of these branches already so thickly covered with berries. The amount of land suitable for cultivating the Cranberry is comparatively small, and one desirous of establishing a plantation might be compelled to purchase a large tract of adjoining land, so as to control the water privileges and other surroundings necessary for his purposes.

Rattlesnakes are occasionally found in the New Jersey swamps, especially in the vicinity of clear, running water, or springs, but they are not abundant, and one may frequent such localities for years without encountering one. In the early settlement of this country they were comparatively numerous. But the war waged on them by the farmers, and the attacks of the hogs running in the woods, have greatly diminished their numbers. They are still frequent among the rocks of the Alleghanies, but in the country lying between those mountains and the New Jersey swamps, can scarcely be said to exist.

The location of the old Indian burying ground was pointed out to us—a piece of unenclosed land adjoining a school-house. We were still more interested in calling on a survivor of the New Jersey Indians, an aged woman named Ann Roberts, or Indian Ann. She seemed in good health, but feeble, and lived in a comfortable frame house which, we understood, belonged to her. She thought she was upwards of one hundred years old, but one of her neighbors estimated her to be not more than ninety. She was brought up in the neighborhood of Rancocas, but on her marriage moved to Edgepelick, which had now been her home for many years. It seemed to please the old woman to hear about a son, who was known to one of the women, by whom she sent him a message.

In the circuitous route we took, we often traversed narrow roads through the woods, where our driver seemed as much at home, and as certain of his route, as in the more open country.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"If ye know these things, happy are ye if do them."
John xiii: 17.

All have known the way, and loudly
Hath this summons come to each—
"Take thy cross, and bear it, learning
All its ministry would teach,
Proving that God's help can richly Unto all his children reach."

Doubly happy he that yieldeth
To this message strong and clear,
True obedience, all submitting,
While the spirit's power is near,
Reaping as his richest guerdon,
Love that casteth out all fear.

Ah! we know our Lord's requirings,
And the battle we should win;
And we see the land of promise
Where our souls must enter in,
And we feel the hateful fetters
Of our bondage unto sin.

And the galling chain that holds us
Groweth stronger by delay,
And the shadows of the evening
Soon will dim the flush of day,
And the poison of earth's nectar
Sap our boasted strength away.

If we reach the heights of safety
Where the veil is rent in twain,
We must, mid the cloud and tempest,
Mid the anguish of our pain,
Heed the angel's words of warning,
"Tarry not in all the plain,"

This the only way that leadeth
To the fulness of God's rest,
Where life's perfect, sure fruition
By his gracious love is blest;
Where we see with clearer vision
That God's mercy chooseth best.

THE DESERT WAY.

BY AUGUSTINE S. CARMAN.

"And the multitudes gave heed with one accord unto the things that were spoken by Philip. . . . But an angel of the Lord spake unto Philip, saying, Arise, and go toward the south unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza: the same is desert."—Acts viii: 6, 26.

O message strange and difficult!
O interruption rude
Of work replete with fruitage sweet,
This call to solitude!

Samaria's thronging thousands,
Hearts melting 'neath the glow
Of Philip's master-passion, all
To be relinquished so!

The desert way! A doom it seemed To Philip's eager soul,
Burning to be where human hearts
May feel his love's control.

But down along that southward way
Another traveller fared,
Whom some far-reaching providence
Had for this hour prepared.

And opportunity supreme Lay in the lonely way:
The first-fruits of a continent
Were harvested that day.

Strange are the intersecting lines
Of God's sure providence;
Rare fruit the very desert yields
To our obedience.

Oh, glory of the commonplace,
Thick veiled from careless eyes,
Yet shining out on dreariest paths
Its heavenly surprise!

And thou, O soul, whom some great grief
Hath fast in sorrow bound!
Doth thy world lie a lonely waste
Beyond that new-made mound?

Yet fare thou forth along that way,
And, one sweet day of grace,
Some loving providence of God
Shall greet thee face to face.

O desert way! O way Divine
The Christ himself hath trod!
Faith all serene may welcome thee,
And wait the will of God.

ANN ARBOR, MICHIGAN.

Christ's "Second" Coming.

Errors in doctrine, apparently harmless in themselves, sometimes prove to be the harbingers of serious evils, and the more widely disseminated those doctrines may be, the greater the weakness to the body at large. To declare the truth, is not the only duty of a servant of Christ, but at times to expose evil. See Ez. xviii and Rom. iii: 8.

When younger in years, I observed that many people and preachers said much and dwelt largely in imaginary conceptions of a second coming of Christ in the flesh, visible to human eyes, almost entirely ignoring his real presence with the church, and a conversation correspondent thereto. Being simply imaginations, and not things revealed, gave unbounded scope for differences of views with regard to the manner, time or place of such coming, which all tended to disunity and distraction; and, amidst it all, I must confess, I never found that soul-refreshing food by which men live and grow.

True it is, that it is only in and through the name of the Father, that is, by the revelation of his spirit, that Christ is truly and savingly known in his appearances to men, for "no man knoweth the Son but the Father;" and as Christ said to Peter, "flesh and blood," that is, the wisdom natural to man "hath not," "but my Father which is in Heaven hath revealed this unto thee." Matt. xvi: 17.

That false teachers, prophets, and Christs should arise (and should deceive many), was foretold both by our Lord himself and his Apostles, who thus warned faithful Christians that they might "watch," and "try the spirits whether they are of God." Many of these did appear even in their day, and many since, and the present century has had its full complement.

The Jews in the time of our Saviour, having violated the good understanding which had been given them, as to the time and place of Christ's birth, as foretold in Scripture, and rebelling against the witness of God's spirit in rejecting him, no longer found comfort in the Scripture, being unsupported by faith. A furious tempest burst over them, making a complete wreck of both their civil and religious corporate existence, the relics of which are to this day strewn in every land. Within thirty-eight years from the crucifixion, the Roman army besieged Jerusalem, in which it is supposed two millions and a half of people from every known land were celebrating the Passover. The Jews themselves, divided into three hostile factions, fiercely fought each other, but united against their common enemy. Famine, rapine and murder stalked through the streets. The sacred precincts of the temple were changed into a charnel-house. And amidst the turmoil, all, according to their carnal apprehensions, were looking outwardly for a coming Christ to rule an outward kingdom, and conquer outward foes. In reference to these false Christs, the Lord Jesus had warned his followers, "Wherefore if they shall say unto you, Behold, he is in the desert, go not forth; Behold, he is in the secret chambers, believe it not." (Matt. xxiv: 26.) By "observation" did the Jews of that time expect him to come, and these modern so-called theologians do to-day contrary to the express declaration of Christ that his kingdom cometh not so, but that it "is within you." Indeed, in reference to his kingdom, he says, "The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then shall He reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom."

How consonant is this to the apostle's declaration to the Hebrews,—Ye are come to Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus * * (Heb. xii: 22-24). Therefore are we told, that the Jewish Christian being forewarned, and looking for a heavenly a spiritual coming and kingdom of Christ, did not, nor could they fight for a temporal kingdom, but fled to Pella, and so escaped the tribulation, attendant on the siege and capture of Jerusalem by the Romans.

This Jewish hope, consequent on the rejection of Jesus Christ, has unhappily been grafted on to Christianity, and, time and again, have people forsaken lawful employments in view of an immediate coming. So much so has this been the case that England was visited by a famine owing to the non-culture of the land, at the end of the thirteenth century, and the last half-century has seen a prolific crop of men, predicting such coming.

Christ's coming in the flesh, nearly nineteen centuries ago, was preceded by a long line of independent prophecies, gradually unfolding clearer and clearer, through successive ages and generations, the circumstances of his birth, life, death and ascension, and of that spiritual kingdom of righteousness which he was to set up among men. All these prophecies were pointedly fulfilled in Jesus Christ. The prophecies relating to his sojourn on earth ran concurrently with those relating to his spiritual and everlasting kingdom. When the time drew near, all men were in expectancy. His family, tribe, and place of birth were known. When Herod inquired, where Christ was to be born, he was promptly told "in Bethlehem of Judea" for so the prophets had foretold. This, then, is now presumably called Christ's "first" coming, though such terms as "first" and "second" as applied to a visible appearance of Christ in the flesh, are themselves misleading and unscriptural, seeing we believe Him to be the Holy One whom Abraham addressed as "Lord," and as the "Judge of all the earth," as the one who appeared to Moses in the burning bush, and He who like to the Son of man walked with the three faithful children of Israel in the king of Babylon's fiery furnace, yea "his delights were [always] with the children of men." Yet we willingly confess to his memorable appearance and sojourn in the flesh, as the man Christ Jesus, begotten of the Holy Ghost, conceived by Mary, born not of the will of man, but of God.

In that prepared body, in all points made like to ours, but unblemished by sin, did he come to do the Father's will. The years of his ministry were mingled with tribulation, and finally he offered himself up as a propitiatory sacrifice for the sin of all mankind, and so became "the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe." In allusion to this sacrifice wherein the Lord Jesus Christ officiated as a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec, and "God was ist, reconciling the world to himself," thus ening up a new and living way by which sinners, among whom are we, may approach his stool, and find through true repentance ward God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, forgiveness and remission of all sins, it is said, "to those that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation." (Heb. 9: 28). The evident allusion here is to that, symbolized by the rite of the Jewish high priest, who, when making atonement for sin, put on the linen clothes, the holy garments, and no one being in the tabernacle, entered within the veil, into the Holy of Holies, having on his brow in his character as the sin-bearer the golden coronet on which was engraved "Holiness to the Lord," and having sprinkled the blood of the sin offering on and before the mercy seat, and made confession of his own and of the sins of the people, and laid them on the other part of the atoning sin offering, the scapegoat, and sent it forth into the world; and having accomplished the further rites of purgation, he entered the holy place, when divesting himself of the holy garments, he washed his flesh in water, and putting on the robes usually worn, he again appeared before the people—that is, having made reconciliation and received remission for sin, now comes forth without sin, to offer by virtue of that atonement, burnt offerings and peace offerings to the Lord (see v. xvi: 24). These solemn rites were lively pictures of what our great High Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ did once for all, when with his own blood he entered into heaven itself, and there obtained grace, mercy and peace, for all.

Now having laid aside his garment of flesh, he appeareth the second time to salvation—not in his humility a man, but in his own Divine glory. And those who will receive Him "are sanctified, are sanctified, in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the spirit of our God." (1 Cor. vi: 11), "That they may be clean from their sins before the Lord," (Lev. xvi: 30, John i: 7.)

Who can doubt that in all ages, and in all parts of the habitable earth, the Saviour of man has thus appeared, bringing salvation and peace, to many it may be, who never heard of Abraham and whom Israel knew not? The blessed substance was theirs, provided by the gracious Lord "who is good to all, and whose tender mercies are over all his works." It is to us the greater blessing of an enlightened understanding is bestowed, demanding on our part more implicit obedience.

But did not the two men in white apparel say the apostles, who had just witnessed Christ's ascension, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye looking up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." (Acts ii: 11.)

True, and were not these same men of Galilee commanded "not to depart from Jerusalem, but to wait for the promise of the Father, which," said Jesus, "ye have heard of me." (Acts i: 4.) What was this promise? Was it not that "I come again to you, and I am with you alway, even to the end of the world?" (Matt. xxviii: 20.) Mark! it does not read I will be with you at the end of the world, but I am with you alway, even to the end of the world." And did not the multitude on the day of Pentecost remark that these were "all Galileans," who were thus filled with the Holy Ghost? And did not the Apostles go forth in the name of a risen and glorified Lord, baptizing all who believed?

But did not Christ himself speak of the signs of his coming, as related in Matt. xxiv? He did, in reply to the query of his disciples, as to the time of the fulfilment of Christ's prophecy regarding Jerusalem's temple, "There shall not be left here, one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down." During one generation after the crucifixion, while as yet that outward temple stood, and its priests officiated as commanded by Moses, Jewish believers in Christ were still permitted to fulfil all the obligations and ordinances of the Mosaic law, and at any time to worship in the temple, which, even Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles, occasionally did, and the Bible records, that during that period many of the Jews and of their priests turned to the Lord; but the Gentile converts, in accord with the judgment of the church assembled in council at Jerusalem, were by no means obligated nor requested to conform to the Jewish initiatory rites, nor to practice outward ordinances, nor to assemble there at the time of the feasts. That these sayings of Christ recorded by Matthew in the 24th chapter, v. 1-35, have especial reference to the total destruction of that temple, and its Aaronic priesthood, is evident from the tenor of the 34th verse, viz: "Verily, I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled."

The only other coming there spoken of by the Lord Jesus refers to that coming of the Son of man, the time of which God doth not in his wisdom see meet to reveal. Let us remember, then, that since it seemed good to the Father to withhold this knowledge, even from his own Son, and that "secret things belong unto the Lord, and things that are revealed belong unto us and to our children," we do wrong having no data nor revelation as regards the time, to pry into this secret thing. But the Lord has laid out the duty of his faithful servants, which is thus expressed: "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come," (v. 42), and in v. 44 Christ draws this conclusion: "Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

Paul, also writing to the Thessalonians reiterates the command of the Lord to "watch," assigning the same reason as that of Jesus, "because they perfectly knew that the day of the Lord, so cometh as a thief in the night." (1 Thess. v: 1-8).

Believing, then, that the true interpretation of Holy Scripture is only in and through the teachings of the Holy Spirit, and knowing that there are found therein, as the Apostle Peter says of Paul's writings, "many things hard to be understood," which saying applies with equal force to the prophecies by John in the Revelation of Jesus Christ; yet is it in all sincerity and truth, I have under a sense given me of these things, briefly portrayed the same, consistent with the importance of the subject, believing that too many professors overlook the great end and purpose for which all those things are written, that we may believe in Christ, and believing, may live and walk in a humble, holy, teachable frame of mind.

May we, through Grace divine, like the wise virgins, have our lamps trimmed and our lights burning brightly, ready to meet our Lord at his coming, and enter with Him into the door of heaven, there to sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and the faithful of every age, at the marriage supper of the Lamb.

A PILL is not the worse for being sugar-coated.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Conformity to the Ways of the World.

It has of late become too common among some who still claim to be Friends, to speak of several of our peculiar testimonies as very little things, which they no longer feel the obligation to observe. These testimonies were not so regarded by faithful and eminently wise men in the early days of our religious Society.

Thomas Ellwood, speaking of the way in which he was led soon after he became convinced of the Truth in his youthful days, says: "I was now required by this inward and spiritual law, 'the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus,' to 'put away the evil of my doings,' and 'to cease to do evil.' And what, in particulars, the evil was which I was required to put away, and to cease from, that measure of the Divine light, which was now manifest in me, discovered to me and what the light made manifest to be evil, judgment passed upon.

"So that here began to be a way cast up before me, for me to walk in—a direct and plain way; so plain, that a wayfaring man, how weak and simple soever, though a fool in the wisdom, and in the judgment of the world, could not err while he continued to walk in it; the error coming in by his going out of it. And this way with respect to me, I saw was that measure of Divine light which was manifested in me, by which the evil of my doings, which I was to put away and cease from was discovered to me.

"By this Divine light then I saw, that though I had not the evil of the common profaneness and pollutions of the world to put away, because I had, through the great goodness of God, and a civil education, been preserved out of those grosser evils; yet I had many other evils to put away and to cease from; some of which were not, by the world which lies in wickedness, accounted evils; but by the light of Christ were made manifest to me to be evils, and as such condemned in me.

"As particularly those fruits and effects of pride, that discover themselves in the vanity and superfluity of apparel; which I, as far as my ability would extend to, took alas! too much delight in. This evil of my doings, I was required to put away and cease from; and judgment lay upon me till I did so. Wherefore in obedience to the inward law, which agreed with the outward, 1 Tim. ii: 9; Peter iii: 3; 1 Tim. vi: 8; James i: 21, I took off from my apparel those unnecessary trimmings of lace, ribbands and useless buttons, which had no real service, but were set only for that which was, by mistake, called ornament, and I ceased to wear rings.

"Again, the giving of flattering titles to men, between whom and me there was not any relation, to which such titles could be pretended to belong. This was one evil I had been much addicted to, and was accounted a ready artist in it; therefore, this also was I required to put away and cease from. So that thenceforward I durst not say sir, master, my lord, madam, or say your servants, to any one to whom I did not stand in the real relation of a servant; which I never had done to any.

"Again, respect of persons, in uncovering the head, and bowing the knee or body in salutations, was a practice I had been much in the use of. This is one of the vain customs of the world, introduced by the spirit of the world, instead of the true honor, of which this is a false representation, and used in deceit, as a token of respect by persons one to another, who bear no real respect one to the other. And besides, it is a type and proper emblem of that Divine honor which all ought to pay to Almighty God, and which all, of all sorts, who take upon them the Christian name, appear in when they offer their prayers to Him, and therefore should not be given to men. I found this to be one of those evils which I had been too long doing, therefore I was now required to put it away, and cease from it.

"Again, the corrupt and unsound form of speaking in the plural number to a single person, you to one, instead of thou, contrary to the pure, plain and simple language of Truth, thou to one and you to more than one, which had always been used by God to men, and men to God, as well as one to another, from the oldest record of time, till corrupt men, for corrupt ends in later and corrupt times, to flatter, fawn and work upon the corrupt nature in men, brought in that false and senseless way of speaking you to one; which hath since corrupted the modern languages, and hath greatly debased the spirits, and depraved the manners of men. This evil custom I had been as forward in as others, and this I was now called out of, and required to cease from.

"These and many more evil customs which had sprung up in the night of darkness, and general apostacy from the Truth and true religion, were now by the inshining of this pure ray of Divine light in my conscience, gradually discovered to me to be what I ought to cease from, shun, and stand a witness against."

Natural History, Science, etc.

Diseases of the Peach Tree.—One of the most serious diseases with which the growers of the peach in America have to contend, is the Yellows. In the last few years it has spread more and more in the Delaware and Chesapeake region, which for a considerable time had been the main dependence of our northern and eastern cities; and has destroyed thousands upon thousands of trees. It is not known to exist in California, or in Europe or other parts of the globe. The only known remedy, if it can be called a remedy, is the uprooting and destruction of every tree which becomes infected.

It has been suggested that it would be desirable to introduce a sound race of trees from some country where the disease is unknown. The Bulletin of the U. S. Department of Agriculture gives the caution, that great care should be used to avoid the introduction at the same time, of animal and vegetable parasites, which might prove worse than the Yellows. It says:

"In Mediterranean countries, and also in Australasia, there is a fruit fly, which once introduced into this country would work great mischief. It deposits its eggs in the fruit after it is nearly full grown, and these hatch into swarms of maggots. Externally the fruit is said to be fair, but within it is disgusting corruption. Peaches, apples, pears, plums and other fruits are attacked, and no remedy is known. In Japan there is a codlin moth, which is said to affect ninety per cent. of the ripe fruit. In the Australasian regions, there is a very destructive root fungus, which destroys almost every green thing in its path."

South African Oxen and Mules.—I find it very amusing to study the habits of the oxen. In spite of their long horns and somewhat wild, formidable appearance, they are, in reality, to those who have to drive and manage them, the most docile, patient animals. A stranger, however, would do well to be careful not to go too close either to them or to the mules. These oxen come in in the evening from the veldt in one great troop, driven along by a couple of boys. They range themselves in spans, as schoolboys at a school range themselves in classes, each span apparently knowing its own wagon, each ox its own place in the span. The mules are not so interesting or attractive, and it is possible that a mule is one of the few animals on which kind treatment is absolutely thrown away. Our mule wagon, which loads over 2,000 lbs. of transport, has a fine team of twelve mules. They are a most vicious set, and would readily bite or kick at any one except Myberg, the conductor, or Gideon, his "boy." Myberg tells me that they would even go at him if he happens to wear a different hat or coat from that which they are accustomed to. These mules have their idiosyncrasies. One of them is that they like to be accompanied by a mare. This mare is tied up alongside the span, but does no work herself. She goes out grazing with them on the veldt, and I am told that when mules have a mare along with them they never stray. Another curious habit of theirs which it often amuses me to watch, is that of gnawing each other. This gnawing appears to be a regular matter of bargain between them.—Men, Mines, and Animals in South Africa.

The Lark.—Larks are, like most other birds, sagacious in the protection of their young, as the following instance will prove, which is taken from "The Naturalist": "The other day, some mowers shaved off the upper part of the nest of a sky-lark, without injuring the female, who was sitting on her young; still she did not fly away; and the mowers levelled the grass all round her, without her taking any notice of the proceedings. The son of the owner of the crop witnessed this, and, about an hour afterwards, went to see if she were safe; when, to his great surprise, he found that she had actually constructed a dome of dry grass over the nest during the interval, leaving an aperture on one side for ingress and egress; thus endeavoring to secure a continuance of the shelter previously supplied by the long grass."

A Day in Bed for Health's Sake.

We are naturally given to contemn and despise the idea of remaining in bed when our health is good and all our vital forces are in fair working order. Apart from the matter of ordinary sleep, we never, as a rule, think of "a day in bed," either as preservative of health or as conducive to longevity. Yet I am convinced there is much to be said in favor of "a day in bed" now and then as an aid to health in the middle-aged, and as a measure tending to prolong life in the old.

The statement has been made, of a very old lady who had reached her ninetieth year, and who was then hearty, that she owed her vitality to her habit of spending at least two days of each week in bed. Now, whether this assertion be true or not as to its effects upon the venerable dame, I can conceive of nothing so conducive to her welfare as this practice of obtaining for body and mind such a period of perfect rest. In bed, the whole muscular system is at ease, and the wear and tear of the body is reduced to a minimum. The processes of getting rid of waste matters are in abeyance; there is less waste to get rid of, and lungs, skin, and kidneys have a measure of comparative repose. The nervous system, above all, is soothed and comforted by the "day in bed." Anxieties and worries disappear after the rest, and the individual returns to the work-a-day world refreshed and renovated, physically and mentally, in degree such as the action of no medicines could have accomplished. In a word, the person who enjoys "a day in bed" is in the position of an engine whose fires are damped down, and whose energies are recruiting for the renewal of the work of to-morrow.

There need be little hesitation, then, in saying that, for old persons, "a day in bed" is a health measure of vast importance. If the aged person is wise, he (or she) will make it a regular practice to spend a couple of days per week in the repose which a sojourn in bed can give. Rest in chair or on a sofa will not suffice. These procedures are too nearly akin to the everyday practice to be of any service. Countless temptations to exertion await the person who is out of bed; while conversely, if he is in bed, the idleness of work or of labor and movement is essentially abolished. Such repose is absolute; and if it be a great medicine, as all know it is, for old folks, "a day in bed," as a regular and not occasional practice, may be regarded as invaluable beyond comprehension.

I go further in my advocacy of a "day in bed" as a health measure. I happen to know the case of a busy man whose life is one long period of physical and mental activity, and who has found, of late years, that no measure possesses anything like the recuperative effects which follow a day's rest in bed. Even in his holiday season this person is given to taking an occasional siesta in his bedroom. Provided with light literature, he enjoys his repose as another man delights in an outing, and his mental and physical energy is recruited in an easy and satisfactory manner by this practice. Hence, not for the old alone, but for those in middle life, "a day in bed" may be recommended as a measure worth trying in the light of physiological experience of its value.

Effect of European Civilization on Caste in India.

The Head Master of the Maharajah's College of Jeypur, told me a few months ago, during long conversation I had with him, that he did not fear that Christianity would overthrow Hinduism, but, he said: It has worked incalculable mischief to us in this, that it has made the low castes impudent and taken away their respect for the Brahmans, and given them aspirations to rise out of their position and emboldened them to compete with their betters for the wealth and prizes of life. Since Christianity has come to our country," he said, "we Brahmans have had to do what we never had to do before—work for our living." It is true that this is one of the indirect effects of Christianity, but it is an influence that is permeating the whole social and commercial fabric of India.

The great bulk of scholars in our mission primary schools are from the lower castes. They are taught to regard and believe themselves to be equals of all and every other child before God. When these children grow up they are not all (indeed, only a fraction of them) become Christians; but they never forget the lessons they have learned in the mission school. It is difficult ever to recover any low-caste man from the Brahman to his old allegiance. Every temple in the land is suffering from the lukewarmness of the worshippers, in every place where a missionary lives and teaches a school and has a preaching station. The moment the lowest caste man in India becomes a Christian he emerges common consent, out of his old caste into it is already being recognized here as a new one, "the Christian caste." And the Christian caste in India is the "Queen's caste." And the Hindu religion recognizes and compels respect be paid to the "Rajah's caste"; that is, the caste of the ruler of the land. This may seem an indirect effect of Christianity upon the other castes, but it is a telling one.

In many of the villages the low-caste people not allowed to draw water from the village well, but must go to the tank or the swamp for water; but in the same village the Christian is allowed to draw water with the high caste in the village well. It comes to pass that a man who yesterday was denied water from the village well because he was a low-caste man, today is allowed to draw his water with the other villagers because last night he was baptized and became a Christian. Thus are the low castes getting little by little elevated in position and standing, not to speak of their spiritual transmutation.—The Independent.

Persecution of the Stundists.—It has been announced that the Minister of the Interior in Russia has appointed a Commission by the Holy Synod together elaborating a plan for the complete abolition of the Stundists in that Empire. As soon as the plan is complete, it will receive the sanction of the Minister of Justice, who will apply the necessary pains and penalties. A writer in an official Russian paper points out that the Stundists in the southern and western provinces steadily advancing in numbers and influence, claims that their national customs, their national drink, their method of agriculture, even their Russian language, are undergoing a change as they leave the Church of their fathers for the new heresy. So fraught with danger to the Russian Church and State, he considers it is necessary to nip out by every means possible. Hence, we look for a revival of bitter persecution for the much enduring people. A writer in The Christianian, London, calls upon Christians everywhere to remember these persecuted Stundists, and do all in their power to relieve them.

Effects of Pride.—Pride is often very inconvenient and sometimes the cause of great pain and loss. A young lady living in the State of New York was considered remarkably handsome. She was fond of her feet, which were quite small. Not content with the beauty nature gave her she persisted in effort to make her feet appear smaller by wearing shoes that were too small. This caused ingrown nails, which resulted in a disease of the bone. Medical skill was baffled in the effort to remedy the chief done, and her physicians have decided on amputation of both feet is necessary in order to save the young lady's life. One may rejoice in the loss of a foot when it has been sacrificed to some pious principle or some noble cause, but to lay to rest feet on the altar of pride is so degrading that the shame produced by it is worse than the loss incurred. Many are giving not only their feet, but their hands and heads, yea, and their souls also, to glorify their pride.

Murder of the Innocents.—The English Register reports that the death shows that the number of infants who die from suffocation is steadily increasing, and that these deaths occur most frequently on Seventh and First-day nights. The reason assigned is, that Seventh-day is pay day, and that many of the parents of these children are intoxicated on Seventh, First, and even Second-day nights, and in their drunken stupor smother the infants. The deaths from convulsions, which are especially numerous on Second-day evening, are accounted for by the poisonous milk of the intoxicated mothers. In the coroner's findings these deaths are generally put down to other causes. The facts are startling, and a striking illustration of the evil of the alcohol murders its innocent victims.

Louisiana Colored People.—The colored population of Louisiana—and nowhere are the colored people more self-respecting and self-asserting—are in high fervor over two late occurrences. One is the defeat in the State Senate of the bill which had passed the House, forbidding the intermarriage of white and colored people. The bill was defeated in committee, after having been the subject of a considerable public discussion, in which, it will be remembered, Archbishop Janssens took part, opposing the bill as unchristian. The other is the victory won by the Citizens' Committee, organized by the colored people of the State, to protect their rights in the case of one Daniel S. Desdunes, who was charged with violating the Jim Crow law of the State by insisting upon the right to occupy a seat in a coach of a passenger train set apart for white passengers. The court held that, inasmuch as the accused was an interstate passenger en route by continuous transit from the city of New Orleans to the city of Mobile, his case came under the regulations of interstate commerce, with which the State law has nothing to do; and by leave of the court a nolle prosequi was entered, and the accused was discharged. The colored people of the State are jubilant, and they say that the Jim Crow law is dead. Of course it may still hold as far as travel within the State is concerned; but it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to enforce it with passengers who are not going to cross the State line, while it is not enforced as regards Negroes who are going a few miles further. This victory has been obtained by a committee that raised $3,000 to test the outrageous law, and their victory is very gratifying.

Depopulation of France.—Thomas Grimm, in the Petit Journal of Paris, speaks of the relative decrease of the population of France.

From 1791 to 1799, more than two millions of men were forced into war, of whom one-third were destroyed. From 1800 to 1813, three millions served in the Napoleonic wars. In 1814, only six hundred thousand of these remained, about one-fifth of them. After the battle of Leipzig only male children remained in France. Three invasions, from 1815 to 1870, provoked by the wars of Napoleon, continued the slaughter of the French. Three or four years of civil war and a disastrous expedition in Egypt complete the picture. "Today we feel the void caused by the small number of births, by the absence of offspring from those strong men taken away from the fields and the shops and slain without leaving any posterity. Those at home who propagated the race were the weak and diseased. Hence the general diminution of the vigor of the people. We are paying to-day the price of glory."

It may be added to what T. Grimm says, that these long-continued and disastrous wars were responsible, in large measure, for the general decline of sexual morality among the French. Multitudes of young widows were left all over France to gain their living as they could, and with the few places open to women in Europe for the last half century the outcome can easily be imagined. The evils of war are many-sided, and it is a hopeful sign for France that her statesmen and scholars are beginning honestly to consider what their military glory has cost them.

Chicago Exposition.—The Episcopal Recorder, of Philadelphia, advises that all those who are opposed to the opening of this exhibition on the First-day of the week, or to the selling of liquor therein, should pledge themselves and endeavor to influence others to bear their testimony against these things, by refusing to attend the exhibition if these evils are permitted.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

A valued Friend, a member of the Southern Quarterly Meeting of North Carolina, sends the following information:

"Our Yearly Meeting is over. It was not altogether as unsatisfactory as the last was, but there still seems to be a determination on the part of some to go in ways that are antagonistic to the principles of the Society of Friends. The more conservative element in the Yearly Meeting showed itself more this year than last, on several questions that came before the meeting; especially in regard to the so-called evangelistic work.

"Southern Quarterly Meeting, of which I am a member, is just over, and we had a favored meeting—thought so by many. The religious service or communications were clear, and in power and demonstration [of the spirit]. The business was transacted in condescension and brotherly love, for which we feel thankful."

At the request of a Kansas correspondent we publish the times of holding the following Yearly Meetings (Conservative bodies.)

Iowa, held at North Branch, Io., in even years, at West Branch in odd years, on Fourth-day following the 1st First-day in Tenth Month.

Ohio, held at Stillwater, near Barnesville, O., on Seventh-day before last First-day in Ninth Month.

Western, held at Sugar Grove, near Plainfield, Hendricks Co., Ind., on Sixth-day preceding 2nd First-day in Ninth Month.

Kansas, held at Emporia, Kan., on Sixth-day after 3d First-day in Tenth Month.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 10, 1892.

The article on "Worldly Conformity," which is reprinted in the present number of our paper, was written, it is believed, by the late Thomas Evans, and published in the columns of THE FRIEND about thirty years ago. Its reappearance was suggested by a valued minister of our Society. About the same time a request reached the Editor from a ministering Friend among the Norwegians of Iowa, that we should republish parts of an Address issued by Thomas Shillitoe in 1820, which treats largely of the evils of that form of worldliness which leads to excessive desire to accumulate money. This temptation he thought was at the present time a prevalent evil among the Scandinavians.

It was a matter of interest to find that well-concerned Friends, living many hundreds of miles apart, were brought under a similar concern at the same time, and both in harmony with the Scripture declaration, "To be carnally-minded is death," (spiritually).

In the affecting narrative preserved in the Acts of the Apostles, of the parting interview of the Apostle Paul with the Elders of Ephesus, he exhorted them to take heed to themselves, and to the flock—and forewarned them that men should arise speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them. It seems to us, that the care which should rest on the minds of those who, in any sense of the word, are overseers of the flock, is two-fold. They should endeavor to protect them from the infusion of errors in doctrine, to which they may be exposed; and also encourage them in that personal submission to the visitations of the Holy Spirit, without which there is no growth in true religion.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows that the decrease of the interest and non-interest bearing debt amounted to $153,215.50 during Eighth Mo. The total cash in the Treasury is $781,514,982.86.

The Chicago Tribune says, over 2,000,000 postal cards are necessary to meet the daily demand in this country.

The Treasury Department has directed the return to Germany of seven persons, who came to New York in the steamer Werkeodam, to work under contract in a New Jersey tannery. It was found that their contracts to labor were written in German, and that they had been instructed as to what answers they should give when questioned by the inspectors.

The Secretary of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange announces that the cotton crop for the year which ended Eighth Month 31st, 1892, reached the enormous aggregate of 9,015,379 bales, against 8,652,597 last year and 7,211,372 the year before last, an excess over last year of 382,782 bales, and the year before of 1,724,057.

A dispatch from Marquette, Michigan, on the 1st inst., says: "The steamer Western Reserve, bound for Cleveland, Ohio, broke in two off Au Sable banks, near Deer Park, Tuesday night. Twenty-six persons were drowned. Harry Stewart, of Algonac, was saved. Two of the bodies washed ashore this morning."

George William Curtis, the eminent Civil Service reformer, author, statesman, and Editor of Harper's Weekly, died on the 31st ult., at his home, at Livingston, Staten Island. He was sixty-eight years old.

The Italian transport Garigliano, bearing the Columbus statue, the gift of the Italians of New York to that city, arrived at Quarantine on the 4th inst. The monument is in the Garigliano's hold, packed in 170 parts. The monument when put together will be 76 feet high, the figure of Columbus being 14 feet.

Governor Pattison has issued a proclamation naming Tenth Month 21st as a general holiday, in commemoration of the discovery of America, and asking the people to hold "appropriate services teaching loyalty to our country and gratitude for the Divine benediction which has so abundantly blessed our people."

The German steamship Moravia arrived at New York late on the night of the 30th ult., from Hamburg, having had twenty-two deaths from cholera among her passengers during the voyage. Of these, twenty were infants and two adults; the dead were buried at sea. There were no cases of the disease found when the quarantine officers made their inspection. The vessel, notwithstanding the character of her death record, steamed up to the quarantine station, and among the fleet of vessels anchored there. She was ordered back to the lower bay.

Two steamships from Hamburg, having cholera on board, arrived at New York on the 3rd inst., and were at once quarantined in the lower bay. These were the Normannia, of the Hamburg-American Line, five of whose passengers had died of cholera on the voyage and four were ill, and the Rugia, of the same line, which had four deaths and six cases of sickness. During the day two more deaths on the Normannia and one on the Rugia were reported, and on the 4th there were three deaths on the Normannia and eight new cases, two deaths on the Rugia and one on the Moravia. The dead were removed to Swinburne Island for cremation, and the steerage passengers of the Normannia were transferred to Hoffman's Island. The sick were sent to Swinburne Island.

On the 5th inst. there were four deaths from cholera at quarantine and four new cases.

As yet no case has appeared in New York City, or anywhere else in the States.

Supervising Surgeon-General Wyman, of the U. S. Marine Hospital Service, on the 1st inst. issued a circular, which was accompanied by the approval of the President, directing that "no vessel from any foreign port carrying immigrants shall be admitted to enter at any port of the United States until such vessel shall have undergone a quarantine detention of twenty days (unless such detention is forbidden by the laws of the State or the regulations thereunder), and of such greater number of days as may be fixed in each case by the State authorities." This order, which is addressed to customs and other United States officials, foreign steamship companies, and State and local Boards of Health, is to take immediate effect, except in case of vessels now aloft.

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 411, being 2 less than the previous week, and 45 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 227 were males and 184 females; 147 were under one year of age; 53 died of cholera infantum; 50 of consumption; 41 of marasmus; 21 of pneumonia; 20 of inanition; 18 of diseases of the heart; 18 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 17 of diphtheria; 13 of casualties; 10 of convulsions; 10 of inflammation of the brain and 10 of dysentery.

FOREIGN.—Several deaths from cholera have occurred in London since last SUMMARY. On the 5th inst. it was stated, that at that time there was not a single case of cholera in Great Britain, excepting two convalescents in London hospitals.

A dispatch from Hamburg, of the 4th inst., says: The ambulances of the city yesterday took to the hospitals 325 cholera patients, of whom 197 died; 528 cholera cases and 329 deaths not previously reported were registered yesterday, in pursuance of police orders. These bring the total figures, reckoning from the beginning of the epidemic, up to 5,623 cases and 2,518 deaths.

The statistics of the cholera epidemic show that throughout the whole of Russia, on the 3rd inst. there were 6,673 new cases of the disease reported and 2,714 persons died from the pestilence.

In Paris the disease is nearly stationary, and in Havre, Antwerp and other parts of Europe, the disease, it is hoped, is abating.

A Paris bird dealer has recently received 6,000 birds of Paradise, 300,000 Indian birds of various species, and 400,000 humming birds.

A dispatch from Vienna dated Eighth Month 30th, says: The Corn Fair here opened to-day with a fair attendance. Herr Natchauer, the President of the Corn Exchange, delivered a remarkable speech, which was the sensation of the day. It contained marked reference to "the growing unremunerativeness of corn growing in Europe in the face of the overwhelming American competition, constantly increasing through the continual opening up of new regions to cultivation and the lowering of railway freight rates." Herr Natchauer said that, in view of this competition, there remained but one chance for Europe, namely, by the building of a network of canals in Central Europe. The speaker's hearers evidently regarded the chance he set forth as poor consolation.

The Vienna correspondent of the News says: "The Czar has wired the commander of the Russian forces in the Pauir country to henceforth avoid any adventures which would be likely to provoke England."

A railway train has arrived in Jerusalem from Jaffa, the railway between the two places having been completed.

A dispatch from India says that the forces of the Ameer of Afghanistan have won an important success over the Hazaras. The latter, after a severe conflict, in which 460 of the Afghan troops were killed, were compelled to evacuate Kamsan, which place was at once occupied by the Afghans. Much discontent prevails among the Ameer's troops, owing to lack of supplies, and many are deserting.

MEMORIAL OF CHESTER MONTHLY MEETING, NEW JERSEY, CONCERNING OUR BELOVED FRIENDS, DAVID AND RACHEL H. ROBERTS.

David Roberts was the son of Joseph and Isanna Roberts, of Burlington County, New Jersey, and was born at their residence, near Moorestown, on the 14th of Second Month, 1792. Endowed with good natural abilities, by submission to the work of Divine Grace in his heart, he became qualified for usefulness in the Church, and was early appointed to important stations therein. He was married to Rachel Hunt, on the 15th of Second Month, 1815, a union permitted to continue for nearly sixty-six years, during which, under the Divine blessing, tended their mutual growth and establishment in the truth.

Rachel Hunt was the daughter of Joshua and Esther Hunt, and was born on the 24th of Tenth Month, 1791, at their residence near Brownsville, Fayette County, Pennsylvania, whither her parents had removed from Moorestown in the previous year. Her father dying the next year, her mother was left a widow with six children, the eldest twelve years, and the youngest four months old; yet, trusting (as she wrote at the time), that He, whose tender mercies are over all his works, would care for and preserve them. "She was," says her daughter, "a woman of common endowments; and though it was her duty to be much from home in attendance at the establishment of meetings, and on other religious service, she maintained a steady, firm control over her household, being greatly solicitous for the preservation of her children from the follies and vices to which they were exposed. Her affectionate, religious care was blessed, and they cherished her memory, with love and gratitude."

She also writes, in reference to the large emigration of Friends to the West, in and near the year 1800:

"Friends from various parts brought their certificates to our Monthly Meeting. From North Carolina a whole Monthly Meeting came. Amongst these were many valuable Friends, ministers and others, who located temporarily with us; and I well remember being baptized under the ministry of some of these."

In the year 1807, Esther Hunt was married to John Collins, a member and elder of Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey, and returned to her native State. Rachel Hunt accompanied her mother, and soon after entered Westtown Boarding School as a pupil, a privilege she greatly prized, and ever after, retained a lively interest in that Institution. After leaving Westtown, her residence was for a time with some relatives in Philadelphia, and while there she attended the North Meeting, where [she says] "Dear Thomas Scattergood and many other valuable Friends belonged; and I often mingled with them, greatly to my comfort. These were times not to be forgotten." She loved the society of the wise and good, and kept very near the Shepherd's tents. After leaving the city, she was engaged in teaching till near the time of her marriage in 1815. Possessing largely the power to influence others, as well as the spirit of the true philanthropist, she found this an agreeable occupation.

After their marriage, we believe it was the united concern of David and Rachel H. Roberts, to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, with the assurance that all things needful would be added; and while diligent in business, it was never permitted to interfere with their religious duties.

David Roberts was a man of strict integrity, careful not to engage in business beyond his ability to manage; avoiding speculation, or anything that would involve him in debt, and an example of moderation, as becomes our Christian profession. In his wife he had a true helpmeet. United in religious belief, and attached by education and heartfelt conviction of their truth and importance to our principles and testimonies, they sought to live in accordance therewith, watching over their family in the fear of the Lord, as those that must give an account; and, while careful to imbue the minds of their children with a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and love for them, failed not to direct them to the Word nigh in the heart, and were constrained at seasons to impress on their minds the importance of yielding to the contriving influence of Divine Grace, that they might witness its transforming and preserving power.

Sensible of the value of a good education, they labored to promote this in their family and neighborhood. They were also active members of the Westtown Committee for thirty-five years, and spent two and a half years in that institution, as Superintendent and Matron.

The natural and spiritual gifts of our friend, Rachel H. Roberts, qualified her for extensive usefulness, and it was her ardent desire, as manifested in her daily life, and recorded in her diary, to employ these gifts to the honor of her Heavenly Father and the benefit of her fellow creatures, and we think it may be truly said, that, in the spirit of her Divine Master, she went about doing good. In reference to her service in visiting those under affliction, she writes: "I have long felt that I did not live for myself alone; and, when I may, by visiting the aged or afflicted, cheer them on their way a little, I feel peace in so doing, though attended with some sacrifice on my part." In the chamber of sickness, and by the bed of death, she was untiring in her ministrations, while her sympathetic heart, and the quiet, religious frame of her spirit, qualified her peculiarly to mingle with and comfort the mourners.

She had the sympathy and encouragement of her husband in her efforts for the relief of the destitute and afflicted, and many of these, orphans and others, found shelter under their hospitable roof, and partook of their parental care.

Their house and hearts were ever open to receive their friends; and it was their privilege to entertain many dignified servants of the Lord, to whom they were united in religious fellowship, whose company and conversation were felt to be comforting and instructive.

Eagerly desiring the establishment of the Redeemer's kingdom in the earth, while rejoicing in any evidence of a more general and increasing belief in the spiritual nature of the Gospel dispensation, they longed for a revival of true religion within our own Society; that we might be united to Christ, and to one another in Him—prepared to hold out the inviting language to others, "Come and have fellowship with us," for "our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ." To promote this, they were willing to spend and be spent, freely giving of their time and means, in the service of the Church; were diligent in the attendance of meetings, and exercised in spirit therein, for the arising of life. Blessed with sound judgment, and seeking for that wisdom which is from above, they were serviceable in the administration of the Discipline. As overseers, they were favored with ability to labor with offenders in the spirit of restoring love. In recording the death of a friend, who had long been united with her in this service, Rachel H. Roberts says: "Many deep and humiliating trials have we passed through together, in the exercise of our Discipline, in which we have felt, that we had no might of our own, that the work was the Lord's, and, if carried on aright, it must be by the aid of his Holy Spirit."

As elders, they were enabled to enter into sympathy and travail of spirit with those engaged in the work of the ministry, frequently accompanying these on religious visits, in which service they were felt to be truly helpful. While feeling deeply the importance of maintaining our testimony in regard to worship and ministry, they were careful that none should be unduly discouraged.

Their zeal on behalf of the cause of Truth did not abate with age. As members of a committee appointed by the Yearly Meeting in 1872, and one by the Quarterly Meeting in 1875, (when in their eighty-fourth year), they entered warmly into the service, visiting in Gospel love, with other Friends, many meetings and families, in our own and other Quarterly Meetings. They were also frequently engaged in social visiting, believing they had a mission to perform in this line, and that such intercourse, under right influence, tends to strengthen the bond of Christian fellowship. They were much beloved by their young friends, and for these their hearts went out in affectionate solicitude, that they might accept the Saviour's invitation, to take his yoke upon them and learn of Him, who is meek and lowly in heart, and become qualified for service in the Church. Under a concern for this class, David Roberts wrote in 1874, "I have this day entered my eighty-third year, and the aspiration of the Patriarch frequently arises, 'God, before whom my fathers * * * did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day, the angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads.'"

Thus, with their loins girded about and their lights burning, they waited for the coming of their Lord; furnishing an instructive example of the efficacy of Divine Grace, which, in early life, visited their souls, and qualified them for the Lord's work, supported under many trials, and now enabled them to bear the infirmities of age with meekness and patience; their hearts filled with thankfulness for their many blessings, and the goodness and mercy, that had been extended to them through life, of which they made frequent acknowledgments.

In 1870, after copying the 23rd Psalm, David Roberts wrote: "In mercy, I have been permitted to apply the comforting language of the Psalmist, during an attack of sickness, which has confined me to the house for six weeks."

In 1879, his wife expressed herself in a letter to an absent daughter: "I have been sitting alone, turning over the leaves of my early life, and felt humble and thankful for blessings and mercies, granted to one so unworthy." Many similar expressions are left on record.

They continued to attend meetings diligently, when able to do so, and in 1880 were both in attendance at our Yearly Meeting. Previous to this, imperfect action of the heart had warned David Roberts that the end was at hand; yet he continued to attend to business and his religious duties, and on the 28th of Eleventh Month of that year, attended his own meeting for the last time. It was held in silence, and was felt by many to be remarkably quiet and solemn. On the next day, he took cold, resulting in an illness which, in a few days, terminated his life.

Ever diffident of his abilities, humble, and teachable by the renewings of Divine Grace and obedience to its manifestations, he had grown from stature to stature, till he became a strong man and father in the Church; the fruits of the Spirit becoming more apparent in his character as time advanced, thus witnessing that "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

During his sickness he was not able to converse much, but his mind remained clear to the last; and a few words dropped at intervals, gave evidence that he had a well-grounded hope of acceptance. Other expressions evinced that his mind was under exercise on account of the Church.

On being told that it was Monthly Meeting day, he said, "I know it; and have been thinking who would fill the vacant places, but that I must leave;" and then expressed his concern that those engaged in transacting the business of our meetings, might remember that it is the Lord's work, and should be done as in his sight, adding, that it pained him to see it entered upon in a cold, formal and lifeless manner. Sustained by that faith which gives the victory over death and the grave, on the morning of the 9th of Twelfth Month, 1880, he quietly passed away, in the eighty-ninth year of his age.

An aged minister, prevented by illness from attending his funeral, wrote thus respecting him, to a member of the family: "His loss will be keenly felt in the various branches of the militant Church, wherein his fatherly counsel, and discriminating judgment, for a lengthened period of time, have been listened to with attention and profit; but his day's work is now ended, being done in the daytime, as he was no loiterer, but prudently industrious and active, while his day lasted; and I doubt not the pearl gate has been opened to him, and the fiat announced of 'Well done, good and faithful servant.'"

Rachel H. Roberts survived her husband six months; increasingly feeling her loss, and gradually declining in strength; yet with her mind preserved in brightness and peaceful serenity to the close, not trusting for salvation to any works of righteousness that she had done, but humbly relying on the mercy of God, in Christ Jesus. Many years before, she had written: "I have no other hope of salvation, than through the merits of a crucified Redeemer, who ever liveth to make intercession for poor, fallen man," and this continued to be her hope to the end.

Steadfastness of faith in Christ had been a striking feature of her religious character through life, and she had shown her faith by her works. To such as these our Saviour declared the gracious language would be addressed, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you, from the foundation of the world." "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Her death occurred on the 23rd of Sixth Month, 1881, in the ninetieth year of her age. To both of our beloved Friends, the language seems applicable—"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord; from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

WHAT alcohol is to the physical man, that ritualism is to the spiritual nature, a delusive power that begins by unhealthy though fascinating and bewildering excitement, and ends in fatal stupor, more or less intense in proportion to the degree in which it is indulged.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Visit to Barnegat.

Barnegat is a village of some seven hundred inhabitants, situated on the railroad that runs from Whiting's Station to Tuckerton, in New Jersey, and about two miles inland from the waters of Barnegat Bay, which stretch for a long distance north and south inside of the narrow sand beaches which border the ocean, and furnish delightful bathing grounds for those who seek refreshment in that way.

On the 30th of Seventh Month, I accompanied a Friend, who felt drawn in the love of the Gospel to visit the little remnant of Friends who live in that vicinity. We were met at the depot by a kind Friend, who took us to his home and entertained us hospitably. He lives on a small farm near the salt marsh, which in a wide strip borders the bay. The ground is level and low. In the immediate vicinity of his house were several cranberry bogs, fringed with bushes where mosquitoes harbored in great numbers and issued forth to earn their living by sucking the blood of the passers-by—so that, for comfortable walking, it was necessary to carry the hand a leafy bush and keep it constantly waving around the head and neck. And even then the frequent insertion into one of the handles of the beautifully-constructed lancets of this sect, would remind the sufferer that constant vigilance was needed for the protection of exposed parts of the body.

Our kind host, who had lived here for many years, had become so accustomed to them, that they had almost ceased to annoy him. Inside the house, we were comparatively safe, for the houses we were in, in that settlement, were furnished with gauze screens for the doors and windows.

On the approach of cold weather, the mosquitoes disappear, probably the greater part of them perish, but some survive, and the following summer lay their eggs on the surface of water in sheltered spots, from ten to twenty little oblong bodies, which adhere together like small boats or rafts. These soon hatch, and the larvae go down into the water, where they are supposed to find food in the decaying vegetation, or in the minute animalculæ which abound in such situations, and where they go through ordinary changes of form which mark insect life. When ready to emerge they come to the surface, the skin splits open and the winged insect in its perfected state comes forth, and thus the round of its existence is completed.

We noticed that many of the horses were clothed with a garment made of thick muslin which covered the head, neck, ears, and most of the body. This we were told was a necessary precaution, especially when working on the marshes, not only against the attacks of the mosquitoes, but those of the much more dreaded green-headed flies. These are much larger insects, and their bite is very painful. They abound in the marshes and are most active in the sunlight. At night they retire and cease their attacks.

Some years ago, a Friend had appointed religious meeting to be held in the evening, at a house near the marshes north of Absecon. On going there at the time fixed upon, seven o'clock, the house was found unopened and no one about. We patiently waited until about eight o'clock, a goodly company assembled, who explained that they were unwilling to have their horses tied and exposed to the bites of the green-headed flies, and so waited till they had retired for the night. This fly belongs to the genus Tabanus, of which

There are more than one hundred species living in North America.

To this same group of flies belongs the Zimbabwé Tsetse-fly, an African species which by its bite poisons cattle, so that they soon die from the effects; and thus it renders some parts of that continent almost inaccessible to travellers who are dependent on their oxen for the transportation of their supplies. There are frequent references to it in the journals of African explorers.

The irritation and swelling which follow the bite of our Mosquito indicate a slight poisonous quality, but we know of no American fly which in all approaches, in this respect, the African tsetse. Although it has occasionally happened, that the bite of a Gnat has been followed by serious consequences, by inoculating the system with a poisonous microbe derived from some infected animal that had been previously visited.

The Black-fly is a more formidable pest than the Mosquito. A. S. Packard says: "In the northern, subarctic regions, it opposes a barrier against travel. The Labrador fisherman spends his summer on the sea-shore, scarcely daring to penetrate the interior on account of the swarms of these flies.

"During a summer residence on this coast, we sailed up the Esquimaux River for six or eight miles, spending a few hours at a house situated on the bank. The day was warm and with little wind blowing, and the swarms of black flies were absolutely terrific. In vain we frantically waved our net among them, allured by some rare moth; after making a few desperate charges in the face of the thronging pests, we had to retire to the house, where the windows were actually swarmed with them; but here they could fly in our face, crawl under one's clothes, and here they would even remain and bite in the night.

"The children in the house were sickly and torn with their unceasing torments; and the raggy Newfoundland dogs, whose thick coats could seem to be proof against their bites, ran from their shelter beneath the bench and dashed into the river, their only retreat. In cloudy weather the black-fly disappears, only flying when the sun shines. Its bite is often severe, leaving a large clot of blood to mark the scene of its surgical triumphs."

A short walk the morning after our arrival showed that there were several interesting plants, natives of that region. The most beautiful of these was an Orchid (Habenaria blephariglotis), the stem of which ended in a large spike of snow-white flowers. The common lily (Lilium superbum), with its large orange-colored blossoms, was scattered over the bogs or among the bushes that fringed them. The pink blossoms of the Thread-leaved Sundew (Drosera filiformis) peeped up prettily among the grass and other plants, and several other species were to be seen. But as the object of our visit was not botanical, but little attention was given to these attractive objects.

There are only ten or twelve persons belonging to the meeting at Barnegat, and these are mostly middle-aged and elderly people. There are few, if any, children among them; so that their usual meetings are quite small. But there is evidently an open feeling towards our Society in that neighborhood, and when notice is given that strangers are expected, many others usually assemble.

Our late valued friend, John S. Stokes, was much interested in the people of Barnegat, and visited it at intervals for a period of twenty years. He became so well known and well esteemed by the inhabitants, that the meeting-house would be filled when he was there.

About sixty were present on this occasion, who were reminded of the tender mercy and loving kindness of the Almighty, who desires the happiness of his creatures; and there was impressed on our minds the necessity of walking in obedience to the convictions made on the mind by his Grace and good Spirit, so that we might become prepared for the enjoyment of perpetual felicity hereafter. Prayer was also made for the continued extension of the Lord's visitations to the hearts of the people.

The soil about Barnegat seemed pretty good, and the crops looked well. The marsh land is principally used for pasture, and for cutting salt hay, which is sent to New York and other places for packing purposes. The farmers complained that the vicinity of the bay rendered it difficult for them to procure sufficient help on their farms, because so many preferred the more irregular, yet profitable employment of clamming and fishing.

We were hospitably entertained by Friends of that place, and came away feeling an increased interest in the little handful there known by our name, and in the people around them.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

On Church Extension.

[The following address, written by a member of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, has been forwarded to us for insertion in THE FRIEND.—ED.]

DEAR FRIENDS:—As a member of the committee on "church extension," I pen the following as my concern in regard to it.

My first concern is the revival of the life of truth within our present borders, for it is plain we can not extend that which we are destitute of. If our doctrines, testimonies, &c., are truth, they are certainly worthy of extension. Whether there be much or little opening for the reception of our principles among the people at large, the number of faithful, weighty or qualified laborers are few, and as we cannot qualify and send forth ourselves, it remains for those who live up to the principles, in the attendance of meetings, the separation from the world, &c., in the life of truth, to strive to keep under travail, and pray the Lord of the harvest to qualify and send forth laborers in his own good time.

We need humble, obedient servants, who have a zeal according to the true knowledge, and who wait to know the movings of the divine Spirit, so they may bring people from the spirit which works disobedience and brings deadness, into the spirit of life, which life is the light of men, by which they may see that which comes from the evil seed, and by which alone they may come to true repentance and receive a faith in, and power to submit to Christ as He works within, as well as a faith in what He has done without us. This is the faith which overcomes the world, and which needs to be extended. To bring people under the influence of this spirit, which alone can give the true understanding of the Scriptures, and lead into all truth, is the only way the church can be extended.

If we fall short of bringing them into acquaintance with and obedience to the teachings of the grace which saves and which has appeared unto all, though we extend the name of the Society, we do not extend the life or foundation principle.

The lack of submission to this teaching in the conscience, is why so very many who profess conversion fail to be redeemed from the love of the world and its diversions, or from the nature which is ashamed of the simplicity of truth.

We make a higher profession than most others, and I wish none may seek to lower the standard for the sake of extension or of attracting numbers. Would that all who claim to be Friends could be willing to walk in the light, that we might have true Christian fellowship, and know of the blood of Christ, cleansing us from all sin. Would they could accept and strive to extend the prominent and fundamental doctrine of the work in the heart of the spirit, light or grace, and not get it mixed with Hicksism and consider it dangerous, for it doesn't at all do away with any part of Christ, who alone is the Way, the Truth and the Life, but gives the true benefit of all He has done for us.

'Tis awful to reject this doctrine of the Light, &c., as given in the Scriptures, or to lead others to think lightly of it. I like the suggestion of a member of the committee, that "we read Friends' writings, and find out truly what Friends' principles are," for 'tis plain we cannot extend that which we do not know.

If any looking towards Friends after having read their writings were to hear ministers, or others in the Society preaching or contending for doctrines in direct opposition, they might reasonably conclude that these have no just claim on the name, so I wish we may all contend for and strive to extend the same faith.

In conclusion, I feel to make an earnest appeal to all to let the life of Truth in themselves, and the spread of it among others be their chief concern. Seeing the shortness of time, and the little satisfaction that anything earthly can afford, especially in times of adversity and at the approach of death, we should feel that there isn't anything in this deceitful, perishing world worth striving after, only the preparation for a better home and bringing glory to our Creator.

I wish none may turn away sorrowful when told they must sell all and follow Christ. If any would know the importance of salvation and the awfulness of eternity, they must not reject that which gives the sense thereof. There being no way to happiness except by the way of the cross, we should be willing to take it up, as it is the only way the rebellious nature is to be crucified.

I conclude by saying, I have written more extensively than I had intended, but have penned my mind, as I felt concerned.

Your friend in the Truth,

ANDERSON M. BARKER.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Curious Mistake.

In Ezra Michener's "Retrospect of Early Quakerism," he quotes a record from Thirdhaven Monthly Meeting, Maryland, dated 1676, for "Friends to buy convenient burial-plates," which he supposes were to place upon the coffins of their dead. Having recently had an opportunity of examining the ancient book of Minutes of that Monthly Meeting, I find (as was pointed out to me by a Friend); that the supposed "t" in plates, was an old-fashioned "c" made with a dot over it, as in numerous other instances in the same book. So, that the advice of the Monthly Meeting was, that Friends should buy convenient burial-places as grave-yards.

As E. Michener does not appear to have seen the records himself, but to have trusted to the copy sent him, he cannot be held responsible for this mistake. That Friends in the early history of this country did not favor the use of such burial-plates is shown by the following Minute adopted in 1729 by Concord Monthly Meeting: "Whereas it hath been upon the minds of some Friends to suppress all superfluous practices of putting of names and dates upon coffins; and it is the mind of this meeting that, for the future, Friends desist from all such idolatrous practices."

SELECTED.

FAINT, YET PURSUING.

All alone within my chamber, as the darkness gathered round,
And upon the sombre stillness fell no murmur of a sound,
Save the brooklet's rippling cadence, and the sighing evening air,
Sending through the leafy branches, a low whisper of despair—
All alone I sat and pondered on the long and weary way,
Ere the soul could break its bondage—ere its night becometh day.
Mine had faltered in the journey that it weakly strove to run,
And again, again, had slidden backward where it first begun.
All the late-formed resolutions, that in human strength were made,
On the altar of temptation, early in the strife were laid;
Still unwatchful was the spirit guarding life's besetting sin—
And a deep, unconquered shrinking from the cross was felt within.
"Tis in vain! I ne'er shall triumph!" was my heart's despairing cry;
"Wherefore yet prolong the warfare? Self will never wholly die—
And my feet so far have wandered from my Father's house astray,
That in vain they seek to enter and to keep the narrow way."
Then a low-breathed whisper falleth softly on my inward ear,
"Faint not—yield not up the conflict—wherefore should'st thou doubt and fear?
Though the billows of temptation shall engulf thee, o'er and o'er,
Never cease the mighty struggle till thy feet have gained the shore!
Daily yet renew the contest, hourly gird thine armor on!
Take thy cross, uplift it boldly, 'tis a weight that must be borne.
If in helplessness thy spirit almost lays its burden down,
Oh! remember that above thee glitters the rewarding crown.
Strength is only born of weakness, power is not attained by will,
At the feet of thy Redeemer thou must be more helpless still.
All the good thou seest round thee, have been tried and tempted too,
Only by renewing effort have they feebly struggled through.
All that's greatest groweth slowly, as in nature's perfect plan,
Cloud and sun alike are needed, so within the heart of man.
Every seedling God hath planted, must receive both smile and frown,
Tears of penitence must water, dew of sorrow bow it down,
Ere a ray of Heaven's sunlight, with its warm, reviving power,
Draweth upward, in the fulness of his own appointed hour.
Take thy high resolves and broken, made alone in strength of thine,
And with all subdued and humbled, lay them tear-stained on his shrine.
Bowing there in lowliest meekness, let the breath of prayer arise,
And the God who heareth sinners, thee will hear beyond the skies."
And my fainting soul took courage, and the spirit of the air
Seemed no longer sorrow-haunted by the breathings of despair,

But a peaceful calm was resting on the silence of my room,
And a slanting moonbeam quivered brightly thro' the deepened gloom.
And to you, my fellow-travellers, who are drooping on the way,
I would fain this hope and comfort shed upon your hearts to-day.
Let us not sink down o'er-wearied, for the brink whereon we stand,
Many pressed, we now are deeming angels in the Better Land.
Even now the trump has sounded and a mighty prophet gone,
One who in Jehovah's army battled valiantly and long;
Who our Ark of Faith supported with a firmness nought could quell;
All the bulwarks of our Zion trembled when that pillar fell.*
Let us, then, press bravely forward, and a holy voice may call
From our ranks, on whom his mantle may with added virtue fall,
For the great Eternal Father will be magnified o'er all!

—Dew Drops.

Address to the Society of Friends.

DEAR FRIENDS:—In the first place, let me put you in mind of the nature and importance of that religious profession, we, as a Society, are making among men; which I believe would be found to be above that of every other Society of professing Christians—to wit, the absolute necessity of our living, acting, and moving in all our civil as well as religious engagements, under the influence and government of the Spirit of Christ Jesus, our Lord and Lawgiver; that "whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, God the Father may in all things be glorified."

I believe our first Friends were raised up as a people, to bear testimony to the sufficiency of that pure principle of light and life in all mankind, which would direct them in the way to the heavenly Canaan, and strengthen them to walk therein. They confirmed the truth of their testimony by the general tenor of their conduct, giving ample proof to by-standers, that through submission to its holy appearance in their hearts, they were mercifully redeemed from the world and its spirit, not only from its pleasures, but also from its treasures, and were enabled to count all things appertaining to this life but as dross, and as dung, so that they might win Christ. Hereby they became as an ensign to the nations, for the fame of them spread far and wide: they became instrumental in the Divine Hand to gather souls unto God, and had to proclaim the glad tidings of the church being added unto daily. But alas, my friends! how is the gold become dim, and the most fine gold changed! how is the love of God, and that humility and self-denial so manifest in them, now, by too many amongst us, turned into the love of other things, such as gold and silver, and a desire to make an appearance of greatness in the world.

How many among us are pursuing their worldly concerns, as if they counted gain godliness, and not, as must be the case with the true disciples and followers of Christ, godliness with contentment to be the greatest riches, proclaiming in the language of conduct, that all is fish that comes to their net, regarding neither quantity nor quality, so there be a prospect of a good profit attached to it. O, these professing worldlings, who say, they are Jews and are not, but whose fruits testify they are of the synagogue of Satan, I have been persuaded, have been the greatest enemies to the spreading of our religious principles and the enlargement of our borders those who maintain an uniform, consistent warfare against the Babylonish garment, but wit all their might grasp at the wedge of gold, an aim at making a splendid appearance in the way of living. I believe no character is more odious in the estimation of those termed libertines than these, especially where it is known they are taking an active part in Society concerns. For in neighborhoods where meetings are held, it is pretty generally known by those out of the Society, who are what the world call our pillars; though it cannot be doubted that such must at times prove stumbling-blocks to honest inquirers after Zion, and be instrumental in turning the blind out of the right way of the Lord.

I cannot doubt but that a desire to do a great stroke of business, get great riches, and make a great figure with the world, is as much some men's besetting sin, as ever the love of strong drink has been that of others. But where the temptation is yielded unto, which of these do we conceive to be the greatest sin?—he whose mind and faculties are so besotted with strong drink, that he is hereby rendered unequal to the performance of either his civil or religious duties, or he in whom the same effect is produced by an overcharge of business. I am aware the former character is deemed the most immoral; but I am unable to bring my mind to believe it the most sinful; for if our minds are but unfitted for a faithful discharge of our civil and religious duties, whether such disqualification proceeds from a love of gold or of strong drink, I believe the crime is the same in the Divine estimation.

I believe none ever turned aside from the path of safety totally ignorant thereof, but that in the beginning of their erring and straying the witness for God followed them, and at times smote them: but if we disregard its invitation and secret monitions, it is then most just on the part of Almighty God, to leave us to the power and insinuations of Satan; the god of this world who rules in the hearts of the children of disobedience. But even while thus promoting the cause of the evil one, such may continue to make a fair show in the flesh, as to a profession of religion, and be very tenacious respecting some externals, as were the Pharisees—things comparable to the mint, anise and cummin, and in which Satan will not oppose them, so long as they rest therewith satisfied, and continue to rebel against the light, refusing to submit to the heart-cleansing operation of God's word and power, which only can effectually cleanse the inside of the cup and the platter.

THOMAS SHILLITOE.

First of Eleventh Month, 1820.

WHATEVER modifications the views of some may have undergone with regard to "dress and address," I have found the way of the cross in these things, little as they may be accounted profitable and safe; and although they may involve some peculiarity and even singularity, I believe that when in contact with a community where large sacrifices are made to the idol of dress, they would prove a safeguard and a salutary restraint upon the dear children; and in reference to things that extend far beyond the limits of dress and address. I have no unit with that spirit which would make the path wider for the children than that which has been trodden, and proved to be salutary by their parents.—G. W. Walker.

With many of the negro refugees assembled under the guns of Fortress Monroe, freedom was not simply idleness. The custom of the South had made slavery synonymous with hard labor, and, conversely, freedom should be immunity from all work. Stories were afloat too, among the contrabands, that the Government would give to each of them forty acres and a mule as soon as the war was over, and in the meantime the issue of rations to the thousands gathered about the fort and camps, went far toward confirming the idea that henceforth the negro was to be recompensed by pay without labor for the many past years of labor without pay. And so a great and daily increasing multitude lived from hand to mouth, doing whatever work they were set to do obediently, receiving the Government and other supplies sent down to them as a matter of course, but showing little ambition to work for themselves or to accumulate property.

This was the rule, but there were exceptions, and the shrewd common-sense and indomitable energy of Martha Ann (or Mrs. Fields, as we will now call her), showed itself as clearly in the beginning of her life as a free woman as it did during slavery. The old iron pot picked up and toilsomely carried along the road to freedom was the sign and symbol of her future. A home for her children, with decent provision for their comfort, was the meaning of freedom for her, and she expected and desired, not immunity from work and care, but a right to endeavor and to give to her children the results of her own hard labor.

Her first experiment as a free laborer proved very different from the experiences of slavery. Believing, as all the contrabands did, that the Yankees were angels, she was much pleased when the opportunity came to her to hire herself to a northern man, resident near Fortress Monroe. An agreement was entered into, and, with her children and her household goods, Mrs. Fields took up her residence and her work with Mr. B. She was to do cooking, her older girls were to help with the housework, and the elder sons to attend to the out-of-door work, the wages the whole family being paid in to the mother. But Mr. B. evidently supposed that as they had just escaped from slavery they would not know their rights in freedom, and the lash was a part of his system of domestic government. Mrs. Fields had not taken her long and arduous journey from Hanover Court House to Fortress Monroe for the sake of seeing her youngest daughter Matilda whipped by a white man—neither had Matilda herself. "He tried to whip Matilda, but she was too much of a woman," is the description given by one of her brothers, then a small boy, of the final cause which led his mother to leave Mr. B's service. No pay was ever given to any member of the family for service rendered, and all were treated with harshness and even cruelty. At last, when they could stand it no longer, Mrs. Fields sent her household goods, put her little ones on the top of the load, and amid the alternate threats and promises of Mr. B., departed from his service. Hampton was in those days a town of cellars. There were almost no houses, for the whole town had been burned to the ground at the beginning of the war, but there were cellars in plenty, and these, rudely roofed in with slabs by the negroes, served for temporary abodes to the great refugee population. In one of these cellars Mrs. Fields and her family lived for several weeks, until with the aid of her son-in-law, also escaped from the bondage of Hanover County, and another negro from the same place, she succeeded in building a slab cabin on a bit of land not far from Hampton Creek. The chimney of clay and sticks was the work of her own hands, while the men did the heavier work of raising the house.

In 1863, there were in the vicinity of Fortress Monroe five schools for contrabands, established and supported by the American Missionary Association. There was the opportunity for which Martha Ann in her slave days had waited and hoped and prayed. Even in the old days, she had not only prayed, but worked and denied herself for the education of her children. She had bought from her scanty funds a spelling-book and Testament for her son James, and had prevailed upon a slave on one of the adjoining plantations, who had somehow picked up a little reading, to come over at night, when he could steal away unnoticed, and teach the boy, then about twelve years old. In this way, amid dangers and difficulties, she managed to lay the foundation for an education for him, even in the slavery time. Now, when education was free, and could be got openly, and without danger or difficulty, all the children were sent to school regularly. As far as in her lay, she supplemented the teacher's efforts by her home training. In those days Solomon's axiom about sparing the rod and spoiling the child was held in great respect, and try as they might, the mischievous little Fields' children could not always escape whippings at their teacher's hands. But woe to the child upon whom the whipping fell. His mother was sure, sooner or later, to find it out, and follow up their teachers' discipline by switching on her own account. In vain were all expostulations and explanations. "Do you think the teacher would take the time to whip you if you hadn't done something? Co'se she wouldn't," and with that the switch would fall, an avenging Nemesis, upon the child who could not appreciate the advantages of freedom enough to behave himself in school.

During this first year of freedom, Mrs. Fields went twice a week to Fortress Monroe for Government rations, but did not settle down on this into a state of laziness or carelessness for the future. She wanted to buy the land on which her house stood. She wanted a brick chimney, a better house; better clothes for her children; above all, she wanted to show to her husband and son and daughter when they came, as come they must, some time, for the Lord had promised it, that she had a home and that she had not wasted her time or allowed the children to waste theirs. They all worked, the children in school at their books, out of school helping their mother. She took in washing from the soldiers, and the children helped her with it. She raised chickens and pigs, and so eked out her slender resources, leaving no idle moment in her busy life, and adding day by day a little to her savings. Some of the neighbors laughed at her for her industry. "Wha'er fer you want to buy land? Gov'ment gwine to give us all land by and by." "When the Government gives me land, then I'll have that, too," was the shrewd reply, and Mrs. Fields kept on with her work while some lolled about in the sunshine, content with the Government rations.

So things went for about a year, and at last, one bright May morning in 1864, her son James, who had run away from the old plantation before Martha Ann, and from whom no word had been heard since, walked in on his mother. The joy of that reunion, we may, perhaps, imagine, certainly it cannot be described. The experiences through which James had passed during his flight to freedom, would, if written out, make too long a story. Suffice it to say that three times he was captured as a runaway, but, by his own adroitness, aided by that wonderful freemasonry that existed among the slaves, he had each time made his escape and started off once more, undaunted, for the Union lines.

A week or two later, one more member was added to the family, for on June 11th, Washington Fields, the husband and father came in, after a long and dangerous journey. He had never belonged to the same master as Martha Ann, and consequently had not been able to aid her in her flight; but when he had helped his own master pack up and leave before the approaching enemy, he knew that his chance was come to make his way to freedom and to his wife and children. When the last load of goods had left the "great house," and were all on their way to the nearest Confederate refuge, Washington was sent back to the house for something forgotten. Here was his chance and he took it, struck out across the country, forded rivers, crossed swamps, was shot at by Union and Confederate pickets, but at last made his way safely through the Union lines, and was sent on to Fortress Monroe, to find not only his wife and children, but a home already for him and steady work whereby he might support his family.

Here we might, perhaps, end our story, but if we did, the sketch of Mrs. Fields' indomitable energy would not be complete. One might suppose that now she would rest and let her husband support the family for awhile, and so supposing, understand but little of the character which we are trying to describe.

Mrs. Fields kept right on with her work, supporting the family herself, that her husband's earnings might be set aside intact for the purchase of the land. In two years the land was bought and paid for; a little later a new frame house took the place of the old slab cabin, and so, bit by bit, the old iron pot seemed to gather about it all the comfort and prosperity that Martha Ann was working for when she picked it up as the beginning of her outfit for freedom.

As soon as the war ended, the two oldest sons, John and Tinsley, rejoined their parents, from whom they had been sold in their early boyhood; and, last of all, Louisa, who had been sold into Georgia, was heard from, written to, and brought home to Hampton. Thus the promise made to Martha Ann so many years before, when, in the depths of her grief, she had seen the Lord in the still, Sabbath woods, was at last fulfilled, and she gathered her dear ones about her in her own home, content with work and sacrifice, since hereafter no master but the Lord himself could separate them.

Superior scholarship, rare intellectual gifts, and close study are desirable and useful in the ministry, but they are not sufficient without the holy Ghost. Great scholars are constantly liable to fall into grievous and fatal errors of doctrine and to preach the wisdom of men for the commandments of God. One who is filled with the Spirit is a safer interpreter of the Gospel even though inferior in respect to intellectual gifts and scholarship. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned." Give us the scholarship by all means, but let it be baptized with the Holy Spirit. If we must choose between them we will take the spiritually-minded minister before the scholar.—Christian Advocate.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Bay of Fundy is remarkable for its extraordinary tides, that rush in from the ocean with rapidity and enormous rise, owing to the concentration of the tidal wave by the approach of the shores and the gradual shoaling of the bottom, by which a portion of the horizontal motion is transferred into vertical motion. When in this journey we recently visited Vineyard Haven, the tide rose barely two feet, and at New Bedford four feet. At the mouth of the Kennebec it had increased to nine feet. The trend of the shore northeast of the Kennebec is such as to prepare for the entrance to the Bay of Fundy, so that a powerful tidal current runs through the "Narrows," opposite Lubec.

The Bay of Fundy is a complete cul-de-sac, and the further the tide gets in the higher it rises. In St. John harbor, up the bay, the tidal wave is twenty-one to twenty-three feet, while further up the bay it becomes greater. In Minas Basin the rise reaches forty feet, and in Chignecto Bay, near the upper extremity, sixty feet. Such tremendous tides cause peculiar phenomena. They make the rivers seem to be actually running up hill at times, while the tidal "bore" or wall of water, which is the advance of the flood, moves up the streams and over the flats with the speed of a railway train, often catching unsuspecting animals, and even men, that may be wandering upon the sands.—Public Ledger.

Austin Corbin's Game Park.—Austin Corbin's huge game park in New Hampshire is a success chiefly in relation to the breeding of the animals in their new environment—it can hardly be called captivity when the animals are at liberty to wander at their own sweet will over 28,000 acres of woodland, hill and valley.

Of the twenty-two buffalo which were put in about a year ago eight of the cows are now in calf, and two young have been added to the herd. The elk, which bred to a limited extent on Austin Corbin's Long Island estate, have found their mountainous New Hampshire home more to their liking, and have already increased fifty per cent. Next to the elk the most accurate count has been kept of the moose, who, unlike their gregarious brethren, go in pairs during the rutting season.

While in London two years since Austin Corbin bought 20,000 hawthorn trees. Four thousand of these have been planted this spring. They are for the purpose of forming a hedge strong enough to prevent the buffalo and other large animals from getting out. This tree, of which there are two varieties, the white and black, is used very extensively for enclosing the game parks of England and Europe. There will be no hunting in the park at present, though in future years, when the animals have multiplied beyond the resources of their domain, it is possible that Austin Corbin may adopt this means of thinning them out. It is sufficient to say that the park is not designed for hunting. Neither is it primarily intended for scientific research into the habits, breeding, etc., of the various animals.

The development of Austin Corbin's game park enterprise is being watched with decided interest by sportsmen and naturalists. Success in New Hampshire, when it shall have been demonstrated beyond the peradventure of a doubt, will prompt similar enterprises in other parts of the country. While much interest is felt in the introduction of foreign species, Americans are naturally most concerned with the successful conservation of bands of American big game, the elk and the antelope and the buffalo.—Forest and Stream.

Meteoric Diamonds.—Pieces of natural iron have been found in Arizona, near the Cañon Diablo, which possess an extraordinary hardness, and contain small cavities which are filled with a black substance in which are diamonds, some half a millimeter in diameter. The specimens of natural iron appear to be of meteoric origin. The occurrence of the diamond in natural iron, whether of meteoric origin or not, is an extremely interesting fact.

An Unusual Run of Sea Blubbers Along the South Atlantic Coast.—Something has been said heretofore in regard to the inconvenience caused by sea blubbers to the surf bathers on the island. This nuisance, instead of abating, is on the increase, and if any one wishes to bathe in the sea water now with impunity it becomes necessary to completely swathe himself in clothing from head to foot for fear of being severely stung.

The effects of these stings vary according to the constitution of the sufferer. Usually, in persons of good health and active circulation, an angry red blotch appears in the skin proportionate in size to the animal by which it is inflicted, rarely exceeding eight or ten inches in diameter. An intolerable smarting sensation is produced, which remains ordinarily about half an hour, and it is easy to imagine the condition of a nervous or sensitive person when stung in three or four places at once. The feeling must be nearly akin to that of being on fire.

In some cases the effects are more serious. A young man yesterday showed the writer his arm, which was severely stung. A broad band of what looked like highly inflamed mosquito bites formed an almost perfect spiral around the forearm. He complained that the pain was at first intense, and that, although under a physician's treatment, it was rapidly becoming less, still it was far from pleasant.

An old sea islander who took a surf bath the other night said that he had seen sea blubbers before and in considerable quantities, "but never like this." "At certain seasons of the year," said he, "it is nothing unusual to get stung. Here the exception seems to be to get stung less than five times in half an hour."

Complaints of sea blubbers come also from Tybee and other watering places in the South.—Charleston (S. C.) News.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Barclay Stratton.

Died, at his residence at Winona, Ohio, Seventh Month 21st, 1892, BARCLAY STRATTON, in the sixty-third year of his age. An elder and member of New Garden Monthly Meeting of Friends.

By the removal of this dear Friend, his family, his friends and the Church, have sustained a great loss. Many, both within and without the limits of his own Yearly Meeting, and in the communities where he was known, can feelingly testify to his worth and to the influence for good he was enabled to exert, particularly over the dear young people; being peculiarly gifted to win their love and interest, while ever firm in the support of what he believed to be right.

For some years it had been evident his health was in a critical condition, of which he was fully aware, alluding to it in a feeling manner even before he left the Boarding School in 1889. This consciousness of the uncertainty of life and the possible nearness to him of the termination thereof, continued to clothe his mind with thoughtfulness, and gave evidence that his strongholds were being broken up, and a preparation going on, causing him to sit loosely to the things of this world, and reverently to meditate on those of eternity, though cheerfulness and interest in those about him, and all things around him, remained a marked characteristic to the end of life.

In Eleventh Month last, after an attack of paralysis, from which he partially recovered; arranging his temporal affairs, he remarked "There may be time enough yet for all this, as life is sweet to me, as ever it was, but it is best to prepare for death."

He often manifested much feeling and exercise of mind, but was careful and unassuming in his words on sacred matters, at one time observing—"Thou knowest I have never been very expressive on these subjects." When able to do so, he much enjoyed attending all our religious meetings, evincing increased love and tenderness for his friends, and was often favored to take part in the exercise of the meeting and make appropriate remarks; on two occasions beginning—"Times and seasons are not at our command." Being asked at one time how felt with respect to the future, he replied, he did not profess to any great knowledge in relation thereto, but "I have a hope, and I expect it a well-grounded hope." He appeared to take a review of his life spent at the boarding school and said—"The retrospective view thereof comfortable to me in the general, but there were some things that had better not have been."

He enjoyed reading "Piety Promoted," a once remarked, during the last few days of his life—"Christians believe that there is that which takes away the fear of death; I believe that there is, and that it is attainable, but I do not think many realize it long at a time."

On different occasions, and in a feeling and weighty manner, he gave deep counsel to others evidently accompanied with the true unction.

He spent many wakeful hours at night, and when regret was expressed that he could not sleep more, he said "he did not think the time lost, but that he believed he experienced much favor at such seasons."

After the last attack, on the 17th of Seventh Month, of apoplexy, he could not speak, but appeared conscious some of the time; and the remaining days of his life he lay in a deep sleep or stupor, occasionally brightening up, especially on Fourth-day evening, when he looked round the room, and seemed to give each of them a farewell glance, which was felt to be a precious opportunity. He gradually grew weaker, respiration became shorter and shorter, until he quietly and, we reverently believe, peacefully fell asleep in Jesus.

During the course of his life this dear Friend met with several memorable occurrences, some of which are worthy of record: In the year 1842, he and an older brother were providentially preserved from death; while another brother and two cousins met death in a water bed, while attempting to bathe in a mill-pond. Thus fifty years were added to his life, doubtless for some good purpose.

The doctrines and testimonies of the religious Society of Friends were dear to him, and he avored to practice and uphold them, as opportunity and ability were given. In relation that of war, he was called upon not only "to believe" in them but "to suffer" for them. During the war of the rebellion in 1864, he was captured and taken from his family and friends, placed in camp by military authority, dressed in uniform, and marched off with the soldiers, but not forced to carry arms, nor was he ever in an engagement. He was sent from Columbus, O., to New York, and from thence on board the vessel Arago, to Hilton Head, in North Carolina, and after some detention, was finally released by order of the Government at Washington, in consideration of his conscientious scruples, and was favored to reach his home in safety after an absence of near six weeks.

Unlike some other Friends, he met with no harsh usage; but was treated with nearly uniform kindness and respect by both officers and men. This was a time of great trial and deep sorrow, but being able to cast all his care on the Master, he realized having his feet on a sure foundation, and while marching with the soldiers, and confined upon shipboard or sleeping in open tents, often where he could hear the firing of the opposing army, he was so sustained that, as he has been heard to say, he never lay down at night without a comfortable feeling of assurance that he would be cared for; and very often desires arose that his family at home might experience the same favor.

His openness and kindness of manner gained him friends even in this situation, and many opportunities were given of explaining our principles in regard to war and other things, with innocent boldness and courage.

Items.

Practical Temperance Work.—One of the large New York Banks has made the following order:

"The officers of ——— bank respectfully notify their employees that it is detrimental to the business of the bank for any employee to frequent lager beer saloons, liquor saloons, or any low, questionable place of amusement, and they hereby forbid the same. Any one who disregards this order will be discharged."

Substantially the same order is in force in most of the banks, trust companies and other important financial institutions. It is not proposed, the officers who make these rules say, to curtail the reasonable liberty of their employees, but public confidence is so sensitive and their business is so dependent upon it that they cannot afford to employ men whose habits are questionable. It is not enough that the officers shall themselves be men of order and correct personal habits, but to insure popular confidence, the clerks must also be temperate and trustworthy. This fact promises to exert a highly beneficial influence in behalf of temperance, and if it has recognition from the directors of all kinds of business, as it already has from bank, railroad men, steamboat men and some others, its effect will be far-reaching.

Meetings for Worship.—Addison Coffin, in describing the season of silence with which the meetings of Friends at London commenced, and the thinness and reverence manifested, says—"Such a meeting the younger generation in the Northwest (the United States) has not seen, nor could they fully understand, if seen. Western life has drifted forward, or away from silent meetings." These few words of comment from a man whose experience and observation qualify to speak with authority, convey to the mind of a Friend a vivid picture of the extent to which the original principles of the religious Society have been deserted in many places.

Superstition.—An Italian place of worship has been discovered; it possessed a dried-up, mummified arm which was said to have belonged to Saint Ann, the mother of the Virgin Mary, although the probability that this was so, is very small. A piece of it has been sawed off and sent to the French Church of St. Ann, on the St. Lawrence River. On its way there, it passed through New York and was put on exhibition there—the audience being told that it was "part of the body of the grandmother of God!" Some miracles are reported as having been performed by its means.

The Independent makes the following comments: While a great many Catholic churches in this country have relics, the practice of exposing them for the purpose of working miracles is almost extinct. This fact is a proof of better intelligence and wiser faith. The Catholic Church in America is no weaker but is stronger for quietly dropping such superstitions; although they will not be denounced, but may go on here and there among the ignorant, just as in New Mexico and Arizona the flagellantes and penitentes still continue their extraordinary self-lacerations in defiance of what is almost or quite the interdict of their bishops.

The extraordinary thing about these superstitions is that they assume such a peculiar virtue in the relic as fairly amounts to making it a fetish. It is held that God in answer to prayer will give healing to the sick in the presence of the relic when He will not give it to similar prayer if the relic is absent. God has a regard for the piece of bone such as He does not have for the prayer uttered without its presence. A person afflicted with disease may expect in the presence of the relic to be healed, while he cannot expect any such miracle if he is out of reach of the relic. God thus gives special favor to certain persons who are in certain places, and who pray to Him there, which He will not give to the most holy and pious people who pray to Him elsewhere. He is a respecter of places and of persons; and it is not true, now, it seems, that in every country he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is equally accepted of Him.

Now this is the very essence of fetishism; it makes prayer unavailable and inefficient unless there is a piece of bone present. Such a doctrine is allowed to be taught by monsignors in the Church, and is encouraged by the Archbishop of Quebec, Cardinal Taschereau, through whose efforts this relic was obtained. He does not represent the better element but the worse in the Catholic Church, as his people are among the most ignorant and backward on the continent.

Efforts on Behalf of Peace.—During the recent general election in Great Britain, the friends of peace distributed 400,000 circulars to the candidates and voters, in which the following six points were specially pressed upon the notice of candidates:

1. The establishment of at least partial Parliamentary control over the Military and Naval Departments, by the earlier introduction of the Estimates in each Session, and their consideration on fixed and regular days afterwards.
2. The withdrawal from the Crown of the power of declaring war without the previous consent of Parliament.

3. The propriety of Officers in the Army or Navy, whose pay is included in the Military and Naval Estimates, being declared ineligible to vote on those Estimates in Parliament.

4. Mutual and simultaneous reduction, by Treaty, of the enormous European Armaments.

5. The establishment, in conjunction with other countries, of a High Court of Nations, for adjudicating International disputes.

6. The duty of seeking to negotiate treaties with the civilized Powers, binding each nation to refer all future disputes in the first place to Arbitration.

The New Tithe Act.—The New Tithe Act passed by the Conservative Government for the benefit of the Welsh clergy, is now beginning to press upon English Friends with a rigor altogether novel, as is shown by the case of our Friend, Richard B. Brockbank, the first under the Act. The bill removes the liability for tithe from the tenant, and puts it on to the landlord. Under the last Act, Friends' experience was annoying but simple. Their goods were distrained and the thing was done. But the landlord has no seizable property on a farm. The Church therefore, under the new law, annexes his rent till the tithe and costs are paid out of it. In this case an estate with rents of over £850, has been taken out of the hands of the owner to satisfy the vicar's claim of £63.

The official receiver who is placed in charge of it may do anything except sell the land. There is nothing to prevent him reducing rents, dismissing tenants, choosing any new one he likes, neglecting arrears, letting the land down in quality, and doing everything a landlord tries to avoid. This particular case was accompanied by annoying incidents. Tenants under agreements prior to the recent Act are made to pay direct, if the landlord refuses, and would have done so in this case, but that they were wrongly assessed and described. This was pointed out to the clerical applicant, but he declined to take any notice; so that those farms had to come under the receiver also, which seem a gratuitous increase of trouble. A Judge's business is to judge; but this one went out of his province to sarcastically suggest to R. B. Brockbank, that perhaps he liked paying the costs, which are enormously higher than under the old law. Facts like these will surely make it clear to honest and thoughtful men, that this remnant of the ecclesiastical privileges of the middle ages must be swept away, and the Nation's property in tithe applied to purposes of national utility.—The British Friend.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 17, 1892.

The British Friend for the Eighth Month contained an article, headed "A Missionary Proposal," which referred to the separation which took place in the Society of Friends in America about the year 1827, and attributes the unsettlement and disunity which led to it, to the "intensely doctrinal and sometimes very dogmatic teaching" of visiting preachers, especially from England; and contrasts this with what it calls George Fox's method.

We believe the writer of the article has failed to point out the main underlying cause—which was the introduction of doctrines at variance with those previously held by Friends.

Much of George Fox's preaching was of a doctrinal nature. William Penn, who was a fellow-laborer, and intimately acquainted with him, in speaking of his ministry, says: "The mystery of the first and second Adam, of the fall and restoration, of the law and gospel, of shadows and substance, of the servant and son's state, and the fulfilling of the Scriptures in Christ, and by Christ the true light, in all that are his, through the obedience of faith, were much of the substance and drift of his testimonies." Such ministry might be called "intensely doctrinal." No doubt there was often joined with this, earnest exhortation and appeal to his hearers, not to neglect so great salvation; but these appeals were founded on a doctrinal basis.

The most prominent advocate of the views which spread "unsettlement and disunity" in the Society of Friends in America, was Elias Hicks. Stephen Grellet mentions that in 1808, he was one of a committee of New York Yearly Meeting appointed to visit the subordinate meetings. He says: "I became introduced into very deep and painful trials; for Elias Hicks, one of our committee, frequently advanced sentiments repugnant to the Christian faith, tending to lessen the authority of the Holy Scriptures, to undervalue the sacred offices of our holy and blessed Redeemer, and to promote a disregard for the right observance of the First day of the week. I frequently, fervently and earnestly labored with him."

Those who are familiar with the history of that period know that S. Grellet was only one of many Friends who labored with E. Hicks to prevent him from publishing sentiments which the Society could not own as correct—unhappily without success.

On referring to a list of the ministers from Great Britain who paid religious visits to America, we find that William Foster came over in 1820, George Withy in 1821, Isaac Stephenson and Anna Braithwaite in 1823, Elizabeth Robson in 1824, and Thomas Shillitoe and Ann Jones in 1826. Of the earlier of these visitants we had never before heard any insinuation that their preaching was unduly dogmatical, and the last two arrived here after the elements of discord had been widely spread. Would they not have been derelict in their duty, if they had not borne a testimony to the truths of the Christian religion—some of which were openly assailed? Surely the responsibility for the dissension that arose must rest on those who assailed, not on those who defended the original principles of Friends.

We feel, therefore, impelled to express our dissent from the implied charges against these worthy Friends, contained in the article in the British Friend.

That party spirit should be awakened, when subjects of vital interest were keenly discussed, is no more than the weakness of human nature would lead us to expect. We are glad to believe that it has in large measure died away, and that an amicable feeling now exists and is manifested between the bodies which were separated from each other about 1827. And it is cause of rejoicing to have some evidence that a large number of those who affiliate with what are termed "The Hicksites," do not hold the doctrinal views, whose advocacy led to the former disputes.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Department of State is advised by the United States Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople that the Turkish Government has acquiesced in the claim of the United States for protection to the American missionaries at Bourdour, in the province of Konia, Asia Minor, and reparation for the injuries to the person and property of Dr. Bartlett.

The Peary relief steamer Kite returned to St. Johns, Newfoundland, on the afternoon of the 8th inst., bringing back Lieutenant Peary and wife, and his party, except John M. Vorhoef, who was lost in a crevasse in Greenland. All on board the Kite are in good health. Peary accomplished an inland journey of 1,300 miles, and one of the results of both expeditions has been a rich collection of specimens of the flora and fauna of Northern Greenland.

The Navy Department has received a dispatch from Lieutenant Peary, at St. Johns, Newfoundland, saying: "United States Navy claims highest discoveries on Greenland's east coast. Independence Bay, 82 degrees north latitude, 34 degrees west longitude, discovered July 4th, 1892. Greenland ice cape ends south of Victoria Inlet."

It is announced that Professor Barnard, of the Lick Observatory, California, has added a fifth satellite to the four satellites of Jupiter discovered by Galileo, in 1610.

The New York Voice says: "Lord Iveagh, of the great brewing house of Guinness, in England, has recently purchased sixteen miles of forest, located right in the garden of England, paying for it $3,700,000. * * * This business of making paupers of the people and then buying in their lands with the money wrested from their pockets has worked so well in England that about $100,000,000 of English capital has come over here for the same purpose, purchasing our breweries and distilleries, and then applying the vast profits in the purchase of tracts of land. Isn't it about time to call this sort of thing down?"

The San Francisco Bulletin says: "The four-masted ship Fingal arrived at Victoria on the 29th, in a trip of thirty-four days from Yokohama, with probably one of the largest cargoes of tea ever landed on this continent from a sailing vessel. She is reported to have 2,860 tons. It is known that she took 2,234,300 pounds at Kobe before sailing for Yokohama, where she received additional cargo. This tea is destined for New York, Chicago and Canada, the bulk of it going to the first named city. It will be transported over the Canadian Pacific Road, and will make the largest tea train which has ever crossed the continent."

The Salton Lake, that great body of water which covered so large a part of the Colorado Desert, after an overflow of the Colorado River, and which many people supposed had come to stay, has now entirely disappeared, but a wonderful sea of verdure now marks the place that was once barren sand. "It is convincing proof given by nature that the so-called desert is susceptible of high cultivation, and under a system of storage reservoirs may become thickly peopled."

The first election, perhaps, at which women ever voted in the South is that on the stock law question just closed in Jackson, Mississippi. Only a few exercised the privilege. The law provides that all persons who are householders and none other shall vote on the fence question. This admits all women who own a home to the right of suffrage.

A few new cases of cholera have occurred on the quarantined steamships in New York Bay, and on Swinburne Island, with some deaths. The Governor of New York State having purchased a large hotel on Fire Island for the occupancy of the steamship passengers in quarantine, an attempt to land them at the place has been resisted by an armed mob.

John G. Whittier deceased on the morning of Ninth Month 7th, 1892, at Hampton Falls, New Hampshire. He was born Twelfth Month 17th, 1807.

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 454, being 43 more than the previous week, and 89 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 219 were males and 235 females; 120 were under one year of age; 56 died of consumption; 45 of cholera infantum; 43 of measles; 29 of diseases of the heart; 26 of pneumonia; 25 of diphtheria; 23 of convulsions; 17 of cancer; 17 of old age; 14 of typhoid fever; 13 of inanition; 12 of casualties, and 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, registered, 114 a 115; coupon, 115 a 116; currency 6's, 107 a 117.

COTTON was quiet, but firm, on a basis of 7 $\frac{7}{8}$ ¢. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, spot, $16.25 a $17.25; spring bran, in bulk, spot, $15.50 a $16.00.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.25 a $2.50; do., extras, $2.50 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.85 a $3.25; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.60 a $3.85; Western winter, clear, $3.40 a $3.75; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.00; winter patent, $4.10 a $4.40; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.25; do., patent, $4.35 a $4.65; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour was quiet and easier; choice Pennsylvania quoted at $3.65 per barrel.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 74 $\frac{3}{4}$ a 75 cts. No. 2 mixed corn, 54 $\frac{1}{4}$ a 54 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. No. 2 white oats, 39 $\frac{3}{4}$ a 40 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, none here; good, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 5 cts.; medium, 4 $\frac{1}{4}$ a 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.; common, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ a 4 cts.; culls, 3 a 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.; fat cows, 2 a 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Sheep were active for good stock, while the poor grades were neglected. Extra, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts.; good, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 5 cts.; medium, 4 $\frac{1}{4}$ a 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.; common, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 4 cts.; culls, 2 a 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. Lambs, 3 a 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.

HOGS were in better demand and firmer. Good Western, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.; other Western, 7 $\frac{1}{4}$ a 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts.

FOREIGN.—Many workmen at present idle, who were employed in tin plate works at Landore and Plasmart, Wales, long closed, are in the dire distress. Their families have lived on bread and water for twenty-two weeks.

The Irish language is dying out. Ten years ago 64,000 people spoke Irish only. In 1891 there were 38,000. In 1881 there were 885,000 who could speak Irish and English, and last year there were only 642,000.

The cholera in Hamburg continues to be very prevalent. The Statistical Bureau returns as the totals to Seventh Month 10th, 13,238 cases of the disease and 5,805 deaths. On the 11th, there were 404 new cases reported and 110 deaths.

Returns from the Russian Empire, of cholera cases, were as follows: On the 4th inst., 4,779 cases and 2,073 deaths; 5th inst., 4,694 new cases and 2,540 deaths; 10th inst., 2,837 new cases and 1,869 deaths; 11th inst., 5,651 new cases and 2,510 deaths.

The Times Teheran correspondent says: The cholera epidemic has ceased here. The bazaars are again open and business has been resumed. The mortality here is variously estimated at from 13,000 to 20,000 while for the whole of Persia it is at least 30,000.

Unofficial advices received at the Department, State from Venezuela, were to the effect that General Crespo had finally triumphed and the Dictatorship been overthrown. General Crespo has, it is said, been called to Caracas to assume the reins of government and there is now a bright prospect for the restoration of peace in the distracted country. The cruiser Philadelphia has been ordered to prepare for sea at once so that she can be ordered to Venezuela at a day's notice should events warrant it.

NOTICES.

WANTED.—A woman Friend, qualified to act Nurse for the girls, at Westown Boarding School.

Apply to REBECCA G. PASSMORE, Concordville, Penna., or MARY W. HAINES, Rancocas, Burlington Co., N. J.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL, PHILADELPHIA, will open Ninth Month 19th, 1892. Applications for admission of pupils should be made to the Superintendent, who will be at the School during the two weeks preceding the opening, from 10 until 1 o'clock.

J. HENRY BARTLETT, Sup't, 140 N. Sixteenth Street.

REDUCED RATES TO OHIO YEARLY MEETING. Arrangements have been made, so that Friends desiring to attend Ohio Yearly Meeting can go and return Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, for $15.47. They will pay full fare ($11.60) to Barnesville, and return one-third fare, $3.87. Making the round trip from Philadelphia, $15.47. Tickets good from Ninth Mo. 12th to Tenth Month 10th, inclusive. For further information call at the B. & O. office, 833 Chestnut Street Philadelphia.

Friends can go from Chester, Wilmington and Baltimore, at the same rate—one fare and a third from each city.

DIED, at her home near Xenia, Indiana, 22nd Fourth Month, 1892, MARY HOLLINGSWORTH, in sixty-seventh year of her age. A member and minister of Amboy Monthly Meeting of Friends. She lived and died in a belief in ancient Friends' principle. We can say of her, she walked humbly in our midst, feeling herself to be one of the least among the children of the Lord. Her service in our meetings elsewhere, though generally short, were characterized by a gentle and loving spirit. She attended the meetings in Canada Yearly Meeting twice, and New York Meeting once. She died in great peace, and just before her last, uttered praises unto Him who washed her blood and fitted her to join the redeemed in glory.

For "THE FRIEND."

Worldly Complaisance.

It was a noteworthy feature in the teachings of our Saviour of men, when He forewarned his disciples, that the religion which He introduced, could not be popular. For the worldly, the ambitious, the self-pleasing and the voluptuous, had few attractions. Instead of alluring followers by promises of being flattered and caressed, or holding out to their view the friendships and honors, the riches and pleasures of this world, He plainly told them that they should be hated of all men for his sake, and that in making choice of Him and his religion, they must be prepared to endure the loss of everything else, to be despised and persecuted, and counted as fools. "If ye were of the world," said He, "the world would love its own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you."

Here the cause of the hatred is plainly stated to be separation from the world; not being of its spirit, nor following its fashions and customs, which is ever the case with the sincere disciples of Him who declared, "My kingdom is not of this world." The apostles understood it so, and with force had their Master's teaching on their minds, that they wrote in very strong terms to the believers, respecting the subject.

Gentle and meek as was the disciple who leaned on Jesus' breast, yet such was his zeal against the spirit of worldly complaisance, that he says: "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For that which is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the pride of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father." Again, "We know that we are of the world, and that the whole world lieth in wickedness." Another apostle says of those who are of the world, that the god of this world hath blinded their eyes, lest the light of the glorious gospel of God should shine unto them. The Apostle Paul makes a great part of pure and undefiled religion to consist in keeping ourselves unspotted from the world; and another enjoins, "Be ye conformed to this world."

The antagonism between the world and the Christian, as thus set forth by our Lord and his apostles, is so broad and entire, that the dullest apprehension cannot fail to perceive it; yet there is a studied and systematic effort, even under the guise of religion, to bridge over the chasm which divides them, to reconcile their opposite and hostile views and practices, to smooth down or fritter away palpable differences; and, regardless of the express declaration of our Lord himself, to inculcate the idea that it is possible to serve two masters—God and mammon.

Many listen to these flesh-pleasing suggestions; and not liking to give up religion altogether, and yet, averse to the cross and self-denial, and desirous of shunning them, they readily drink in the plausible and accommodating theories which propose to help them to heaven without renouncing the world, and thus to make them heirs of two kingdoms as widely different as light and darkness, and Christ and Belial. Of the teachers of such errors, the apostle says, "They are of the world; therefore, they speak of, or in favor of, the world, and the world heareth them."

The teachers and the hearers are of the same spirit, and to both the doctrine of our Lord is very distasteful, when He says, "Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple." "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me. For whosoever will save his life, shall lose it: but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it. For what is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world, and lose himself, or be cast away?"

It is not a little surprising to observe what ingenuity is evinced in endeavoring to appropriate these unmodish but honest tests, and yet to indulge in the customs and fashions, the grandeur and show, the vain conversation, empty compliments and hollow friendships of the world, as though the march of refinement and the social improvements of our day, had rendered the sayings of Christ and his apostles obsolete, and changed their plain meaning.

In our own religious Society the tendency is obvious; and not a few, perhaps, argue the more strenuously in favor of the modern complaisances, because they are inwardly sensible their cause is a weak one, and feel that they have need of all the courage and countenance which bold assertion and sophistical reasoning can give them, to allay the uneasiness which secret compunctions of conscience often create. They would gladly be convinced by their own arguments, that the disregard of plainness of speech, behavior and apparel, and indulgence in costly and showy furniture and living, &c., are not incompatible with being good Friends; but after they have exhausted all their resources, there is still in the deep recesses of the heart a consciousness which no argument can wholly efface, that it is not so. We would affectionately counsel such not to reason against the convictions with which they are favored, however weak and faint they may be, lest the visitations of the Spirit of Truth be gradually withdrawn, and they left to the guidance of their fallen reason, which, in religious matters, "leads to bewilder and dazzles to blind;" and thus they realize the saying of the dear Saviour, "If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness."

Friends did not take up their testimony against gayety and grandeur, and other worldly complaisances, from any affectation of singularity, or desire to mark themselves by a peculiar badge, but from a firm persuasion, wrought in the mind by the operation of the Holy Spirit, that it was the Divine will, they should thus evince their non-conformity with the world and its ways. Many who had a birthright in the Society, and many others who have been convinced of its principles, and been brought into it, have found, as they kept under the power of the Spirit of Truth, that their only way to peace, though greatly in the cross, was by being obedient in these things; and it would be presumptuous to suppose that the Lord would call for obedience in matters which were of no importance. Those who have known this work of grace in themselves, will readily admit that nothing so effectually humbled the pride of the heart, and subdued the stout and stubborn will in them, as the humiliating process by which they were brought to submit in these little and despised things, as they are considered by many; yet painful as it was, they found it a blessed work to them, and the day of obedience one of sweet peace and consolation. It is often by weak things and foolish, in the eyes of men, that the Lord chooses to lay low the lofty, and humble the proud; and nothing which He pleases to use as a means of carrying on the work of salvation, can be esteemed, with impunity, of light obligation or importance. The Scriptures moreover show, that prophets and apostles were commissioned by the Most High, to give commands to the believers on the subject of dress, and our Saviour himself did it in respect to language also; and will any one presume to say, that subjects thus noticed by the Almighty, are of trifling moment?

But some say, that we can adopt another dress than that of Friends, and yet equally comply with the requirements of Christian simplicity. We would say to such, If it is your wish to observe the plainness which the Gospel enjoins, why do you want any change? We never hear the objection made, that Friends' dress is not plain enough; but, on the other hand, that it is too plain, too unmodish and singular, rendering it a cross to be seen in it. To desire to put it off arises then, not from a desire to be simple, but obviously to be more like other people, more like the world, and thus to get rid of the plainness which marks the wearer as a Quaker, and of the yoke and cross which attach thereto.

Beside, if you adopt another dress now, even though it be according to the prevailing mode, so changeable are the fashions, that in a little while, it too would become singular and conspicuous, calling for another alteration on the same ground as the first; and surely it is far more dignified and consistent with the stability of the Christian character, to make no change at all, but keep to the plain and convenient dress which true Friends have long worn.

It is not pretended that putting on and steadily wearing a plain dress, has ever proved a disadvantage to any one in the spiritual warfare. On the contrary, many have found it a preservation from evils, to which they were strongly tempted by alluring but delusive prospects of pleasure; and in withholding them from which, the inconsistency of indulgence, with the plain apparel they wore, acted no inconsiderable part; and though irksome at the time, they afterward had cause to bless and praise the hand which imposed this salutary restraint. There are those who threw off the plain dress of their early education, and found it like the opening of "the wide gate," and smoothing the descent into "the broad way," leading them into the false and corrupt pleasures of the world; and when awakened at times to a sense of their prodigal state, they have lamented their wanderings from their father's house, but found it hard work to return.

Can the advocates of change point us to a single instance, where a dying Quaker, young or old, ever regretted keeping to his simple, self-denying apparel, and language and living? We believe not. But we have instances of such, even among the young, where their obedience in these respects, afforded them comfort, and they have warned others against going out into the fashions and ways of the world.

In the solemn hour of sickness and death, when the gilded fascinations of the world fade away, and all the flimsy sophistries with which men seek to lull their consciences and soothe their uneasy convictions, are dispelled; we have many cases recorded, in which the Witness for God in the soul has arisen in judgment, and brought individuals under great condemnation for departing from the plainness and simplicity of their education, and some have found no rest or peace until they altered or destroyed the fashionable attire and ornaments with which they had decked themselves, when in health; declaring that it was nothing but pride and a desire to shun the cross, and to look like the world, that induced them to depart from the plainness in which they had been brought up in earlier life.

Are we to reject and set at nought all these testimonies, and arrogantly conclude that infinite wisdom and goodness was wrong in thus dealing with his creatures; that we know better than He does, and that mankind are too highly cultivated and refined now, to render attention to such trifles necessary? If our actions and arguments practically say so, will not our spiritual vision become dimmed, and may we not be in danger of balking the visited children of our heavenly Father; and bringing ourselves within the import of the saying, "Whoso shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea."

It is especially worthy of serious notice, that all the modern innovations in our Society, respecting plain dress, language, living, demeanor and other matters, are in the direction of nearer conformity to the world and its ways, and not to lead from it. Is there no significance in this fact. Whatever the motives of the proposers of them may be, when we see that they all tend in this direction, and then read the solemn declarations of our Lord and his apostles, regarding conformity to the world, should not this fact induce us to pause and take warning, lest, having thrown down what was designed to be a hedge about us against the inroads of evil, and given the rein to our inclinations in these things, we find, when it is too late, that we have prepared the way for the destroyer to enter and spoil the flock. And as regards our individual condition, we may be tossed as on an unstable sea, where we have wilfully launched out, after having dismissed the heavenly Pilot, may be driven hither and thither, we know not where, drifting nearer and nearer, to the fatal shoals of a mongrel profession of religion, a little Christian and a good deal worldly, and at last be stranded and make fearful shipwreck of faith and a good conscience.

Far be it from us to place undue importance upon any outward observances or conformity. We know that religion does not consist in these, but in doing the will of God from the heart, under the sanctifying power of that living faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, "which is of the operation of God," and which nothing else can give to the soul. But we also know that it is the Divine will, that our religious Society should be separated from the spirit and customs of the vain world in the particulars of which we have been treating, and it is not for us to choose out such requirements as we please, or to say this is a small and unimportant matter, and I need not conform to it. We must take his commandments as a whole, or we shall practically reject his government. We may try to excuse our deficiency by charging others with tithing the mint, and rue, and anise, and cummin, and neglecting the weightier matters of the law; but if we refuse obedience in rendering the tithe in what, from its seeming littleness, is the nearest and closest test of the entireness of our love and allegiance, we may soon come to disregard justice, mercy and truth—for he that is unfaithful in the least, is unfaithful also in much, and if we wilfully reject one point of the Divine law, we may incur the guilt of the whole.

Testimony from Without.

An article prepared by Jane Budge, of England, for The Friend's Review, contains the following quotation from the writings of Dora Greenwell, who, although holding High Church views herself, was greatly interested in the writings of Isaac Penington and other early Friends:—

"There is something sublime in the passivity of the early Quakers, unresisting and yet persisting; they are at the same time 'reeds shaken by the wind,' and 'prophets, yea, and more than prophets,' not only testifying, but witnessing to great evangelistic truths, which had not in their day found acceptance in the general church. In reading their history, we cannot but admire the constancy which made them, both in England and America, the living epistles of religious toleration to an age which was slow to receive that righteous message, known though it be now, and commended of all men. Few things since the days of primitive Christianity are more lovely, more affecting than many of the scenes their annals disclose. We see the kings of the earth standing up and its rulers taking counsel together against a people whose strength is literally 'to sit still;' a people whose only weapons are silence, endurance, and reliance on an unseen Guide, and yet who, in the might of these, confront and finally confound the strong things of the world, drawn up in order against them. A feeble people, but as it has been truly said, one whose dwelling-place is in the Rock—one whose strength has, like that of Samson, its own secret. When the heart has ceased to confer with flesh and blood, to consult its own desires and impulses, when it has ceased from its own works as God did from his, its Sabbath is nigh at hand—that Sabbath of united activity and rest after which every Christian soul yearns."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

An Everywhere-Present Christ.

Extracts from "Quiet Hours," by JOHN PULSFORD.

[The following article was sent to the Editor by a Friend, of Cumberland, England. It is an additional illustration of the fact that the arrested attention of many—that spiritually minded people of other religious denominations are adopting the same spiritual views of practical religion which have long been held by our own Society.

If we were disposed to make any criticism the selection from J. Pulsford, it would be that it is somewhat one-sided—speaking mainly of Christ's spiritual work in the heart of man, and containing but slight reference to his outward coming, labors and sufferings in the flesh. Yet we do not assume, that on that point there was any defect in J. P.'s doctrinal views, for a man ought not to be expected to deliver a wholesale term of theology every time that he enunciates a particular doctrine.—ED.]

The writings of the New Testament are a living testimony concerning Christ, but the testimony is not Christ.

We must not confound Christ and our knowledge of Christ.

Gravitation as a law of the universe operates when no knowledge of gravitation exists. Now that there is a striking analogy between the universal presence of Christ and the law of gravitation; for Christ is a spiritual power, therefore to know Him and to love Him, are most important conditions for his operation. He has commanded the word of his Gospel to be carried into all the world, and to be preached to every creature. But Christ, as a motion in the soul as a Spirit of Grace, is already present within every human creature; and this ought to be a great encouragement to all the servants of the Gospel, that they are not sent to reveal to man a Redeemer who is far off, but the Redeemer who is with them, and in them. Let the missionaries everywhere tell the heathen this—that there is One among them whom they know not, and that he is come to make Him known to them—even the holy, friendly, helping presence which they have all felt, moving and working in their dark souls.

Those who have mouthed Him most with "Lord, Lord," ought not to be too confident that they shall enter into life, but that poor, dark creatures, from the ends of the earth, who have called upon the same gracious and merciful Presence ignorantly, under some heathen name, will go away into outer darkness.

It is said, that "many shall come from the east and from the west; and shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness."

It would seem that there are many professors of the true religion who are not under Christ, and some under a false religion who are under Him. Christ is the Presence of God with the human race, from the beginning to the end of the world. His delights always were, and always will be, with the sons of men. Christ, the good-will of God, ceaselessly operating for the good of every creature, otherwise how could man be told not to look hither and thither for Christ? Moses preached Christ unto the people in the words, and St. Paul in the same words—"The Word is nigh thee, in thy mouth and in thine heart, that thou mayest do it." Yes, where the monosyllable "Christ" is not, there "The Word" is, which was in the beginning with God, and as God; and it is this universal Living Word which is the Christ of God.

He is the unconfined and unconfined "Spirit of truth." The many false Christs, which the Lord would arise in his name and deceive many, may be known by this, among other things, they are partial in their operations, and confined to particular localities. * * * Christ is in all his redeemed, as the soul of their soul, as the life of their life. He is the pitying heart, and the helping hand of God, with every praying, needy spirit in the world. He is the living, sweet, Ancient Gospel, and Word of God, that is gone forth through all the earth. He is the sweet light of the knowledge of God, that breaks upon every penitent heart. He is the invisible bond of unity between all the scattered members of his body. He is far above all heavens. He fills all things. He is not only with those who believe in and love Him, but also with those who neither believe in nor love Him—to restrain them, or to wound them, to enlighten or melt them, that He may be to them also Jesus our Saviour.

"Say not in thine heart, who shall bring Christ down from above." The Christ of God is in thine heart, waiting, and aiming to get the consent of thy will that He may save thee.

Life cannot be defined by scientific terms; Christ cannot be represented by names and words. He is above all names, whether they be names on earth or names in heaven. Wherever man is, there also is Christ, endeavoring to free him from the law of sin and death, by becoming himself the "law of the spirit of life." * * * He is the Christ of God who witnesseth for God in every creature's soul. He tasted death for every man, not by the spirit of holiness, and the resurrection from the dead, He might become the Son of God with power on behalf of every man. The unloving Logos cannot be absent from any human spirit. In Him and through Him, the only presence of God is humanized for mankind's sake.

Christ is every man's way to heaven, because, as the good-will of God, is in every man's soul, seeking to subdue all things to himself, and to make the soul a partaker of the Divine nature. It is a most comforting thought, that either Christ's presence nor operations are dependent on man's knowledge—He can work in us through his knowledge, and He can also work without his knowledge.

Babes and idiots know not that there is an atmosphere, but the atmosphere does not withhold itself from them for all that. The heathen do not know the Son of God, Christ Jesus our Lord, and yet He may have his elect among them, in whom He is working out his beautiful purpose.

Before the Incarnation, many of the heathen philosophers were under the influence of Christ, and received a measure of wisdom and piety from Him. They had light enough in them to make them long for fuller, clearer light; they had discernment enough of the excellence of virtue to make them long for the perfection of their natures. We may hope, at least I shall, that they have found in eternity all that they longed for, at they have found their place among the just made perfect." * * * If any man have the name and knowledge of Christ, and not the spirit of Christ, neither the name nor the knowledge will save him.

Does not St. Paul say, "how shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard, and how shall they hear without a preacher?" "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." Yes, and St. Paul instantly corrects the notion that the hearing of the Word of God is dependent on any outward preacher—"But I say, have they not heard; yea, verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the end of the world." The Preacher of God preaches in every human soul; and that Preacher is Christ.

Richard Smith.

The subject of this memoir was born at Farley, in the county of Stafford, in the year 1784, his parents being members of the Church of England. From the testimony of his friends, he was, when young, of a mild, agreeable disposition, dutiful to his parents, and dutiful and kind to those with whom he associated.

About the year 1816 he first attended our meetings for religious worship at Leek, where his serious and orderly deportment justly entitled him to the kind notice and regard of the members of our Society.

He had before that period been engaged in the cotton trade at Manchester, and entrusting his effects to a person who hastily departed with them for America, he was induced to go to that country to endeavor to secure his property, and to afford an opportunity of personal intercourse with the Indians on the frontier of the American States, with whose sufferings he had been deeply impressed.

In Seventh Month, 1817, he embarked at Liverpool on board a vessel bound for New York, and after a short and favorable passage, arrived in America before the person to whom he had entrusted his goods. By the assistance of some Friends in Philadelphia, most, if not the whole, of his property was recovered. He then set out on foot westward toward Pittsburgh, a distance of three hundred miles, and arrived there in twelve days without the assistance of horse or carriage, except one stage of fourteen miles, where the way was then almost impassable. From Pittsburgh he journeyed to Smithfield, Jefferson County, in the State of Ohio, where he engaged a store for the disposal of his goods, and remained more than twelve months.

The two following years he was principally occupied in instructing the youth in the neighborhood of Smithfield and Richmond.

He continued regularly to attend the meetings of the Society of Friends, and was admitted a member in the year 1819.

In the relief of distress he was at all times ready to offer his assistance regardless of fatigue, and was often exposed to many inconveniences and privations. His philanthropic mind knew no bounds of clime or color; the great object nearest his heart was that he might be found doing his Lord's will, and persevering in the path of duty, his faith became strengthened, and it may be truly said "that he left all to follow Christ." He felt greatly for the afflictions of others, and the complicated sufferings of the African race affected him in a peculiar manner. At the request of Friends in America, in Sixth Month, 1820, he took charge of a boat down the Ohio, laden with several tons of provisions and clothing for the relief of a colony of black people who had been recently released from slavery, and who had settled in Brown's County, near the southern extremity of the State. On his arrival at the landing-place, about twenty miles from the settlement, after securely storing the articles on shore, he walked across the country to the dwellings of the negroes, inquiring into the circumstances of every family, and minutely ascertaining their individual wants, after which he united with some Friends, who met him on the occasion, in dividing and distributing the various articles to each in due proportion, administering medicines to the sick and advice to the improvident.

On the 7th of the following month he set out alone on a visit to the Indian settlements of Lewistown and Wapakometta, at the distance of two hundred miles in a westerly direction from Smithfield, which he was favored to accomplish with peace to his own mind; though in his way back he encountered great difficulties from the effects of a severe illness.

In the Twelfth Month of the same year he returned again to England and took up his residence at Endon, about four miles from Leek, producing a certificate from the Monthly Meeting of Smithfield, recommending him as a member of our Society.

At Endon he was engaged in calculating the value of estates and other business relating to landed property. He frequently applied closely to business the whole night in order to redeem the time spent in the day in attending religious meetings, visiting the sick and indigent, and other important duties; being in the practice of devoting a portion of the morning of each day for mental retirement, the time he allowed for repose was very short. When unavoidably led into company where levity and unbecoming conversation took place, he was not backward in expressing his sentiments to the parties, and if treated with ridicule or disdain, he bore it with patience and meekness.

Every species of cruelty to animals gave him pain; nor could he be easily induced to make use of a stage-coach or other public conveyance, or even to indulge himself with riding on horseback when he could well avoid it.

Both in this country and in America he was indefatigable in his exertions to encourage the diffusion of the Holy Scriptures, by aiding societies formed for that purpose, or in promoting the establishment of others where none before existed.

In the years 1822 and 1823, he travelled on foot to London, to attend the Yearly Meeting, and in the latter year he remained, assisting the members of the Committee for African Instruction, to whom he had made a voluntary offer of his services to go to Africa.

He was very diligent and attentive to business (except when sick or absent on religious duties) till near the end of Ninth Month, 1823, when, having settled his affairs and made his will, he was "favored," as he said, "to feel his work done in this country."

He had, in the Eighth Month preceding, laid before Friends his concern to go to the continent of Africa to diffuse such instruction amongst the natives as way might open for; and in Tenth Month, having obtained their certificate, he embarked at Gravesend, on board a vessel bound for Cape St. Mary's, at the mouth of the river Gambia, in company with John and Ann Thompson and Hannah Kilham, members of our Society, and Mahmadée and Sandanee, two natives of Africa, who had been purchased from slavery by Friends, and educated in England. Soon after the vessel had put to sea, they experienced a heavy gale of wind, and providentially escaping from imminent danger on the coast of France, returned to Cowes in the Isle of Wight, to re-fit. In a few days the vessel again put to sea, and proceeded favorably on her voyage, touching at the island of Teneriffe, where the party had a kind reception from some of the inhabitants.

Continuing on their voyage, the vessel anchored opposite the town of Bathurst, in the river Gambia, on the 7th of Twelfth Month.

Soon after the Friends landed, Richard Smith was engaged in procuring, from the European residents at Bathurst, such information as they stood in need of, in forwarding the object they had in view. After due deliberation, it was concluded to form the establishment of Birkow, a few miles from Bathurst; and a treaty with Alkaide, or Governor of the District being brought to a favorable issue, R. Smith was immediately employed in the arduous undertaking of landing and transporting the stores, furniture and implements to Birkow, and in fencing and forming a garden and other appendages necessary to the new establishment.

From the intense heat of the climate, difficulty of communication by land or water, and other impediments incident to a tropical country, he had much to bear, and his exertions often exceeded his strength. Yet, with a degree of patience almost inconceivable, he labored to overcome the debility and sickness which ensued.

On the 11th of Second Month he had an interview with the King of Kombo, at his residence near Yendum, a town twenty-three miles distant from Birkow. The king appeared to give him full credit for the truth of his intentions, and informed him, by means of an interpreter, that he was pleased that he had presented himself to make his person and object known, and observed, "it was very kind of Friends."

Richard Smith's intercourse with the natives endeared him to them, and was, on the whole, very encouraging; his kind and conciliating manners influencing them in his favor. When the Alkaide was requested to take care of R. Smith, on the departure of his companions, he is reported to have replied, "Those who hurt Richard hurt me, the same as hurting me."

The garden of Birkow, that he had, with persevering care and industry, formed and cultivated, produced various European and African vegetables, and greatly exceeded the expectations of some of the residents of Bathurst, with whom R. S. was on terms of intimacy.

About two months after landing at Bathurst, two of his companions embarked for Sierra Leone, and were absent for some time; being thus left pretty much to himself, with the eye of his mind firmly fixed on Divine direction, he persevered under many difficulties and privations, until he had the gratification of opening a school at Birkow, which was attended by nearly twenty pupils. But the summons, which, in the unerring wisdom of Providence, often puts a period to the performance of human purposes, here ended all his labors.

The whole management of the establishment devolved upon him, and he was in the habit of assisting those he employed in manual labor, in ploughing, digging, &c. About the 20th of Seventh Month, returning from the toils of a fatiguing day, he was taken ill, and continued to decline until the 30th, when he peacefully expired, and was interred on the evening of the same day at the burial-ground, about a mile from Bathurst.

In conclusion, we may, with justice to his memory, observe, that he appears to have been blessed with most of the virtues that ennoble human nature, yet, in humility, he ascribed them all to the only true Source from whence they flow; and it may indeed be said, "he being dead, yet speaketh." We, therefore, trust that this short memorial of his innocent life and conversation may stimulate others to follow his example.—Extracted from a memorial issued by Staffordshire Monthly Meeting in 1825.

WATCH AND PRAY.

Christian, seek not yet repose,
Hear thy guardian angel say,
Thou art in the midst of foes,
Watch and Pray!

Principalities and powers,
Must'ring their unseen array,
Wait for thy unguarded hours,
Watch and Pray!

Gird thy heavenly armor on,
Wear it ever night and day;
Ambush'd lies the evil one,
Watch and pray!

Hear the victors who o'ercame!
Still they mark each warrior's way,
All with one sweet voice proclaim,
Watch and Pray!

Hear! above all, hear the Lord,
Him thou lovest to obey,
Hide within thy heart his word,
Watch and Pray.

Watch, as if on that alone,
Hung the issue of the day,
Pray that strength may be sent down,
Watch and Pray.

"BUT THOU REMAINEST."

(Hebrews, 1: 2.)

BY HANNAH BOWDEN née MARSH.

The heavens shall vanish as a parted scroll,
The steadfast earth remove—so stands thy word—
Sun, moon, and planets from their axes roll,
"But Thou remainest"—Lord.

The face of nature changeth—oceans sweep
Where rose of old the mountain's crested brow
The plough invades the mammoth's fossil sleep—
"Thou, Lord remainest"—Thou.

From age to age as empires rise and fall,
And laurelled names th' historic records fill,
The spoiler lays his ruthless hand on all;
Yet "Thou remainest" still.

Where are the loved ones of our early days?
Why now the heart, once rich in love, so lonely?
Oh! some are changed, and some have passed away
While, "Thou remainest" only.

Earth smiles not as she smiled on childhood's sight,
Full many a star of morning hope hath set,
And youthful vision lost its coloring bright,
But, "Thou remainest" yet.

Yes! though of all beside thee dispossessed—
Thou' friend from friend, and soul from flesh must sever
This is our anchor—here our hopes we rest,
That "Thou remainest" ever.

Thou only changest not, Eternal One!
Alone, Immutably, Supreme, Thou reignest—
No storm may shake the pillars of Thy Throne,
Our Father, "Thou remainest."

'TIS OUR PART

As Christians, to forget the wrongs we feel;
To pardon trespasses; our very foes
To love and cherish; to do good to all;
Live peaceably; and seek to be in all our acts,
Wise as the serpent, gentle as the dove.

RATHER than upraid thy God for the ills that have befallen thee, thank Him for those which have not befallen thee.

Thomas Hazard.

A PIONEER IN THE ANTI-SLAVERY CAUSE.

Thomas Hazard was born at South Kings-town, Rhode Island, in 1718 of parents not members of the Society of Friends. His father had designed him for the profession of the law and with this in view he was sent to Yale College, but having early become convinced of the principles of Friends, Thomas doubted the propriety of accepting collegiate honors and declined to take his degree. He is described as having been comely in person, large in stature, and of great physical strength. He became a minister and is said to have been a strong forcible and argumentative speaker, deservedly popular, travelling much as a public Friend—and earnestly advocating the abolition of negro slavery. He is thought to have been one of the earliest pioneers in creating a sentiment against this evil. He chose agriculture for his profession and about the time of his marriage, his father who was the largest farmer and one of the largest slave-holders in New England, designed establishing him on a farm of many acres of good land, well stocked with cattle and negroes enough to cultivate it. With this in view he sent him with a letter of introduction to a deacon of a congregation at North Stonington, Connecticut whom he had employed to purchase stock, requesting his aid in making a proper selection of cattle.

Reaching the village on a Seventh-day afternoon, the son unexpectedly fell in with the deacon, who insisted upon his returning home with him and spending First-day there, which was complied with.

In the evening the conversation turned upon the subject of religion and in the discussion of the merits of different sects, the Quakers were mentioned. The deacon at once observed "Quakers! they are not a Christian people! Thomas Hazard, having already adopted the views of Friends and being fresh from college where he was remarkable for the strength of his argumentative powers, believed he could answer all the objections which their persecutors had urged against them, in a manner that would confute his antagonist and satisfy him of the error of his views. He asked him to state his grounds for the assertion, expecting them to be those that were usually urged. To his surprise, the reply was, "They hold the fellow-men in slavery." The unexpected answer caused the subject of the conversation to be speedily changed.

Thomas Hazard's attention had at times been turned to the subject of slavery when overseeing his father's slaves on hot days, whilst sitting in the shade, finding it difficult to keep comfortable and seeing the poor negroes toiling in the sun. This had led him to contrast slavery with freedom and probably prepared his mind for the line of thought which ultimately resulted upon his return home in being convinced of the wrongfulness of holding slaves, and informing his father of his intention of cultivating the farm by free labor. The father was deeply grieved at this determination, and insisted that if this course were persisted in, it would result in ruin, both to himself and neighbors and failing in the effort to dissuade him, threatened to disinherit him.

Thomas, however, persisted in his determination and commenced the cultivation of his farm by free labor, fully expecting that his father would carry out his threat.

At this time there was not any pronounced sentiment among Friends against slavery. One of its most revolting practices, that of branding the slaves with a hot iron to distinguish them, had been abolished, as being cruel and un-Christian, but the institution itself had a strong hold upon the members of the Society.

It does not appear whether Thomas Hazard had become a member of the Society of Friends at this time or not. If he had not, the membership was soon after acquired and he entered with great zeal, though with mildness and sound judgment, upon the effort to induce Friends to give up holding or dealing in slaves and to have a clause inserted in the Discipline prohibiting the practice.

John Woolman, who held similar views to those of Thomas Hazard on the subject of slavery, visited New England about this time, and a friendship between them sprang up which lasted during their lives.

In the course of years a reconciliation took place between Thomas Hazard and his father and the latter ultimately admitted the soundness of his son's views, and by his will emancipated all his slaves, and gave the son an equal share in his estates with the other children.

Thomas Hazard lived to see his views on the subject of slave-holding incorporated in the Discipline of all the Yearly Meetings of Friends on the American continent, as well as the passage of emancipation acts in nearly, if not quite all the States north of Mason and Dixon's line. He died at his native place, South Kingstown, Rhode Island, on the 28th of Eighth Month, 1798.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Sand-Wasps.

In the early part of the Eighth Month, our women folks were somewhat excited by the appearance on the grass-plot of our yard, of one or two holes, freshly made, with a pile of sand near the mouth, that had been removed in the act of digging them. Considerable interest was felt and inquiries made as to the nature of the animal that had thus invaded their premises—and fears were expressed that it might be some kind of a snake, which was making itself at home.

Finally, the digger was detected as he was coming out of his burrow. It proved to be a very large and vigorous insect of the wasp family—one of the Sand-wasps, so called from their habit of making holes in the ground in which to deposit their eggs. I had often seen them, and remembered years before one coming to the ground near my feet with a large green locust, Cicada, which she had captured, and which, though much larger than herself, was powerless in her grasp.

These Sand-wasps are solitary in their habits, and do not live in communities like the species which build paper nests. They make holes in the ground, in which they place other insects, which are paralyzed by a sting, and then lay an egg, and cover up the whole with earth. In due time the egg hatches, and the young grub feeds on the helpless locust or grasshopper, and when it has attained its full size, undergoes the usual changes of such insects and comes forth a perfect wasp—ready to do for its offspring the same service that had been done for it, and thus keep up the chain of life.

There are many species of these Sand-wasps, especially in hot countries.

P. H. Gosse, in his "Naturalist's Sojourn in Jamaica," describes the proceedings of some of them, which he witnessed:

"On the earthen floor of the building formerly used as a boiling house, but now dilapidated and partially unroofed, where twine-like roots depend from the rafters, and elegant ferns spring out of the crevices of the crumbling walls, a good many large wasps may be observed in the hottest part of the day, briskly flying to and fro. On closer examination we discover numerous holes entering diagonally into the dry and dusty ground, into which some of these bright-colored wasps are crawling, and from which others are emerging.

"From some of the holes proceeds a shrill but intermitted buzzing; and if we watch one of these, we perceive the insect at work therein. At first we cannot see what she is doing, for she crawls in head foremost, and in a second or two comes out tail foremost, recedes a few inches and then advances again; again emerges in the same manner and again enters; and continues thus to crawl backward and forward with bustling activity, and with much flirting of the purple wings.

"On stooping down, and bringing our face very near the scene of labor, we discover that she is digging the hole, and hence the negro children have given her the appropriate title of gravedigger. Every time she comes forth, she brings a load of the powdery earth, much larger than her head, tightly held between the shanks of her two fore-feet, her breast and her chin, and this she drops an inch or two from the cave's mouth. Sometimes she brings a stone still larger, and this is grasped in the jaws, and dragged to the distance of four or five inches, for fear it should roll in again. Each time she has dropped the load, she never fails, as she advances, to keep the road clear, by scraping with the fore-shanks, throwing the dust behind her. But for this, the earth brought out would soon accumulate in a heap and roll back.

"I observed one filling up a hole. No doubt she had deposited her egg at the bottom, and stored sufficient provision to last the young grub, when hatched, until its maturity.

"With her tail towards the hole, she scraped back a little heap of dust; then turned and with her head moved it about, that it might fall to the bottom. Then she turned again, and did the like, repeating this procedure several times in succession. At length no more earth would go down, for the hole was full; she then rammed it two or three times with her head, and flew away.

"These insects work very fast in the soft, dusty earth, for they are indefatigable in their exertions."

The inhabitant of our yard was submitted to some of the scientific men of the Academy of Natural Sciences, and by them was labeled Sphecus speciosus.

"WE meet with a great many who will almost acknowledge as much, and who, under the momentary influence of conviction, confess to the Truth as it is in Jesus; but few, indeed, are willing to take up the cross, or to make a covenant with the Lord by sacrifice. The cross still remains to be the great stumbling-block in the way of a hearty reception of the Truth in the love of it. It is so with the unregenerate world; it is so with many professing Christians; and it is so with many who are called Friends. I know it to have been so with myself."—G. Washington Walker.

A Sensible View of Total Abstinence.

It is not easy to point to a single text that, taken as it stands in the Bible, and looked at with impartiality and fairness, clearly forbids polygamy, slavery, or wine-drinking; yet, on the other hand, no single Bible text can be pointed to, that, judged in the same light, can be claimed as a specific and all-inclusive command to the practice of wine-drinking, slavery, or polygamy. Therefore, in this state of things, it is obviously the privilege of every Christian to decide for himself whether the trend and spirit of Bible teachings as a whole, and the lessons of experience and sound reason as read in the best light of the present day, make it incumbent on him, as a sensible man, to let all three of these practices alone, and to enjoin total abstinence from them on others, in the discharge of his manifest duty toward God and his fellow-man.

While wine is represented in the Bible as a symbol of joy and fulness, and its use as common in the daily life of the people of Bible lands, the peril of its using and the advantages of abstinence from it are illustrated all along the Bible pages. The one godly man who, with his family, was deemed worthy of preservation, for the bridging over of the chasm of destruction when the human race was swept from being, in beginning his new life in a rejuvenated world was overcome by wine—pure wine from his own vineyard—and the record of his shame in consequence has come down through the ages as a stain upon his name, with an accompanying curse upon a portion of his descendants. Wine-drinking, even in moderation, was forbidden to the priests of God when they were to enter upon their holiest services; and to him who would consecrate himself for a season, or for a life-time, as a sacred Nazarite, the command was explicit: "He shall separate himself from wine and strong drink; he shall drink no vinegar of wine, or vinegar of strong drink, neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes, nor eat fresh grapes or dried. All the days of his consecration shall he eat nothing that is made of the grape-vine, from the kernels even to the husk." The strongest man known to the world, and the greatest of all those born of woman, under the old dispensation, were Nazarite abstainers; and so far there is evidence that the use of wine was always perilous, and that abstinence from wine was always consistent with the highest consecration, the greatest physical strength, and the grandest spiritual attainments, on the part of the abstainer.

It is true that our Lord came into this world as a man among men—came, as He says, "eating and drinking" like other men, while dressing and working as one of the humbler classes in the community about Him. And it is also true, that because of this fact He was, in his day, sneered at as "a wine-bibber," and as "a carpenter." We may be sure that in all this our Lord was without sin; but we are not justified in claiming that in order to be his disciple nowadays one must be either a wine-drinker or "a carpenter." And it were as absurd for a man to say that the learning of a carpenter's trade is essential to the perfection of the Christian life, as to say that every Christian ought to be a moderate drinker of wine as a beverage, in proof of his fidelity to his Lord's example.

Whatever may be said of the fact of our Lord's use of wine as a beverage, as showing that wine-drinking is not in and of itself a sin, that fact cannot with any reason be put forward as binding it upon every Christian disciple to drink wine; therefore the question of our personal duty, as to the use or the rejection of wine as a beverage, remains an open one in the light of present Christian expediency.

To-day it is evident that there is a danger in wine-drinking. Unlike other articles of food and drink, alcoholic beverages so invite to excess by their very use that their user is exposed to a peculiar temptation to indulge in them more and more freely, until his appetite is hopelessly subject to their control. As a matter of prudence, therefore, it is manifestly safer to abstain from wine-drinking than to run the special risks that it involves. No man can say that he is above temptation or beyond peril in this matter; for if he will but stop and look at the facts in the case, he will see that men fully his equal, in intellectual power, in personal character, in strength of will, in social standing, and in spiritual attainments, have already succumbed to the temptation to drink to excess, while no man who was a total abstainer ever became a drunkard. Moreover, in view of the dangers to others, who are under the influence of his example, in his family or in the outside community, the man who can abstain from wine-drinking ought to do it for the sake of those who look to him for wise leading.—*S. FOR "THE FRIEND."

Joseph and Huldah Hoag.

When on a visit to Friends in Vermont, I found myself in the neighborhood of the old homestead of the above-mentioned worthies, whose names have become household words among Friends on account of the renowned "Hoag's Vision," and their long and valued services as ministers of the gospel.

The large home-like dwelling, where they rested from their many journeys, and the farm which they diligently worked in these intervals, are in good condition.

For a mile on either side of the road which passes the house there are large, thrifty maple trees, planted by Joseph Hoag, aided by a neighbor boy, who is now an old man, yet with interest and pride, as we drove under their shade, he told me of having assisted the "worthy elder" in this work.

The trees, flourishing in their strength and grandeur, tell of the thoughtfulness and careful hands of the workmen, and the annual results in maple sugar speak of the "eye to business." In front of the house is the field where, in 1803, Joseph Hoag had his remarkable vision, in which the Lord showed him troubles to come to this country and upon the church.

This vision has been fulfilled. Some years ago, while travelling in gospel service, with Lindley M. Hoag, in the South, our conversation was upon this vision as it referred to slavery and war. Lindley M. Hoag remarked that now the vision was fulfilled. I asked him, "How about the monarchical government?" He said, "That was not a part of the vision, but my father always believed that this would become a monarchical government, and, not writing the vision until he was an old man, the opinion became confused in his mind with the vision."

William H. Dean, an aged Friend, and a connection of the family, living in the neighborhood, and at whose house Joseph Hoag often called and asked for a glass of buttermilk, told me that the part written concerning the monarchical government was not in the vision. Joseph Hoag never told it at first. This confirmed the statement of Lindley M. Hoag, made to me years before.

F. G. CARLAND.

The Bad Lands of Wyoming.

The expressive name has been given to some of the strangest and, in many respects, most repulsive scenery in the world. They are tracts of irreclaimable barrenness blasted and left forever lifeless and hideous. To understand their peculiar features it is needful to bear in mind that they lie on the sites of some of the old lakes already referred to, and that they have been carved out of flat sheets of sandstone, clay, marl, or limestone, that accumulated on the floors of these lakes. Everywhere, therefore, horizontal lines of stratification meet the eye, giving alternate stripes of buff, yellow, or red, with here and there a strange verdigris like green. These strata extend nearly horizontally for hundreds of square miles. But they have been most unequally eroded. Here and there isolated flat-topped eminences or "buttes," as they are styled in the west, rise from the plain in front of a line of bluff or cliff to a height of several hundred feet. On examination each of these hills is found to be built up of horizontal strata, and the same beds reappear in lines of terraced cliffs along the margin of the plain. A butte is only a remnant of the original deep mass of horizontal strata that once stretched far across the plain. Its sides and the fronts of the terraced cliffs, utterly verdureless and bare, have been scarped into recesses and projecting buttresses. These have been further cut down into a labyrinth of peaks and columns, clefts and ravines, now strangely monumental, now uncouthly irregular, till the eye grows weary with the endless variety and novelty of the forms. Yet beneath all this chaos of outlines there can be traced everywhere the level parallel bars of the strata. The same band of rock, originally one of the successive floors of the old lake, can be followed without bend or break from chasm to chasm and pinnacle to pinnacle. Tumultuous as the surface may be, it has no relation to underground disturbances, for the rocks are as level and unbroken as when they were laid down. It owes its ruggedness entirely to erosion.

But there is a further feature which crowns the repulsiveness of the Bad Lands. There are no springs or streams. Into the soil parched by the fierce heats of a torrid summer, the moisture of the sub-soil ascends by capillary attraction, carrying with it the saline solutions it has extracted from the rocks. At the surface it is at once evaporated, leaving behind a white crust or efflorescence, which covers the bare ground and encrusts the pebbles strewn thereon. Vegetation wholly fails, save here and there a bunch of salt-weed or a bush of the ubiquitous sage-brush, the parched livid green of which serves only to increase the desolation of the desert.

How, then, has this strange type of landscape been produced? The rainfall is exceedingly small, though from time to time come heavy showers that no doubt do much to furrow the crumbling sides of the cliffs and "buttes," and sweep down the detritus to lower ground. The main instrument of destruction, however, is not rain. In the clear dry air of these western regions the daily range of temperature is astonishingly great. In my own experience the thermometer rose sometimes to 90° in the shade, and fell at night to 19° Fahr. But this daily range of 71° is much exceeded. Exposed during the day to the expansion caused by such heat, and during the night to contraction from such rapid chilling, the surface of the friable strata is in a constant state of strain, under which it exfoliates and crumbles into sand. The sultry air during the earlier part of the day remains motionless. Again and again we saw mirage across the plains. The isolated buttes and projecting cliffs were broken up into clumps like trees, beneath which lay what seemed the sheen of a placid lake, though really a parched sage-brush plain, or a burning expanse of sand and alkali soil. But in the afternoon a wind always rose and swept across the country though fortunately during our exploration never getting beyond a breeze. But it was no difficult to realize what these blasts must be in the full blaze of summer, when the hot air, like the breath of a simoom, rushes along the desert lifting up clouds of sand and of the fine white efflorescent dust. The powdery surface of the crumbling rocks is blown away. Wastes of loose sand, here piled into shifting dunes, there dispersed far and wide over the desert, are continually augmented by fresh supplies of material from the same source. Every pebble that projects above the ground acquires, under the action of the ceaseless sand-drift, a curiously polished and channelled surface. And the same erosive action no doubt affects the mouldering precipices of the Bad Lands. The rocks are actually ground down by their own detritus driven against them by the wind.—"Geological Sketches."

Natural History, Science, etc.

Salt Lake of Utah.—From a distance it looks blue enough, and not different from other sheets of water, but on a nearer view its shore is seen to be a level plain of salt-crust mud. Suddenly does this plain slip under the water that the actual margin of the lake is not very sharply drawn. The water has a heavy, motionless lifeless aspect, and is practically destitute of living creatures of every kind. Fish are found in the rivers leading into the lake, but into the lake itself they never venture. Nor did we see any of the abundant bird-life that would have been visible on a fresh-water lake of such dimensions. There was a stillness in the air and on the water befitting the strange desert aspect of the scenery.

After looking at the water for awhile, the next step was of course to get into it. The Mormons and Gentiles of Salt Lake City make good use of their lake for bathing purpose. At convenient points they have thrown or wooden piers provided with dressing-rooms and hot water apparatus. Betaking ourselves to one of these erections, my companion and I were soon fitted out in bathing costumes of approved pattern, and descending into the lake at once realized the heaviness of the water. I walking, the leg that is lifted off the bottom seems somehow bent on rising to the surface and some exertion is needed to force it down again to the mud below. One suddenly feels top-heavy, and seems to need special care not to turn uppermost. The extreme shallowness of the lake is also soon noticed. We found ourselves at first barely over the knees; so we proceeded to march into the lake. After a long journey, so long that it seemed we ought to be almost out of sight of the shore, we were scarcely up to the waist. At its deepest part the lake is not more than about fifty feet in depth. Yet it measures eighty miles in length by about thirty-two in extreme breadth. We made some experiments in flotation, but always with the uncomfortable feeling that our bodies were not properly ballasted for such water, and that we might roll over, or turn round head downmoany moment. It is quite possible to float in sitting posture with the hands brought round the knees. As one of the risks of these experiments, moreover the water would now and then get into our eyes, or find out any half-healed wound which the blazing sun of the previous weeks had inflicted upon our faces. So rapid is the evaporation in the dry air of this region, that the skin after being wetted, is almost immediately crusted with salt. I noticed, too, that the wooden steps leading up to the pier, were hung with slender stalactites of salt from the drip of the bathers. After being pickled in this fashion we had the luxury of washing the salt crust off with the douche of hot water, where with every dressing-room is provided.—Biological Sketches.

A Drunken Jackdaw.—A publican at the village of Gilmerton, near Edinburgh, had a fine jackdaw. On one occasion half a glass of whiskey was left on a table, when Jackie flew up, and, after the first taste, liked it so much that he drank a quantity. In a few minutes symptoms of intoxication began to appear, his wings dropped and his eyes were half closed. He then staggered in his walk in the most ridiculous way possible. He moved towards the edge of the table, probably intending to fly to the ground, but he had either lost the power of motion in his wings, or he was afraid to trust them. He stood seemingly meditating what he should do, all the while hanging like a drunken man about to lose his balance, till at last his eyes quite closed, and he fell on his back, with his legs in the air, exhibiting every sign of death. An attempt was made to pour some water down his throat, but he could not swallow. He was then rolled in a piece of flannel put into a box, and placed on the shelf of a locked closet. All the family, with whom he was a great pet, never expected to see him on his legs again. Next morning, about six o'clock, the closet door was opened with the expectation of finding Jackie defunct; but he had extricated himself from the flannel, and as soon as the door was open he flew out, and made his escape as quickly as possible to a basin-shaped pond, out of which the fowls drank, and copiously allayed his thirst. He repeated this several times during the day, and was not the less for getting drunk; but, with more forbearance than those who are endowed with reason, he never again would touch whiskey."—Anecdotes of Birds.

Gain Through Loss.

When practising according to the proverb, "honesty is the best policy," we admit that honesty is the prime object of pursuit, and with honesty it is, get it by fair means if possible, but show, get it.

When beginning to provide for a prosperous future, it is wise to bear in mind that there are enemies to be overcome, that in case of failure to surmount them at once, "Try again" would be the motto. Again and again this works well in the pursuit of earthly gain, none less in securing heavenly treasure. Wisdom above teaches that through loss great gain may be secured.

In the visitations of the Father's love, opportunity is afforded for gain through loss of earthly treasure. It may not be by the imprudent use of the good things of earth, but in like manner Job lost his without incurring Divine disfavor.

Thus opportunity is afforded to secure a sufficiency, which with the Divine blessing maketh rich, as unto it, no sorrow is added.

"Man needs but little here below, nor needs that little long."

Coaching in South Africa.

This kind of coaching is an experience which at the present day can only be tried in Africa. The coaches themselves are the most curious productions of human skill. Intended to hold twelve passengers inside, half a dozen outside, besides large quantities of heavy baggage, they are constructed of very solid materials hung upon thick springs of leather, and present the most unwieldy, lumbering and old world appearance. They are drawn by ten or twelve mules or horses harnessed in pairs. Two men are required to guide the team, the one holding the reins, the other the long whip with which he can severely chastise all but the leading pair. When driving a team of mules the whip is in operation every minute, constant flogging alone inducing these stubborn animals to do their best. At times one of the drivers is compelled to descend from the box and run alongside the team, flogging them all with the greatest heartiness and impartiality. In spite, however, of all this effort and apparent harsh treatment, an average speed of about six miles is all that can be realized. Roads there are none; deeply rutted tracks are followed. When the ruts get too deep for safety the track turns slightly aside, and to such an extent does this sometimes occur, that in places the track occupies a width of a quarter of a mile or more. Swinging, bounding, jolting, creaking, straining over this extraordinary route, the coach pursues the uneven tenor of its way, sometimes laboring and plunging like a ship at sea, constantly keeling over at angles at which an upset seems unavoidable; now descending into the deep bed of a "spruit" (creek), now sticking fast in heavy ground, now careering over masses of rocks and stones. The travellers, all shaken up inside like an omelet in a frying-pan, never cease to wonder that the human frame can endure such shaking, or that wood and iron can be so firmly riveted together, as to stand such a strain. It may be mentioned, that the life of a coach does not exceed two years, that upsets are frequent, and casualties not uncommon.—Men, Mines and Animals in South Africa.

Seneca Indians.—At the meeting of the Committee having charge of the boarding-school for Indian children at Tunesasah, held Ninth Month 13th, some interesting information was given. The school contained forty-five scholars, and as the session was near closing, it was thought desirable that some of the Committee should attend the closing exercises of the session on the 21st of the Ninth Month.

During the past season the family at the school had been favored with several visits from ministering Friends and others, and religious meetings which were well attended had been held at several places on the Allegheny and Corn-planter Reservations.

One of the members of the Committee had visited most of the Indian homes, to his own satisfaction and that of the people. In 127 of the houses he found the people within, and he was at several others, where none of the usual occupants were within. Since his first visit, nineteen years before, he found a great improvement in the character of the houses, and in the cultivation of the land.

The subjects of the use of intoxicating drinks, and of the imperfect maintenance of the marriage relation among the Indians, had been under the care of a committee; but owing to the engrossing nature of the negotiations connected with the renewing of the leases for land in Salamanca and other villages, the way had not opened to take any action.

The Indians on the Allegheny Reservation had been visited recently by Commissioner Morgan, who encouraged some of the young people to go to the School at Carlisle—others were reported as preparing to become inmates of that at Hampton, Virginia.

An application to be received into membership among Friends was received from two Indians on the Cataraugus Reservation.

Pain.—Pain is a good thing. It is our warning that something is wrong with the machinery of our bodies. Nature does not often strike us behind our backs or in the dark. She gives warning. It would be no blessing to the child to bump his head and feel no hurt, or to put his hand against the stove and experience no burn.

Effect of Drinking upon the Children.—The Herald of Health gives the result of a study of the posterity of ten drinking families and of ten families of abstainers from the use of intoxicating drinks.

"The direct posterity of the ten families of drinkers included 57 children. Of these, 25 died in the first weeks and months of their life, six were idiots, in five children a striking backwardness of their longitudinal growth was observed, five were affected with epilepsy, five with inborn diseases. One boy was taken with cholera and became idiotic. Thus of the 57 children of drinkers, only ten, or 17.5 per cent., showed a normal constitution and development. The ten sober families had 61 children, five only dying in the first weeks; four were affected with curable diseases of the nervous system; two only presented inborn defects. The remaining 50—81.9 per cent.—were normal in their constitution and development."

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 24, 1892.

In THE FRIEND, of Ninth Month 10th, an article on Worldly Conformity was published, which was stated in the Editorial column to have been prepared by our late valued Friend, Thomas Evans.

Through a mistake a wrong article was published. In the present number we insert the one which was intended, and to which the remarks in the aforesaid Editorial notice apply.

We have received a letter from an aged Friend, of West Branch, Iowa, describing his attendance at Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting in that State, on the 27th of Eighth Month.

The meeting was large, the house being full. A Friend present felt drawn to address the audience on the necessity of rendering that willing obedience which the Lord requires; commencing his remarks with the passage—"Lord draw us, and we will run after thee." This was followed by prayer and several testimonies. There was a sense of the overshadowing of good by the Master of all rightly-gathered assemblies. The business was conducted in love and good order.

At the meeting on First-day the house was crowded; several Friends spoke; a covering of solemnity was over the people, and many could say—"It is good for me to be here."

A woman Friend, who has for several years acted as an Agent for THE FRIEND, in remitting some subscriptions, makes the following remarks, which we publish in the hope that they may have a stimulating effect on others:

"I think I can see something of the influence the press has upon the minds of the people, either for good or evil. A weekly paper becomes, as it were, a home companion, and I very much desire that the time may come when THE FRIEND, or some paper that holds as closely to Friends' principles as it does, will every week enter every family of Friends in America. I fully believe it would do more to awaken an interest in our doctrines than anything else."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has accepted the invitation of Brazil and the Argentine Republic to act as arbitrator in the dispute between the two countries over an international boundary.

A syndicate of American capitalists has secured an option on the volcano Popocatepetl, which it is proposed to operate as a sulphur mine. The syndicate proposes to run an electric railway up the mountain to bring down the sulphur, which will be mined on a large scale and with modern machinery instead of by the antiquated methods now employed, though with good returns. The sulphur is of excellent quality and is chiefly used in making powder for the Mexican army.

Full returns of the recent election in Vermont give Fuller, Rep., for Governor, 39,190; Smalley, Dem., 19,526; Allen, Pro., 1,650. Fuller's plurality, 19,664, and majority, 18,014. Compared with 1888 this is a Republican loss of 9,262, a Democratic loss of one, and a Prohibition gain of 278.

Two special trains left the Ninth and Green Sts. Station of the Reading Rail Road, in this city, on the morning of the 21st inst., to carry the members of the International Association of Ticket Agents to Niagara.

A number of the leading liquor dealers of Philadelphia and New York have recently organized the Philadelphia Pure Rye Whiskey Distilling Company. A tract of ground of 103 acres, fronting on the Delaware River, at Eddington, Bucks County, has been purchased, and the company has received proposals for the construction of a distilling plant on the property, which will be the largest in the East. The establishment will have a capacity of 30,000 barrels yearly, it is estimated, and will secure most of its rye from the farmers of Bucks County. It will not be a rival of the Whiskey Trust, as the latter distills its product from corn.

On the 13th inst. the passengers of the steamship Normannia were allowed to land on Fire Island, New York, where they were comfortably accommodated at the Surf House. On the 15th they were released from quarantine and allowed to proceed to their homes. The disease does not appear to be spreading among the detained people in quarantine in New York harbor. One death is reported aboard the Scandia on the 19th inst.

On the 14th inst. the New York Board of Health announced that there had been five deaths in the city from Asiatic cholera. These cases had been reported as "suspicious," and a bacteriological examination determined the nature of the disease. The first death was on the 6th and the last on the 13th; two were located on the East Side, two were on Eleventh Avenue and two on Tenth Avenue. Thus far there have been no secondary cases reported.

The Mayors of Chicago, Detroit and fifteen other cities in the Northwest have joined in a memorial to the President urging the suspension of immigration. It is improbable that this will be done.

The State Health Officer of Texas has ordered a quarantine of all steamers from New York.

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 384, being 70 less than the previous week, and 5 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 197 were males and 187 females; 43 died of consumption; 34 of diseases of the heart; 32 of marasmus; 25 of diphtheria; 24 of cholera infantum; 20 of pneumonia; 15 of casualties; 13 of inanition; 12 of apoplexy; 12 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of old age and 10 of cancer.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, registered, 114 a 115; coupon, 115 a 116; currency 6's, 107 a 117. Cotton was quiet and unchanged. Middling uplands officially quoted at 7 7/8 c. per pound.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, spot, $16.25 a $17.25; spring bran, in bulk, spot, $15.00 a $16.00.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.25 a $2.50; do., extras,

$2.50 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.85 a $3.25; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.60 a $3.85; Western winter, clear, $3.40 a $3.75; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.00; winter patent, $4.00 a $4.40; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.25; do., patent, $4.35 a $4.65; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour was quiet, but steady, at $3.65 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 74 3/4 a 74 1/2 cts.

No. 2 mixed corn, 53 1/2 a 54 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 40 a 40 1/2 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, none here; good, 4 1/2 a 5 cts.; medium, 4 1/4 a 4 1/2 cts.; common, 3 3/4 a 4 cts.; culls, 3 a 3 1/2 cts.; fat cows, 2 a 3 1/2 cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5 1/4 a 5 1/2 cts.; good, 4 3/4 a 5 cts.; medium, 4 1/4 a 4 1/2 cts.; common, 3 1/2 a 4 cts.; culls, 2 a 3 1/2 cts. Lambs, 3 a 6 1/2 cts.

HOGS.—Good Western, 7 1/2 a 8 cts.; other Western, 7 1/4 a 7 3/4 cts.

FOREIGN.—The feeling about the cholera in Europe is much more hopeful than it was. In the infected districts the disease appears to be slowly dying out, and no other cities seem to be threatened. Several sporadic cases, principally among the refugees from Hamburg, are reported, but in no case has the disease spread. At Hamburg and St. Petersburg there is a slow but nearly constant decrease in the number of cases and deaths. At Paris the disease is stationary, and at Havre it is much less rife. England has so far escaped infection entirely, the only cases which have occurred being those of foreigners who brought the disease with them.

The total returns up to the 17th inst., give the number of persons attacked by cholera in Hamburg as 15,663, and the deaths as 6,764.

The most important political action of the week was the revocation by John Morley of A. J. Balfour's edicts under the Coercion act.

According to the new British postal regulations, a foreign letter may be of any weight, but must not exceed two feet in length or one foot in breadth or depth.

The British Consul at Palermo, in his report to the Foreign Office, gives startling details regarding brigandage. The whole island of Sicily, he says, is infected with bands of robbers, who capture large landed proprietors and rich merchants and hide them in caves in the mountains until they are ransomed. Farmers are plundered of horses and cattle, while peasants who are suspected of being informers are persecuted, tortured or murdered outright. Great land-owners living within four hours' ride of Palermo are afraid to remain on their estates unless they are surrounded by private mounted guards. The band led by a brigand named Samauw is the most terrible of all. Even children have not escaped the members of this gang of thieves and murderers. They have beheaded little boys and girls, cut their bodies in halves, and then thrown the mutilated remains about the country for dogs and hogs to eat. Many land-owners who have incurred the enmity of the brigands have been assassinated, while others who have fallen into their hands have been condemned to death by slow torture.

The North German Gazette, with reference to the claim of German papers that the Gilbert Islands are within German jurisdiction, reprints an agreement entered into in Fifth Month, 1886, by Count Herbert Bismarck, the then German Foreign Secretary, and Sir E. Malet, the British Ambassador, in which the islands were defined as within the British sphere of influence.

The London Standard's correspondent at Vienna says: "The Hungarian plan for excluding cholera is to burn everything suspected. All hides, bedding, clothes and rags from infected districts are burnt. Four hundred weight of carded wool from England via Hamburg was burned yesterday. The question of compensation is not thought of."

The Odessa correspondent of the News says: "The Governor of Turkestan has reported to the Government that 1,300 deaths have been caused by the plague in Turkestan and Askabad. He believes the spread of the disease has been checked. The disease is of a pustulous nature, and is known as black or spotted plague."

The Russians have evacuated the Pamirs. A large force has been ordered to be stationed permanently at Murghal.

The Vienna correspondent of the News says that the Russians withdrew from the Pamirs only because the Afghans and the Chinese refused to sell them food.

During six years the population of Jerusalem has risen from 30,000 to 80,000. This has been greatly due to the Czar's persecution of the Jews, and to the Sultan having given Russian Jews who emigrate Palestine proprietary rights in the agricultural settlements in which they are being planted. Six hundred houses are being built outside the city walls. The Sultan will send the great officers of state to be present at the opening of the new railway to Jaffa.

A fence 500 miles long, of wire netting, separating the colonies of New South Wales and Queensland one of the wonders of Australia. It is designed to keep the rabbits out.

Japanese advices just received at San Francisco steamer, state that 300 persons were killed and nine injured in recent gales in the Tokushima District. Twenty thousand acres of land were inundated; 42,000 houses destroyed.

The time for the free importation of corn has been extended by the Mexican Government.

The Dominion Trade and Labor Congress, in session in Toronto, adopted a resolution declaring the admission of Chinese a menace and undeniable danger to the moral and material interests of Canada, and should be totally prohibited, and that as the presence of them in Canada entails an extra special expense on the whole people of such provinces, as they sojourn there in large numbers, a special annual poll tax of $100 should be imposed on each Chinaman after a given date. Japanese were included. A resolution was also adopted in favor of municipalities owning all electric light plants, water works, ferries and street railways, and the Federal Government owning and controlling railway, telegraph and telephone lines.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Sea-Isle City.

On the 30th of Eighth Month, a small company of us made an excursion to Sea-Isle City, a bathing-place on the southern part of the New Jersey coast.

Our object was two-fold—to examine the flora of that part of the coast, and to visit the Aquarium established there as a place for a summer school of biological study by the University of Pennsylvania. The school had closed for the season a few days before our visit, and only the day before eight hundred fish had been returned to the ocean, and most of the Aquarium emptied their contents. Yet in the debris left we found much to interest us.

One object new to most or all of the company was a Loggerhead Turtle, whose shell was more than two feet in length. These animals are inhabitants of the ocean, and their feet are developed into flat paddles, which enable them to swim with facility, although their motions on land are awkward and difficult. Indeed Turtles seldom visit the land, except to lay their eggs on the sand of the sea-shore, where they scratch a hole with their hind feet, in which a large number of eggs are deposited, and the whole covered up and left, for the heat of the sun to hatch them. When the young Turtles emerge they immediately make for the water.

The biological buildings are placed close to the shore of those bodies of salt water which on the New Jersey coast lie inside of the outer strip of beach which borders the ocean. These buildings are connected with the ocean by inlets, through which the fish find entrance, and they furnish attractive feeding-grounds to many of the ocean inhabitants. The directors of the Aquarium had here placed a large net, fastened to a series of stakes driven into the mud; and this net was one of the many objects that the netmen captured. When first caught its shell was nearly covered with barnacles, a species of shellfish that attaches itself to any solid object which floats with while in its infant state. Many of these had died and been removed, but a number were still remaining, and an intelligent colored man, who was employed about the establishment, called attention to one of them which had opened its shelly doors and protruded its arms, whose sudden retraction bring the currents of water into its cell, thus supplying it with the animalculæ on which it subsists.

At frequent intervals our Turtle raised its head above the surface and swallowed mouthfuls of air—for as its ribs are immovably bound together by the plates of its shell, it cannot enlarge the cavity of the lungs and thus draw in a supply of that necessary article, in the manner in which land-living animals breathe.

Of the Sea Turtles, some feed on vegetable matter, such as the sea weeds; and others on shell-fish, which they can readily crush with their strong jaws, or on other marine animals. Like others of the reptile family, their vital functions are sluggish, and they can live a long time without food.

In the same tank with the Loggerhead Turtle was swimming sluggishly about, a small fish of eight or nine inches in length, but much broader and more clumsy in its proportions than the fish we usually see. The attendant took it in his hands, to which it seemed to make little objection, and stroked its sides to show us how it could puff itself up with air. He called it a Blow-fish.

The Blow-fish is known by several names, such as Swell-fish, Globe-fish, Puffer, &c. It is tolerably abundant along the eastern American coast, and ranges as far north as Cape Cod. At the eastern end of Long Island, a hundred or more are sometimes taken in one haul of a net. It frequently takes the hook. When drawn up it immediately inflates its body to a prodigious size, by means of short, jerky inspirations which distend the sac formed by the skin. The skin is covered with prickles, whence one of its common names—the Porcupine Fish. It belongs to the genus Diodon.

But the most curious of all the strange things were some small fish, nearly circular in outline and so thin that they resembled circles cut out of silvery white paper. There scarcely seemed room inside for any vital organs, but the backbone could be distinctly traced, bent in the middle almost at right angles, and as they were two to three inches across, they must have had digestive organs to enable them to grow to that size. The attendant called them Moon-fish.

In a wide ditch just inside of the bank that lines the bay, the United States Fish Commission has established an oyster culture plant. The quantity of spawn emitted by oysters in the breeding season is enormous—but when the young oysters fasten themselves to the solid supports on which they are to grow, a very large portion of them perish by being smothered in the mud. To prevent this waste of life, empty shells are placed on a woven-wire platform of ten or twelve feet square, and a layer of spawning oysters are deposited in connection with this. The result is, that more of the young oysters are saved alive, and their growth is more rapid. We learned that these experiments were awakening considerable interest in the minds of some of the oystermen in the neighborhood.

On our railroad ride from Camden, one of the things which attracted attention was the great abundance of some of the fall plants (weeds) which had sprung up and occupied the ground.

Large patches seemed almost exclusively filled with a common species of the Buckwheat family (Polygrusum). In other places the Ragweed (Ambusia) covered the ground, and in others the Fleabane Daisy (Erigeron), now widely diffused over the world.

In the swampy land within reach of tidewater the Reed (Phragmites) abounded, whose seeds are a favorite food with the Bob-o-links, or Reed Birds, as they are called in the fall, when they gather in flocks to collect this harvest. They become very fat, and are shot in large numbers, as a delicate viand for epicures. Further south, these birds prey on the rice fields of the planters—sometimes in sufficient numbers to cause them considerable loss.

In many places, as we sped southward, the eye was attracted by interesting looking plants by the roadside, which were out of reach. It was tantalizing thus to be whirled past so many beautiful objects; but all that could be done was to bear it philosophically and exercise patience.

The white sand visible on the roads which came to view reminded us that this part of New Jersey was once beneath the ocean, and that we there saw the traces of ancient sea-beaches. This was still more strikingly shown, a few miles before reaching the end of our journey, by passing a bed of pure white sand several feet in thickness, large quantities of which had been excavated, probably for glass-making. How such a deposit could be formed, we saw a little later, in the hills and ridges of sand which the wind had heaped up along the beach near Sea-Isle City. The power of the wind over this peculiar material is indeed striking.

Maurice River drains a considerable area of country on the western part of southern New Jersey. It flows nearly south, and near Millville descends from the more elevated plateau on which it rises, to a lower level, giving opportunity for utilizing its water power for manufacturing purposes. The mills established here were the commencement of the growth and prosperity of the town. Below that point, the river is navigable, and thus a cheap and convenient transportation could be found for the goods made there and for the material necessary to be brought from other places. The building of the railroad and the introduction of anthracite coal have partially destroyed the advantage which Millville had over other manufacturing sites, but it is still a busy, thriving place. Here are located the extensive glass works of Whitall, Tatum & Co.

Below Millville the railroad bends more to the east, and after crossing the swampy land of Dennis Creek, again turns southward towards Cape May; but here where only a few miles from the ocean, the branch has been built across the salt marshes, which conveyed us to Sea-Isle City.

The day was bright and pleasantly cool; the blue of the ocean contrasted prettily with the white lines of the breakers, and the outlook was unusually beautiful. A walk along the water's edge showed the usual varieties of shells washed up by the tides and stranded on the gently sloping sand. The only noticeable feature was the unusual number of jelly-fish which had been left to perish by the receding waves. They are largely composed of water, held in shape by a minute portion of animal gelatine. They soon dry up in the sunshine, and leave nothing but a scarcely perceptible film of solid matter. Yet they are organized beings, which catch and digest food, perform the ordinary functions of animal life, and produce eggs to continue the race. The kind which we saw were rounded masses of transparent jelly, on the under side of which were placed the stomach and other organs. Being flattened on the sand, we had no opportunity of carefully examining these, but when floating in the water, there may be seen depending from the animal a collection of fingers and tentacles, which it has the power of shortening or lengthening at will. When it comes into contact with any small fish or other object which it wishes to capture, it darts out from these tentacles very fine threads armed with poison stings, which paralyze the fish and render it helpless, so that it cannot resist being drawn up into the stomach of the Jelly-fish, and there being converted into nourishment from its frame. Persons have often been stung by these poison darts, which are common to many species of lowly organized sea-animals. They produce considerable pain and smarting, which may last for some hours.

A few miles below Sea-Isle City, Tonwensend's Inlet separates the beach on which it is built from another strip of sand called Seven-mile Beach. A long, curved bridge, supported on posts, enables the railroad to continue its course along this beach, on which there is considerable woods—the trees being largely Oaks, Cedars, Holly, &c. The winds that prevail along the coast prevent any of these from rising much above the general level. Any ambitious shoot that would aspire to a higher position is at once bent and forced to grow horizontally. The action of the winds has given the upper branches of the trees a peculiarly gnarled and irregular aspect, as was finely shown in some of the dead specimens, which had lost the leaves that might have concealed their peculiarities.

Of the smaller plants, we were impressed with the abundance of the purple Gerardias, of a wild bean (Phaseolus helvolus), and of the climbing Hempweed (Mikania scandens). The beautiful pink stars of a species of Centaury (Sabatia stellaris) were scattered about, and many other plants, more than it would interest our readers to enumerate. J. W.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

Ebenezer Miller, when on his death-bed, in the year 1800, expressed to some who visited him, that his love for Friends, and desire for their prosperity, was as great during his bodily weakness as at any period of his life. In his retired hours, he was frequently in a state of mourning, expressing that the low and declining state of many Friends from that lively exercise of mind, arising from sincere devotion to serve the Lord, was cause of deep sorrow to him; and that it was sealed to his understanding, that truth and righteousness would have shined with much greater brightness, had it not been for the captivating influence of the love of this world, and the alluring prospects thereof; from a sense of which, he was frequently observed fervently engaged in supplication to the Lord, that He would be pleased more and more to wean the minds of Friends from the things of this world, and gather them to the true fold of rest.—From a Memorial of Ebenezer Miller.

AN EPISTLE FROM THE YEARLY MEETING, HELD IN PHILADELPHIA, BY ADJOURNMENTS, FROM THE 16TH OF THE FOURTH MONTH, TO THE 20TH OF THE SAME, INCLUSIVE, 1821.

To the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings of Friends constituting the same.

DEAR FRIENDS:—Having received, in this our Annual Assembly, reports from all the constituent branches in answer to the Queries, it appears that much cause is given for painful exercise, on account of the unfaithfulness of many, in regard to the maintenance of our religious testimonies. The minds of Friends now convened, being brought under the weight thereof, a concern has arisen in the love of the Gospel, to address to your serious and weighty consideration the subjects which have engaged our attention.

A primary and fundamental obligation on the professed Christian, is love to God. In all those who cherish this love, we believe there will be a corresponding practice; and that it will be manifested by a faithful discharge of every religious duty. Such will delight to meet often together for the worship of their gracious Creator; and whilst animated by this love, they cannot feel easy to neglect so solemn a duty. This momentous subject hath deeply affected us with sorrow, on seeing that the character of our religious Society is so far below what our profession demands. Where any among us neglect our religious meetings, either on the First or other days of the week, they should be tenderly admonished to consider the effect of such example on their tender offspring, and the youth among us; and the awful danger they are in, of being answerable for the libertine opinions and practices these are liable to embrace in such a state of neglect of the Christian duty of worshipping their Creator.

We have been brought under much concern, not only on account of the sorrowful neglect apparent in respect to the attendance of our meetings for Divine worship, but also in consequence of the undisciplined state of many of the children of Friends, who seem to have but little acquaintance with that quietness of mind and manners so essential to inward and spiritual devotion. Experience has often proved, that where children are early instructed to submit themselves to their pious parents, and introduced, by example, into habits of religious retirement, a foundation is thereby laid for future usefulness in society. We much desire that this important subject may obtain the sober and feeling consideration of all our dear Friends.

By a careful attention to the Divine gift in ourselves, and living under the precious influence of the love of God, the mind is rendered mild and tender, and becomes impressed with an awful reverence towards Him: the spiritual senses, in this state, are kept alive; and hence a qualification is gained to perceive when our dear children are under the Divine visitation; and by co-operating with the gift in them, many precious seasons might be enjoyed, in which both parents and children would be refreshed together in the blessed feeling of the goodness of God. Such opportunities could not fail to establish the most tender attachment.

Were parents, by their own example, frequently to introduce the reading of the Holy Scriptures, it would have a happy effect, and tend very much to promote a love in the mind of their offspring for those invaluable productions of the Holy Spirit.

A concern has feelingly attended our mind on account of the want of more care in the observance of the First-day of the week. It is believed that the libertine manner in which some are permitted to spend the afternoon and evening of that day, often tends to efface all good impressions with which they may have been favored, when at meetings for Divine worship in the morning. Friends are therefore earnestly requested to keep their families from wandering about on that day. It is an opportunity in which they and the children or youth under their care, might, without interruption, be able to enjoy the time in religious improvement, if their attention were directed to the Scriptures, and to other books promotive of piety and virtue.

We have had, under consideration at this time, the sorrowful departure evident among many of the children of Friends, from the plainness of dress, address and language, enjoined by our Christian principles; and though many may be disposed to contend, that there is no religion in the form or color of a garment, yet experience has fully proved, that the trivial devoted in the Society have been led into plainness of apparel by the solemn impulse of duty, and it has also proved, in many instances, that those who have turned from this branch of Christian profession, have gradually slid into the evils of a more alarming character. We are concerned to recommend this subject to the careful attention of all our members.

Believing that the Discipline of the Society was instituted in the wisdom of Truth, and that as we are baptized into the one Spirit, we become concerned to walk by the same rule and to maintain the same thing, we are thus prepared to build each other up on the most holy faith. It is only as the mind is enlightened with a portion of this wisdom, that the Discipline can be safely and properly administered; and therefore it is of great importance that those who are engaged in this weighty service should often recur to the first principles, not only understanding the nature and ground of our profession, but being able to discover the spirit of error, however speciously disguised.

We have been renewedly made sensible that great weakness has been introduced into the Society, by a false though plausible tenderness, which leads to the easy reception of acknowledgments from such as have violated the rules established by the Body, particularly on the important subject of marriage. When those who have wounded the testimonies of Truth, and have never known in themselves that heartfelt conviction which leads to conversion, nor are inhibited in their demeanor, fruits meet for repentance, are admitted again within the pale of the Society, the tendency of such admission is to settle them at ease, in an unregenerate state; to increase the burdens of the living among us; to prostrate the testimonies which we are called to exalt; to augment the influence of a libertine spirit; and to transform the Discipline into a feeble, inefficient form.

Our beloved young Friends have claimed a place in our brotherly concern. We should rejoice to find among them greater marks of Christian humility, and that they were more fully brought into perfect resignation to the cross of Christ: were this their happy experience, we might have hope concerning them, that they would be preserved from the danger being contaminated by the floating and speculative opinions on religious subjects, which so much abound: and we are firmly persuaded that a careful perusal of the valuable writings left us by our primitive Friends, would powerfully contribute to open to their view the fallacious nature and pernicious effect of uncertain and changeable doctrines.

Desiring that all may be gathered to, and reserved upon the alone sure foundation, the unchangeable Truth, we conclude.

Signed on behalf of the Meeting,
SAMUEL BETTLE, Clerk.

Struggling in Hope.

Attainment is a hope rather than a possession, and struggling in hope is the normal condition of him who would attain. In practical life, he who would have the highest good must strive for it through difficulties, and over obstacles; and, in the teachings of the Old Testament and the New, spiritual rest and peace are found as a result of improved conflict, not in exemption from conflict.

The voyage of life is over a tempestuous sea, and he who would find a haven of rest must endure the tossings and perils of that voyage to its end. The promise of the glad time when there shall be no more sea is yet unfulfilled. Hope can picture to us the joys which are to follow the safe ending of this voyage; but hope cannot lessen the perils that are to be passed before the thither-shore of the stormy sea is fully reached. It is comfort in trial, not freedom from trial, that the Psalmist rejoices over:

God is our refuge and strength,
A very present help in trouble,
Therefore will we not fear, though the earth do change,
And though the mountains be moved in the heart of the seas;

Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled,
Though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof.
There is a river, the streams whereof make glad the city of God,
The holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High."

This thought of the Psalmist has been the comforting thought of many a tempest-tossed believer from his day to ours. It was in the mind of one of God's children in the stormy days of our Civil War, during a peculiar experience on the southern coast of the United States. A government steamer was seeking an entrance to the harbor of St. Augustine, from the ocean side. A severe storm had prevailed along the coast, and increased the difficulty of passing the bar which stretches across the face of Anastasia Bay.

It was in the early morning, after a night of doom. The wind was still blowing a gale. Huge waves lifted themselves on every side of the cumbersome steamer, and rolled on to break in a sullen roar along the sandy beach on either hand, or to boil and foam on the wide-extended outer shoal. As the unwieldy steamer was headed toward the coast, it rolled and swayed and creaked, as though its every beam and brace were giving way. On its careening, slippery, sea-swept forward deck stood a group intently watching the incidents of the perilous passage. Great flocks of sea-birds swooped and circled above the watchers with loud, warning cries; and the snowy crests of the waves on the onrushing bar seemed to shake defiance at the venturesome voyagers, forbidding their progress.

Yet there was firm hope on the part of all who waited and watched for the issue of that struggle, because of their firm trust in him to whom their lives had been committed. Far forward, in the very eyes of the steamer's bow, clinging to an iron-girt stanchion, stood the sturdy, weather-beaten old pilot of the port. Bronzed and grim, with bared head, his gray locks streaming in the wind, his face set as a flint to the coast before him, he noted with keen eye the familiar guide-marks of the tortuous channel, and with deep, strong voice sounded out his words of command to the helmsman on the upper deck, who heeded his call as though it were Divine. Before that pilot, and before those anxious watchers, over the bar, out of the reach of ocean storms, on the far shore of the sheltered bay, there lay, in the morning sunlight, the quaint and quiet old Spanish city, its outlook made glad by streams of a quiet river on either hand; and none on that steamer's deck had doubt that they would soon have rest in that tempting retreat; for the pilot whom they trusted was

Every one of us is called to a like experience with this, on his troubled life-voyage. There are storms above and about us. There are waves and shoals before us. The craft on which we journey is in ceaseless peril. But every one of us can have trust in the Divine Pilot who guides and guards us. And the heart-cry of every anxious soul can be:

"One who has known in storms to sail
I have on board;
Above the raging of the gale
I hear my Lord.
He holds me when the billows smite,
I shall not fall.
If sharp, 'tis short; if long, 'tis light;
He tempers all.
Safe to the land, safe to the land—
The end is this;
And then with Him go hand in hand
Far into bliss."

Not the absence of dangers, but the hope of deliverance out of dangers, is the comfort of God's loved ones. As a godly writer has said: "God did not take up the three Hebrews out of the furnace of fire, but He came down and walked with them. He did not remove Daniel from the den of lions; He sent his angel to close the mouth of the beasts. He did not, in answer to the prayer of Paul, remove the thorn in the flesh; but He gave him a sufficiency of grace to sustain him." And the promise of God to every trustful believer is: "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee. * * * Fear not; for I am with thee." Therefore it is that the believer is "patient in tribulation," "rejoicing in hope," because of what is sure to be his, under the guidance of the Pilot of his soul.—S. S. Times.

Music.

Our aged Friend, Robert Knowles, of West Branch, Iowa, sends the following notice of a communication delivered in a meeting, which he attended, in which the preacher, speaking of music, said:

I believe it is the curse of the religious world. It drowns the witness of Truth in the heart. It may do for some what it did for Saul—when Saul was troubled, as he thought by an evil spirit from God (but was it not the witness in his own heart which condemned for disobedience?) David took a harp and played with his hand—"so Saul was refreshed and was well." Did Saul grow better under this treatment? No! but rather grew worse, so that he soon cast his javelin at David to kill him, because he knew that David was better than himself, and in his trouble of mind he hated the good. As Paul says, "Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of men that doeth evil, of the Jew first and also of the Gentile; but glory, honor and peace to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile." Saul was suffering under this tribulation and anguish of mind, for disobedience.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

North Carolina Yearly Meeting, 1892.

[A brief notice of this meeting has already appeared in THE FRIEND. Since then we have received from one of its members the following more full account of what transpired.]

Eight Month 9th, 10 A. M.—Representative Meeting, well attended, and opened under a quiet sense of the Divine presence, with prayer for help and guidance, then the business coming before it, was attended to.

At 2 P. M. the meeting for ministry and oversight convened, and we were favored to meet many old familiar faces, and to mingle in reverent worship, and a blessing was asked on our coming together, and for strength to do our duty. Ministers and elders from other Yearly Meetings were welcomed, and allusion made to the irregularities of last year, and of the paid pastors who then disturbed us. No Friend has a right to prescribe to another when he shall rise, or when he shall kneel, speak or pray; and to condemn those who keep their seats because they do not feel easy to follow man's dictation, is not Christ-like.

Eighth Month 9th, evening.—A meeting on evangelistic work, where we heard a little of their methods, but no detailed account of the way the money raised was used. It was stated that no one was paid for preaching. There was quite a lively discussion over this, and some personal remarks, which were stopped. The cry was for more money. Little true satisfaction there.

Eighth Month 10th, 10 A. M.—The Yearly Meeting business meeting commenced, and after a time of solid waiting and some expression, the names of representatives were called. There were three ministers, with certificates, present from New York Yearly Meeting, and one from each, of Ireland, Indiana, Iowa and Kansas Yearly Meetings. The London general epistle was read, and much satisfaction expressed therein. Its teaching was clear as to worship and a free gospel ministry, and in accordance with early Friends.

Afternoon, Meeting for Worship.—Daniel Hill read us statistics of the growth of professing Christian bodies in America during the past thirty years; also as to infidelity.

Eighth Month 11th.—Business Meeting at 10 A. M. L. L. Hobbs appointed Clerk, with Josiah Nicholson and Robert C. Root for assistants. Epistles were read from ten Yearly Meetings with whom we correspond. That from Baltimore was commented on, and that from Iowa objected to.

Dublin Yearly Meeting sent a minute protesting against the change of name from our old and well known one to "Friends' Church," with which many Friends heartily united. Attention was called to a paragraph in a Charlotte paper as to a difficulty between the Indians in Eastern Cherokee (not long since under Friends' care) numbering 1100, and having 30,000 acres of land in the counties of Swain, Jackson and Cherokee, on whose reservation a training school had been erected, and H. W. Spray (a member of North Carolina Yearly Meeting) was their teacher, who joined them in refusing to give up the possession to an authorized agent of the United States Government. It appears he had come to blows, but no blood had been shed, and several Friends expressed the desire that some Friend might feel it right to go there at once, to try to settle the matter before it reached to outrage and bloodshed. If not, to have a letter dispatched to same effect by night's mail.

Afternoon at two in joint session.—Report of evangelistic work read, and an appropriation of $200 proposed, to which objection was made that several Friends throughout the Yearly Meeting had conscientious objections to its payment, and that in thus oppressing tender consciences, the Divine blessing could not rest. Nevertheless, it was concluded to assess it, and to excuse from payment any Friend who felt uneasy to pay it. Statistics were read as to the converts made during the past ten years, amounting to about 2900 in all, of which 1000 had applied for membership. The cost was said to average about as much as in other Yearly Meetings, viz: one dollar per head, which looks like a low figure to obtain George Fox Quakers at; and if numbers were our object it might read well—but I don't like this way of estimating. George Fox Quakers are not so easily obtained, and are scarce. It was also stated that the number of members belonging to the North Carolina Yearly Meeting before the war was 760, which, with the natural increase, and these converts, now numbered over 5000—but where are they? The attendance at Yearly Meeting does not now appear to be greater than it was twenty years ago, and we have increased facility of travel and other attractions offered.

Eighth Month 12th.—Assembled again about 10 A. M. The Queries and Answers were read. The attendance of Meetings for Worship and Discipline, except on First-days, is much reduced. Love pretty well maintained. Intoxicants still indulged in by several, and sold by some. Tobacco, grown, sold and used by many men and women; and if they would drop it, and pay in the money to the meeting, we need not be short of funds. If all our members were new creatures in Christ they would gladly attend meetings, and be peaceable, self-denying and useful citizens of earth. At this sitting our Irish Friend and visitor was much favored to set forth the true ground for all worship and ministry, and the right way to look for and expect the Divine blessing in reviving meetings and opening new ones. This was felt to be a favored conclusion to this sitting.

Afternoon, joint session, at which Mary Woody returned the certificate granted her last year, with acknowledgment of how the way had been opened for her and other companions from time to time. D. Sampson stated his concern to visit Dublin and London Yearly Meetings, and to see once again his old father and sisters. Sympathy and unity was expressed, with one dissentient, and he was liberated, his wife to accompany him.

The Report of Blue Ridge Mission for past year was read next, and $200 appropriated to help to sustain it for another year, to which objection was made. A subscription in the meeting at large, amounting to $130, showed the interest felt.

Seventh-day morning.—The Report of Representatives was read. It recommended that where any Friend felt a conscientious objection to pay his proportion of the $300 assessed last year for evangelistic work, he should be relieved, also that the present treasurer, J. J. Cox, be continued, and $800 raised for the Yearly Meeting's use the ensuing year, with which the Yearly Meeting united. All the Quarters are in arrear, and this has been going on from year to year, so they were requested to pay up promptly. The Yearly Meeting is in debt, and as a parent, this should not be. It is a bad example, and we should not go on appropriating money and have to borrow it, but come down to the level of our circumstances, and get out of debt. The shutters now being opened, we heard the report of our Peace Committee for the year read; also the Friends' Peace Association for America, and approved, and $25 appropriated for our Peace Committee for the next year. Nereus Mendenhall (who had introduced the subject previously in the meeting of ministry and oversight) explained about a proposed petition addressed to all the Christian governments of the world on arbitration. All Christian denominations are asked to join on Christian grounds. Our Yearly Meeting approving of it, the Clerk was directed to sign it. It is being translated into other languages, and as there will be other details to attend to, it was referred to the Representative Meeting.

Afternoon.—Exception was taken to uniting in the proposed Conference of American Yearly Meetings, on several grounds. As a Society we have been opposed to ecclesiastical domination and centralization of authority in a few. It is thrown over the whole body under the leadership of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. "One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren." Our members are expected to use their talents and exercise their rights, and as a plain farming class we don't worry after nice theological disquisitions, but plain gospel truths; and our Book of Discipline sets forth our principles and practices from the start. Keep to it and enquire for the old ways, and walk therein. However, a committee was appointed to furnish names. Next the report of Guilford College, and of the trustees, and the president and the advisory committee were read. Two hundred and six students, of which one hundred and nineteen were Friends, have been taught there the past year. The debt against it has run up to $6,000. The endowment Fund of $50,000 was completed early in the year. They are to keep in future to a cash basis. The farm has been profitable. The cottage system has worked well. The girls have need of more physical training, which was spoken to and the great advantage of boys and girls having an opportunity during their school term, to learn handicraft trades, so as to equip them the better to obtain a comfortable livelihood. Being a college of Friends, it should be a Friends' training-school for time and eternity. Friends books should be studied and read. The teachers being taught by the Spirit should seek to imbue the young minds brought under their control with the Truth in its virgin purity, as professed by Friends. A subscription of $550 was raised in the open meeting to aid the poor girls in need of education under the winning advocacy of M. M. Hobbs, and the reports and suggestions approved of.

THE CALL OF THE CHRISTIAN.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

(One of the Poet's earliest pieces, bearing date, 1833.)

[At the request of a Friend, we republish the following beautiful poem of our beloved Whittier. Or could wish that he had continued his subject a little further, and spoken of other calls to duty coming from the "gleams of truth and light," that "flash o'er the waiting mind"—such as every true Christian experiences in the work of regeneration, which involves the necessity of bearing Christ's yoke and submitting those things required for our own humbling and growth in grace, as well as for the good of others. But let be thankful for what we have.—Ed.]

Not always as the whirlwind's rush
On Horeb's mount of fear,
Not always as the burning bush
To Midian's shepherd-seer,
Nor as the awful voice which came
To Israel's prophet-bards,
Nor as the tongues of cloven flame
Nor gift of fearful words.

Not always thus, with outward sign
Of fire or voice from Heaven,
The message of a truth Divine,
The call of God, is given,
Awaking in the human heart
Love for the true and right—
Zeal for the Christian's better part,
Strength for the Christian's fight!

Nor unto manhood's heart alone
The holy influence steals:
Warm with a rapture not its own,
The heart of woman feels!
As she who by Samaria's well
The Saviour's errand sought—
As those who with the fervent Paul
And meek Aquila wrought:

Or those meek ones whose martyrdom
Rome's gathered grandeur saw:
Or those who in their Alpine home
Braved the Crusader's war,
When the green Vaudois, trembling, heard
Through all its vales of death
The martyr's song of triumph poured
From woman's failing breath.

And gently, by a thousand things
Which o'er our spirits pass,
Like breezes o'er the harp's fine strings,
Or vapors o'er a glass,
Leaving their token strange and new
Of music or of shade,
The summons to the right and true
And merciful is made.

Oh, then, if gleams of truth and light
Flash o'er thy waiting mind,
Unfolding to thy mental sight
The wants of human kind;
If, brooding over human grief,
The earnest wish is known
To soothe and gladden with relief
An anguish not thine own;

Though heralded with naught of fear,
Or outward sign or show;
Though only to the inward ear
It whispers soft and low;
Though dropping, as the manna fell,
Unseen, yet from above,
Noiseless as dew-fall—heed it well,
Thy Father's call of love!

SELECTED

TO A WEARY WORKER.

"Rest!" thou must not seek for rest
Until thy work be done;
Thou must not lay thy burden down
Till setting of the sun.

Thou must not weary of thy life,
Nor scorn thy lonely lot,
Nor cease to work, because such work
Thy neighbor praiseth not.

Thou must not let thy heart grow cold,
Nor hush each generous tone,
Nor veil the bright love in thine eye,
Thou must not live alone.

When others strive, thou too must help,
And answer when they call;
The power to help God gave to thee
Thou must employ for all.

For the "FRIEND."

Western Yearly Meeting—Conservative.

From a friend who attended the sittings of this body, we learn that two ministers were recorded the past year; and it was encouraging to see the earnest exercise during the various sittings of the Yearly Meeting of their homes. Some of these are endowed with excellent gifts.

The Yearly Meeting convened on Ninth month 6th. But one minister was present from our Yearly Meetings. Enoch and Catherine Carter from Kansas, and Sarah Hallock from New York, were present.

The first service was a favored meeting. The chief business was the reading of epistles from the corresponding bodies and the discussion thereof. It was felt to be a source of much encouragement to note the unity of expression as an evidence of a like travail in spirit in the effort to uphold our ancient principles. A committee was appointed to prepare suitable replies. On Seventh day Albert Maxwell and Nathan Pearson were re-appointed as Clerk and Assistant, and the minutes of the meeting for Sufferings read and approved.

Considerable discussion was had in the Meeting for Sufferings as to the hindrance of the ministry by the changed conditions of travel, which poor ministers are prevented from pursuing by the lack of means for the expenses. It came out in this meeting that religious concerns were often done or not done at all because of a lack of necessary means, but no change was made; but meetings and ministers were urged to greater faithfulness, the meetings and concerned elders to feel after such concerns, and ministers to exercise more faith in the Lord's care over his servants.

Three meetings were held on First day; two at Sugar Grove and one in Plainfield. The two at 10 A. M. and 3 P. M. were largely attended by many more than could get into the house, and were very quiet and orderly. The ministry was largely a testimony to the spirituality of the Christian religion, pointing out clearly that the natural inclination of men is to do something to merit God's approval as rites and ceremonies or even personal service of various sorts, rather than be a devoted worshipper waiting to hear the voice of Christ, who really follow Him in the regeneration.

The queries and answers were read and considered on Second day. They showed Friends generally in unity and engaged so to live as to bear truth. Many exhortations were given, encouraging Friends to carefulness in their manner of life.

On Second day evening, a large company of young people—about 40—were assembled at Albert Maxwell's, as a sort of parting opportunity, where they were mainly entertained with instructions about the history of the doctrines of Friends, and the many ways in which they were needed, and would be beneficial to the world; but a lecture, but an open free discussion, wherein the young people asked questions, and took part more like social converse. A very satisfactory and comforting opportunity, and I might add encouraging, because of the interest the young people seemed to manifest.

Natural History, Science, etc.

The Hen Hawk Deceived.—Our readers may remember a story told some time ago of a woodpecker that was deceived by a tree stump made in stone so perfectly that the bird tried to find worms in it. Here is an account of how a hen-hawk thought he had stolen a fine wood duck, but did not find it very good eating; George Boyd has a collection of birds stuffed and mounted as natural as life. He was looking them over a few days ago to see that moths were not injuring them, and left one, a fine specimen of a wood duck, standing in his back yard while he carried some others into the house. Just as he was coming out of the door again, a hen-hawk swooped down, pounced on the stuffed duck, and bore it away in its talons. The hawk lit on the limb of a dead tree a hundred yards from the house, and proceeded to sample his supposed prize. He stuck his bill into the duck's breast just once, and then dropped it as if it had been red hot, and took wing at railroad speed away from the place. He didn't stop to do any more hunting around that locality, although he had been circling there about for weeks, but kept right on going west until he disappeared in the blue distance, and he hasn't been seen since. But he spoiled the stuffed wood duck.—Selected.

Natural Gas.—Joseph D. Weeks, in the last volume of the United States Geological Survey, on the mineral resources of the United States, states that the total consumption of natural gas in the United States for the year 1889 was 522,150,000,000 cubic feet. The value of the gas, as shown by the returns, was $11,644,858; but estimated as to the amount of fuel it displaced, its value was $21,097,099. Its equivalent in fuel was 10,198,930 tons of coal. At 10 cents per 1,000 cubic feet this enormous amount of gas would represent the very handsome sum of $55,215,000.

For the year 1885, it displaced $3,131,600 tons of coal, valued at $4,857,200; in 1886, 6,453,000 tons of coal, valued at $10,012,000; in 1887, 9,859,000 tons, valued at $15,816,500; in 1888, 14,063,830 tons, valued at $22,629,875; in 1889, 19,198,130 tons, valued at $20,932,059; in 1890, 9,774,417 tons, valued at $18,667,725.

Liquefying Gases.—The liquefaction of gases is a fact of recent knowledge. Until a few years ago oxygen and many other gases were thought to be "permanent" and not capable of liquefaction; but by the combined action of enormous pressures and low temperatures all of them have been changed into the liquid form, and hydrogen—one of the most refractory—has even been frozen to a bluish, metallic looking solid.

Slaver Convicted through a Shark.—"In 1790, the cutter Sparrow brought the brig Nancy into harbor at Kingston, Jamaica, under the suspicion that she was engaged in the slave trade. But, although many circumstances pointed to this fact, no clear proof could be obtained, as the brig had no papers from which the charge could be substantiated. The suspected vessel was therefore discharged; and the day before she left the harbor a man-of-war arrived, bringing some documents which clearly proved her guilt. These papers had been obtained in a 'highly improbable manner.' When cruising off Santo Domingo the crew of the man-of-war had amused themselves by fishing for sharks. One monster was captured and cut up on deck, and in its stomach was found a bundle of ship's papers, the very documents flung overboard by the captain of the Nancy when he was boarded by the Sparrow. Curiosity led the captain of the man-of-war to clean and examine the papers, and the result was that he brought them before the authorities at the nearest port. The unlucky brig was condemned on this romantically acquired evidence."

Cave in Missouri.—Popular Science News states that a cave exceeding in size the celebrated Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, and situated in the Ozark Mountains, near Galena, Mo., has recently been explored for a distance of more than thirty miles. Bones of both recent and prehistoric animals have been found, including the hyena and cave bear. Flint arrow-heads have been picked up on the floor, but no human bones or other relics of man. A few animals of the usual forms found in caves are still living there, including a white newt, bleached by the absence of sunlight from many previous generations.

Celluloid Buttons.—Professor C. Vernon Boys, of England, reports the case of a lady, standing near a bright fire, who suddenly found herself enveloped in smoke. A gentleman who came to her rescue succeeded in crushing the ignited portion of her dress, not, however, without severely burning his hand. On investigation the fire was found to have originated from a spot where a large fancy button had been, but had disappeared. Similar buttons were subsequently examined, and were found to be highly inflammable, being made of celluloid.

Solid Nitrogen.—Crystallized nitrogen is one of the greatest chemical curiosities. By cooling nitrogen gas down to 377 degrees below the freezing point, and then allowing it to expand, solid, snowlike crystals are formed.

Lord Coleridge on Oaths.

A correspondent has been asking Lord Coleridge's opinion on the passage in the Bible where it says, "Swear not at all," and the words of Christ when He said, "Let your communication be yea, yea, and nay, nay;" and has received the following reply:—

"I have no doubt as to the lawfulness of oaths on proper occasions. St. James says they are lawful in express terms, and God (the same yesterday, to-day and forever), swears by Himself. The precept of our Lord is, I think, like giving the cloak as well as the coat, or offering both cheeks to be smitten, or never judging—to be taken as the statement of a principle, not as an order to be obeyed literally, and irrespective of circumstances or the rules of good sense. The whole jurisprudence of every Christian nation for 1900 years has been founded upon oaths, to say nothing of heathen nations whose practice in this respect is never found fault with."

Lord Coleridge is rather unfortunate in his reference to St. James, as we find in the Fifth Chapter of his Epistle, verse 12, the following—"But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by the heaven nor by the earth nor by any other oath, but let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay; that ye fall not under judgment." So it is evident that St. James did not take our Lord's command as a "statement not to be obeyed literally, irrespective of circumstances." But if this unequivocal command of our Saviour is not to be understood literally, then we are left in doubt as to the actual meaning of every word He uttered. Besides, how can we take these words, "But I say unto you swear not at all," as the statement of a principle unless we adopt its evident meaning? According to Lord Coleridge, we are to adopt the principle by ignoring the practice, or by a partial adoption of it, which is surely absurd.

As to the effect of our present system on the public conscience, let any one go into our police or assize courts, and he will agree with the writer that nothing can be more irreverent than the hurried manner in which this most solemn act—as it professes to be—is administered when the witnesses are "sworn." Nor is it possible to believe from the "hard swearing" which often follows when evidence is taken, that the knowledge that the witness is on oath has the least effect upon him.

There is a remarkable passage in the "Journal of George Fox," bearing on oaths, in which he describes a scene at Lancaster Assize Court in 1664, where some magistrates who had previously tendered him the oath, swore that it was on the 11th day of January, whereas afterwards it was proved to have been on the 12th. He says, "The Judge admitted it was a great mistake and an error." Some of the Justices were in a great rage at this, and were ready to go off the bench; they stamped and said, "Who hath done this? somebody hath done it on purpose;" "and a great heat was among them." "Then," said I, "are not the Justices here that have sworn to this indictment, foresworn men in the face of the country?" The sequel was that the indictment broke down, but the Judge immediately tendered him the oath again, and cried, "give him the book," and the Sheriff and Justices cried "give him the book." "I stood still," says he, and said, "if it be a Bible give it me into my hand." "Yes, yes," said the Judge and Justices, "give it him into his hand." So I took it and looked into it and said, "I see it is a Bible; I am glad of it." Then said I, "ye have given me a book here to kiss and to swear on, and this book which ye have given me to kiss, says, 'Kiss the Son;' and the Son says in this book, 'Swear not at all;' and so says also the Apostle James. Now, I say as the book says, and yet ye imprison me for doing as the book bids me? Why don't ye imprison the book?" As I was speaking this to them, and held up the Bible open in my hand to show them the place in the book where Christ forbids swearing, they plucked the book out of my hand again; and the Judge said, "Nay, but we will imprison George Fox." Yet this got abroad over all the country as a by-word, that they gave me a book to swear on that commanded me "not to swear at all;" and that the Bible was at liberty, and I in prison for doing as the Bible said."

When John Howard was travelling in Holland in 1786, he noticed that perjury was not so frequent there as in other countries, owing, he thought, to the solemnity of the administration of oaths; but, he continued, in his account of the Lazarettos, "I could wish from the clearest principles of reason and sound policy that the use of oaths in almost all cases, were abolished, and that the affirmation of the fact should be sufficient; and that he who asserted or affirmed a falsity, should be punished and disgraced as a perjurer."

It appears not to be generally known that by a comparatively recent Act of Parliament any one who has a religious scruple against oaths may make an affirmation. If this were to become general, and if persons convicted of wilful false statements were punished as for perjury, we should be happily rid of much irreverence in our Courts of Justice, due to our present system of administering oaths.

As for Lord Coleridge's contention that God who changes not, swore by himself, we must not forget that God's revelation of himself has always been gradual and progressive, and according as mankind were able to bear it; that He is necessarily often represented by the old Hebrew writers in language which stoops to the comprehension of the people of the time, and that although it is quite true that the ancient Jews were permitted to swear, yet not under the fuller revelation of God's will in Christ, we who believe in Him are distinctly forbidden under any circumstances, to take an oath, in language which cannot by any twisting be made to bear another meaning.—J. Latchmore in the British Friend.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

JOHN G. WHITTIER died at Hampton Falls, N. H., Ninth Month 7th, 1892, aged eight years and eight months.

Our beloved friend had so far recovered from his severe illness of last winter, that in the spring he proposed his usual visit among the mountains and lakes of New Hampshire. But summer approached, and his strength seemed insufficient for so long a journey, he with his cousins Joseph and Gertrude W. Cartland, accepted the invitation of their friend, Sarah Gove, to spend a few weeks at her home, Hampton Falls, a beautiful spot, in the midst of scenes familiar to him in early life, and which suggested "Hampton Beach," "Rivermouth Rocks," and several other poems. Here, in view of the ocean, and his favorite Hampton Meadows, he enjoyed such a rest as he frequently remarked he had not realized for many years. He was able to take short walks daily, and in measure to keep up his reading and writing, and to enjoy the company of his friends.

His last poem, addressed to his friend, Oliver Wendell Holmes, on his eighty-third birthday, was written at Hampton Falls, a few weeks previous to his death.

On Fourth-day, Eighth Month, 31st, he had an attack of illness, similar to what he had often suffered from at this season of the year, which his physicians thought might yield readily to suitable treatment, and on Sixth-day he had far recovered as to look towards returning home the following week, but on Seventh-day morning he had a slight paralytic shock, affecting the right side, and attended with great prostration. His speech became indistinct, and the state of his throat was such that he found great difficulty in taking the necessary nourishment and medicine.

He seemed fully aware of his critical condition, often assuring his friends of his entire resignation and trust that all would be well, referring to their kindness, and tender care, and expressing his "love for all the world."

On First and Second-days his physicians regarded his symptoms a little more favorable, but on Third-day afternoon there was an evident change for the worse, and becoming unconscious, he continued until 4.30 o'clock next morning, the 7th instant, when with much of his loved ones around him, he passed peacefully away.

The funeral was on the 10th instant, at half past two, from his home in Amesbury. The owing item from his will was read on the occasion, "It is my wish that my funeral may be conducted in the plain and quiet way of the Society of Friends, with which I am connected by birthright, and also by a settled conviction of the truth of its principles, and the importance of its testimonies." This request was carried out as fully as the immense crowd would permit. The gathering was under the trees in the garden, and it was estimated that no less than 5000 people, during the day, looked for the last time upon the face of their beloved and honored friend, as he lay in the quiet parlor. Testimonies were borne by several Friends.

The interment was in the family lot in the cemetery overlooking the town of Amherst, beside the graves of all his beloved family, to whom he so touchingly alludes in his poem, "Now bound."

With no attempt at eulogy or to review the work of our dear friend, it is thought that the incidents, connected with the closing hours of his life on earth, may be of interest to readers of THE FRIEND.

Mormonism Flourishing.—Mormons are still busy in London. Brigham Young, Jr., who is a European apostle, sends five hundred converts to Utah, mostly English people, every year. Their principal method of making converts is by the use of public meetings. The London County Council asked to stop them, but after considering the matter refused to do so.

The abolition of polygamy will not destroy Mormonism. It has taken its place among the religions of the earth, but it can never spread extensively in this country by proselyting. The ignorance of English peasantry of the lowest grade is hardly to be conceived by those who have not had the experience of it. The same is true of the Irish and Scotch, but the former are protected from Mormonism in most part by Romanism, and the Protestant Irish are as a class too well educated in Christianity to be caught by Mormonism. Many of the Scotch peasants, we should fancy, would fall an easy prey to a shrewd Mormon teacher. They take a great deal of headway by promising land and a good living, and, like the faith healers, profess to work miracles and to have special influence with the Almighty to aid them in their temporal enterprises. Most of the Mormon leaders, too, are worldly-wise, have a shrewd knowledge of human nature, and no conscientious scruples in its use as other fanatics or hypocrites.—Christian Advocate.

Latin Service in the Established Church of England.—A late paper says: The Convocation of Canterbury opened on Sixth-day last in St. Paul's Cathedral with a ceremony which we have little need to characterize. It was a Latin service—mass, liturgy, sermon, all in Latin. The proceedings were, in our judgment, an utter travesty of Christian worship. An ecclesiasticism which excludes Christ is vain; when it goes to the length of blinding the eyes of men from the great Head of the Church, as this performance did, it is a deadly snare. In word as well as in deed Latinization seems to be advancing in the Church of England. In the midst of it all, we thank God that there are many good and true witnesses alike among ministers and active members of the Church.

Bristol Orphan Houses.—As we have now a great number of vacancies for girls in our five large Orphan houses, erected to receive 2,050 boys and girls who have lost both parents by death, I earnestly request Christian friends kindly to assist me in filling up these vacancies, by seeking out suitable cases for admission into our institution, by letting the relatives or friends of orphan girls know that they may be received at the Ashley Down Orphan Houses, and by advising them to write to me for their admission.

We receive both boys and girls from their earliest days, keep the boys until they are between fourteen and fifteen years of age, when they are apprenticed, and the girls till they are about seventeen years old, when both boys and girls are provided with an outfit, and with suitable situations also. Up to the time that our orphans are sent away from the institution, they are boarded, lodged, clothed, and educated entirely free of all expense to their relatives, and have a most comfortable and happy home.

When I began the orphan work, fifty-seven years ago, there was accommodation in this country for 3,600 orphans only; but since that time, through the blessing of God, which has rested so abundantly upon my labors, such an impetus has been given to orphan work, that institutions have sprung up in various parts of Great Britain, by means of which more than 100,000 orphans can now be provided for; and for this reason it is that we have so many vacancies at the present time, and find it so difficult to fill them up.

I repeat, therefore, that I shall consider it an especial kindness if Christian friends will take the trouble to seek out destitute orphans, and advise the relatives of such to apply to me for their admission, as we have good and abundant accommodation for them, and a large number of efficient helpers.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 1, 1892.

The Editor has received a letter from a Friend in Massachusetts, expressing his opinion that the statement quoted from Addison Coffin in No. 8 of THE FRIEND, under the heading, "Meetings for Worship," is too general in its terms. The letter says:—

"I think the quotation may be misleading to some that may read it, that do not understand the situation in the West. If the writer means to include the whole West—Ohio, Western, Iowa and Kansas Yearly Meetings, the language certainly is too strong. When he says, 'Such a meeting the younger generation in the northwest [of the United States] has not seen, nor could they rightly understand, if seen. Western life has drifted onward, or away from silent meetings.' He makes no exception; hence, if the statement be correct, the young people of the West know nothing of silent meetings. I have no doubt that the writer meant well, but I could not but feel that there are a large number of the younger generation in the far West, as well as elsewhere, that do know and understand how good it is to meet together and sit down in silent waiting before God, and who have not forgotten the injunction, 'Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high.'"

Addison Coffin, we believe, is a member of Indiana Yearly Meeting, and his knowledge of meetings in the northwest has probably been much confined to those of his own Yearly Meeting and of those with which he corresponds—meetings in which, in a general way, what is termed the fast element bears sway, and in which reading the Scriptures, singing and other vocal exercises have taken the place of a reverent drawing near to God in Spirit and seeking ability from Him to perform spiritual worship. His remarks are not applicable to the branches of Ohio Yearly Meeting, which meets at Stillwater, nor to those of the Smaller or Conservative Yearly Meetings of Western, Iowa and Kansas; nor do we suppose they were intended to apply to them.

There are encouraging evidences that the convictions of thoughtful people in the religious world have of latter times been more and more in unison with the doctrines which the Society of Friends has held from its beginning. Some of these evidences have appeared in our columns from time to time, and they are calculated to inspire a hope that the Spirit of the Lord is operating on the hearts of the people, and by his own blessed power leading them in the way they should go. Precious indeed is this assurance to those who have long endeavored to maintain their allegiance to the truths of the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, and who can rejoice in their extension. It reminds one of the noble language of Sarah Grubb, dictated to her friend, Richard Shackleton, when she was suffering from an attack of small-pox, which, a few days later was the instrument of her emancipation from the shackles of mortality. She says:

"My soul, though encompassed with the manifold infirmities of a very afflicted tabernacle, can feelingly worship, and rejoice in nothing more than this, that the Lamb immaculate is still redeeming by his precious blood, out of every kindred, nation, tongue and people, and making a glorious addition to his church triumphant, whose names shall stand eternally in the book of life."

It is natural also, and allowable, that as members of the Society of Friends, we should feel an additional satisfaction when such persons are brought to unite with us in membership, and thus strengthen us in upholding a standard to the world around. Yet here, a caution is needed, lest any, in order to make the way easier, and membership with us more attractive, should be induced to lower that standard, by dropping or softening some of those testimonies which are opposed to a worldly spirit, and which many of our own members do not learn faithfully to conform to, until they come under the government of the Spirit of Christ, and are made willing to bear his yoke.

By making the terms of nominal discipleship more easy, we might largely increase the membership of the Society. But this would do no good to those thus included, nor to the cause which we profess to advocate. Instead of leading them up to the elevated position of religious truth which we occupy, it would be simply extending our enclosure so as to embrace those who are standing on a lower level; and the effect of this, so far as it had any effect at all, might prove to be to settle them at ease, in an imperfect state, and render them heedless of the calls of Grace to a further advancement in the highway of holiness.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—President Harrison has been selected by Brazil and Argentine Republic to arbitrate the question of boundary between the two countries, which has been in dispute for the last three years.

The steamer Kite, with Lieutenant Peary and his wife with the members of the North Greenland Expedition, as well as the Peary Relief Expedition and their valuable collections, reached Philadelphia on Ninth Month 23rd.

An old almanac for 1814 gives the following as the rates of postage prevailing at that time: "For every single letter by land, for forty miles, 8 cents; 90 miles, 10 cents; 150 miles, 12½ cents; 300 miles, 17 cents; 500 miles, 20 cents, and for more than 500 miles, 25 cents. No allowance to be made for intermediate miles. Every double letter is to pay double the said rates; every triple letter, triple; every packet weighing one ounce, at the rate of four single letters each ounce. Every ship letter originally received at an office for delivery, 6 cents. Magazines and pamphlets, not over 50 miles, 1 cent per sheet; over 50 miles and not exceeding 100 miles, 1½ cents per sheet; over 100 miles, 2 cents per sheet."

Advices from various points throughout the cotton belt give discouraging reports upon the condition of the crop. In South Carolina the rainfall has been twelve inches since the first of the month, and this is injuring the cotton not previously hurt by the drought and rust. The crop will be thirty per cent. below the estimate. Rust has attacked the plant in the vicinity of Anniston, Alabama, and the crop is estimated at thirty per cent. below the average yield. In the lowlands of Arkansas the cotton is growing all to stock, and few bolls are forming. From Austin, Texas, the report comes that the army worm and rains have damaged the crop so that scarcely a third of a bale per acre will be picked. Reports from east of the Mississippi River indicate that the crop of cotton will be from ten to twenty-five per cent. below the yield of last year in the various States.

The last act in the troubled granite industry occurred on the 23rd ult., at Barre, Vermont, when representatives of the Union and the Association signed the bill of the prices and agreement, thus ending a bitter and long contest of five months' duration. Men will be set to work rapidly.

On the 20th of Ninth Month, a disastrous fire occurred at Rockaway Beach, Long Island. Nearly one hundred buildings were destroyed, and the property loss is estimated at $800,000. One hundred and sixty acres were burned over.

There was a disastrous passenger wreck on the Pennsylvania Railroad system early on the morning of the 21st ult. On the Ft. Wayne road, not far from Wooster, Ohio, the Chicago express, east bound, collided with a freight train and thirteen persons were killed and eight were injured. Two ladies and several postal clerks were among those who perished in the flames which consumed the wrecked cars.

The same day a passenger train on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad was thrown from the track and four persons were killed and thirty-five injured. The motive for the crime was to secure $1,000,000 in currency in transit from the Mexican Central Railroad to its headquarters in Boston. The robbers broke into a tool house to secure the tools with which to remove the fish plates and spikes. A rail was then taken up. The robbers failed to secure the money, however.

The passengers on the steamship Normannia, in quarantine at New York, have had most of their baggage ruined by the superheated steam used for the purpose of disinfection.

There have been eight deaths from Cholera in the city of New York since the first appearance of the disease. At the present time it is stated that there is not a single case, either in the city or its harbor.

Cholera statistics show the close connection of the disease with liquor drinking. In New Orleans, in 1848, 5,000 drinking men died before one temperance man was touched. In Tiflis, Russia, with 20,000 inhabitants, every drunkard died. A physician said, that of 2,150 cases, who died in twenty-one days, the intemperate were swept away like flies.

Dr. Short reported, in England and Scotland, Asiatic cholera singles out the drinking man with unerring precision, while it leaves the sober man unscathed. In New York city, out of 5,000 members of temperance associations but two died. In Albany, one in 2,500 of temperate people died, and the mortality in the rest of the population was one in sixty. A New York physician said, that if it had not been for the use of spirits in 1848 there would not have been enough cholera to have caused a cessation of business for a single day. In Great Britain it was computed that five-sixths of the deaths were from the ranks of the drinkers. Dr. Adams, of the University of Glasgow, said that the liquor shops were cholera breeders, and if he had his way he would label them, "Cholera sold here." And yet in the directions given by the various health boards to escape the disease, I have not seen one that goes farther than to recommend temperance—not abstinence.

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 408, being 21 more than the previous week, and 19 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 213 were males and 195 females; 101 were under one year of age; 53 died of consumption; 40 of marasmus; 27 of cholera infantum; 27 of diseases of the heart; 27 of diphtheria; 21 of old age; 14 of pneumonia; 13 of typhoid fever; 11 of inflammation of the brain; 10 of Bright's disease; 10 of inanition and 10 of casualties.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, registered, 113½ a 114½; coupon, 114½ a 115½; currency 6's, 107 a 117.

COTTON advanced ¼ ct. under stronger reports from other markets, but trade was quiet on a basis of 7½ cts. for middling uplands.

FEED.—Demand was light, with free offerings of winter bran at $16.00 a $17.00 per ton, as to quality.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.25; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.85; Western winter, clear, $3.40 a $3.75; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.10; winter patent, $4.10 a $4.50; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.25; do., patent, $4.35 a $4.65; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour was in moderate request and steady, at $3.65 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 75½ a 75¾ cts.

No. 2 mixed corn, 52½ a 53½ cts.

No. 2 white oats, 40 a 40½ cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, none here; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3¾ a 4 cts.; culls, 3 a 3½ cts.; fat cows, 2 a 3½ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5¾ cts.; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3¾ a 4 cts.; culls, 2 a 3½ cts. Lambs, 3 a 6½ cts.

HOGS.—Good Western, 7½ a 8 cts.; other Western, 7½ a 7¾ cts.

FOREIGN.—A renewal of disorder in Ireland, accompanying a large increase in the eviction of tenants, has given rise to the general belief that the landlords have been stimulated to demonstrate that John Morley's experiment in suspending coercion is a failure.

"The expected has appeared," says H. L., in the New York Tribune, "at South Leeds, where the Liberal candidate has been returned, but by a diminished majority. It is sufficient, being a trifle under 1000; but at the general election it was as much over 1500." The same writer remarks: "It is a remarkable and scandalous fact that nine-tenths of the magistrates in Ireland belong to the so-called Royalist minority, and that during the long administration of the late Government, not one man in the slightest degree in sympathy with the popular movement was appointed to the judicial bench."

A despatch from Hamburg of the 25th ult., states that there has been a remarkable decrease in the number of cases of cholera. At the present rate the epidemic will soon be declared ended. All types of the disease grow milder daily.

The banks are now specially interested in the Austro-Hungarian conversion toward a gold currency. The gold received by the Austro-Hungarian Bank within the last six weeks amounted to 35,000,000 florins, including 3,500,000 of American eagles. The minting of the new gold coins is about to begin. The Austrian Finance minister will issue a gold loan of 100,000,000 florins for minting purposes. The Hungarian minister announces that that Government is so fully provided with gold for the mint, that it will not ask a loan. It has 15,000,000 florins in gold on hand, with the prospect of receiving 30,000,000 more from the surplus on the financial year.

The Norosti, of St. Petersburg, publishes an article in regard to the mission headed by General Sir Frederick Roberts, who was despatched last month by the Indian Government to meet the Ameer of Afghanistan. The paper says that the mission is calculated to lead to the absorption of Afghanistan by Great Britain, which country will then cut Russia off from the route to the Indian Ocean, and that it is creating a much greater motive for an Anglo-Russian war than did the Pamirs matter.

Russia has sent a note to the Porte, calling its attention to the fact that serious consequences may result from the relations now existing between Turkey and Bulgaria, which Russia holds are contrary to the provisions of existing treaties. The note has caused a great sensation in Turkish official circles.

Gold was recently discovered in Formosa, in the bed of the Kelung river, in connection with the railway works, and immediately gold-washers flocked in hundreds, and eventually in thousands, armed with rough tin-lined perforated troughs, with which they washed out the sandy mud of the river and its banks. The British Consul at Tamsin, who refers to the matter in making his report, heard of coolies making as much as $3 to $4 per day. The comparatively small value of the gold that passed the Custom House, £15,833, probably represents only a tenth of what left the port, as it was a common rumor that every native passenger was taking gold in his luggage, which was not examined by the Custom House.

Particulars have been received at San Francisco by the steamer Belgie, from Yokohama, of a destructive typhoon that swept over the Rinkiu Islands. Near 5000 buildings were either destroyed or damaged, junks were wrecked, and a large number of sailors who are missing are supposed to have been drowned. At a third of the crops have been ruined.

The Mexican Chamber of Deputies, constituting electoral college, has declared Porfiero Diaz President of Mexico for four years from Twelfth Month 1st, n.

The overflow of the Rio Grande River continues to cause great damage at Rio Grande City, Texas, where several hundred acres of land have been added Mexican territory by the river changing its course. Several hundred poor Mexicans living on the lowlands along the river have lost all their stock and crops.

The latest move of the Louisiana Lottery is an attempt to bribe the Hawaiian Government to grant an exclusive franchise for the term of twenty-five years to establish a lottery in Honolulu. A bill was introduced before the Hawaiian legislature, Eighth Month 30, proposing that scheme.

The Secretary of State has been informed by the minister to Guatemala, that the Government of that country has issued a decree, closing absolutely all date (Ninth Month 22nd), all Atlantic ports of that country as a quarantine against cholera.

DIED, at his residence near Monrovia, Ind., WILLIAM AIRY, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, a member and elder of West Union Monthly Meeting of Friends.

About nine years previous to his decease, he was stricken with paralysis. Being of a cheerful, patient and resolute disposition, with the healing of the great Physician, he gradually recovered, so as to be a regular attender of meetings until within the last year, which he was only out occasionally. The mild summons came suddenly, from heart failure, on the 2nd of Seventh Month, 1892. Not only from his consistent life do we believe he has entered into rest, but from many lively expressions dropped from time to time, with the legacy of love to all of every class, and the comforting evidence, that through the mercy of God, in Christ Jesus, he is permitted to inherit one of those mansions prepared for the righteous.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Selections from the Life of Mary Dudley.

She "being dead yet speaketh."—Heb. xi. 4.

From a desire to promote in the hearts of the readers of THE FRIEND, a fresh and increased love for that Holy One, who so marvelously wrought in the mind of Mary Dudley, and who, by the attractive influences of his Holy Spirit, is still visiting young persons, in order to draw them from the allurements of the world and the wages of sin, into conformity with his holy will and into fellowship with Him, the following selections have been undertaken.

May our dear young Friends, especially, seek to profit by her pious, self-denying, consistent example, and to have the pure mind stirred within them, by her lively zeal and diligence; first, in sitting at the feet of Jesus, as Mary of old did, for the knowledge of his will, and then by her filial dedication and faithfulness in performing it. Hereby she was enabled in the obedience which is of faith, to glorify that God who had called her out of darkness into his marvellous light, and also to serve her generation according to his disposal and ordering. May the gifts and talents so responsibly committed to you, be so occupied with, to the dear Redeemer's praise, as that ye, too, may become followers of God as dear children, unto a crown never fading glory in his kingdom.

INTRODUCTION.

As it is declared that "the memory of the just is blessed," and "the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance," it seems to be the duty of those who possess the requisite materials, to select and bring forward such particulars, respecting the lives and characters of pious and devoted individuals, as may tend to instruct and encourage survivors, and exalt the power of divine grace.

My beloved mother did not keep a regular journal; yet when absent from home she mostly transmitted copious details of her engagements, and sometimes made memoranda to which she then mentioned her intention of adding; but frequent attacks of illness, and the occurrence of trying circumstances, combined to frustrate her purpose; so that when not actively engaged in the service of her Lord and Master, the leisure she possessed was seldom accompanied by sufficient ability for much writing. In the following pages, however, her own language has been generally adhered to, although in making extracts, some trifling verbal alterations were found necessary; but great care has been taken to preserve the true sense and import where any small variation seemed expedient. The prosecution of this interesting employment has been attended with a consciousness of inability to do justice to the valuable documents committed to my trust, and the character of my departed parent; both of which are capable of being made extensively useful, had the office of editor been filled by one more competent to perform its duties.

The work is now submitted to the public, with an earnest desire, that one who spent so large a proportion of a lengthened life in seeking to promote the highest interests of her fellow-creatures, may, though dead, continue to speak instructively to the hearts and understandings of those who are alike "called to glory and virtue."

ELIZABETH DUDLEY.

PECKHAM, Eleventh Month, 1824.

MARY DUDLEY was the daughter of Joseph and Mary Stokes, and born in the city of Bristol, the 8th of the Sixth Month, 1750. Being of a delicate constitution, she was, during infancy and childhood, subject to frequent and severe indispositions; yet she was early sent to school, and has often mentioned as a proof of serious thoughtfulness, her love of reading the Holy Scriptures, and that her partiality for the Prophecies of Isaiah was such, as to make her governess repeatedly enquire whether she had not yet got through that book? Being of quick parts, and possessing facility in acquiring knowledge, she made rapid progress in learning; and as she advanced to youth, the vanity which is inherent in the human mind was much fed by the admiration of her relations and acquaintance; yet, even at this early period, she was at times sensible of the humbling visitation of Divine love; and in expressing her solicitude for young people, she has often been heard to say, how highly she should have valued the privilege of Christian counsel and sympathy, under those convictions which were at times counteracted on one hand by incitements to wordly pleasure, and on the other by ridicule for wishing to appear better than her contemporaries! nor were these efforts untried on the part of those whose duty it was to act very differently. The following are her own observations:

— "I am drawn to commemorate the gracious dealings of a merciful Father and Creator in early visiting my mind, which though ignorant of the nature of deep religious feelings, was certainly often impressed with them in the morning of my day; though, from a remarkably lively disposition, I did not yield to that awful fear, at seasons felt, which preserving from the snares of death would have led into a conformity to the Divine will. Being educated in great strictness by my parents, respecting the observance and ceremonies of the worship they professed, (that of the Establishment,) I was a constant attendant upon them from childhood, though with this, allowed to enter into most of the amusements of the world, to which my natural disposition greatly inclined; while in the midst of dissipation I often felt a dissatisfaction, and my mind was visited with something so awful that I appeared to others very grave, and have frequently been laughed at for it. I was fond of reading, and found much pleasure in yielding to it; which, with a turn for poetry, and the intimate acquaintance of several sensible, seriously inclined persons, occupied much of my time from seventeen to eighteen years of age. These circumstances, together with the death of my beloved grandmother, gave a shock to that vanity, in the gratification of which she had much contributed to support me; and a disappointment in an affectionate attachment terminated the attraction to visible objects, so that my mind was like a blank, waiting to be filled up, and prepared for the more extensive reception of the precious visitation, which early in the twentieth year of my life, was sweetly vouchsafed; so that all that was within me bowed in deep prostration, and yielded to the superior power of heavenly love. My mind being in the prepared state above described, it would be unsafe to date this change from the particular period of my attending the Methodist meetings; though in doing so, I certainly felt more of Divine impressions than at any previous season, and particularly when under the ministry of one of their preachers, who seemed commissioned with a message to my mind. I continued to hear him, with many others; attended all the means, as they are called, and was often sweetly affected and comforted; yet even at such times there was something within me craving the purity of an inward, spiritual life—and seeing that without holiness no man could see the Lord, as I did believe was attainable, how did my whole soul breathe for this knowledge to be revealed, and in the depth of silence, struggle that I might rightly seek and experience it. I went into various places of worship among the Dissenters, and was at one time greatly taken with the Baptists; but still found a want, a vacuum unfilled with that good I was thirsting after. Not from conviction, but partly from persuasion, and something in me yielding to the way I thought might easily settle me, I joined the Methodist Society, and also continued constantly to attend the established worship, that of my education; but in the several ceremonies of this, and the different meetings of the other, such as classes, bands, &c., I felt unsatisfied, and often, while others were engaged in attention to the preaching and singing, has my spirit in solemn silence communed with the "Lord my strength," so that I scarcely knew what was passing around me, and even felt disturbed from this inward attraction, when obliged to draw to that spot where the outward elements were prepared for the congregation. Oh! how did I then feel the heavenly mystery, and sweetly partake of the bread of life, so that all forms and shadows fled away, and became no longer of use or efficacy to a mind feeding spiritually on the substance. During these feelings and consequent shakings from all visible things, I often went into Friends' Meetings, and there, especially in silence, did my spirit feed, as it also did in deep awful retiredness, when no eye saw me; but when, by this powerful attraction, hours have passed away, so that my body seemed to do with a very small portion of rest or sleep. I felt like a child clinging to its parent's breast; and in this state covenant was made, which to this hour, I humbly trust has not been forgotten."

Her totally withdrawing herself from those scenes of amusement in which she had dissipated much precious time, brought upon her the ridicule of her young companions, and even the censure of many who were much older though less thoughtful than she was; and the expectation of her again returning to worldly pleasures, was frequently evinced; while both flattery and entreaty were made use of, to counteract that seriousness of demeanor which was deemed so unnecessary at the age of nineteen. The change which she felt it her duty to make, by leaving off ornaments, and wearing such attire as was consistent with her views of Christian simplicity, being very mortifying to some of her nearest connections, she suffered considerably on this account. The peace, however, with which her mind was favored, more than counterbalanced these trials; and strength being mercifully proportioned to the occasion, she was enabled to persevere in the path of obedience, and has frequently been heard to say, that her company soon became as undesirable to her former gay associates, as theirs was to her; while her society and example proved the means of solid advantage to some of her contemporaries, who continued or sought her acquaintance. At this period she frequently recorded her feelings in metrical composition; and the two following pieces are selected, as instructively describing her state of mind.

WRITTEN ON HER TWENTIETH BIRTH-DAY.

Did angels' love or seraphs' glowing fire
My bosom warm, or my glad breast inspire—
With what loud praises would I pierce the skies,
What tuneful incense from my lips should rise.
Yet tho' my pow'rs with no such ardour glow,
The feeble strains of thankful love may flow;
My languid numbers shall a tribute bring,
And humble praise awake the silent string.
While nineteen years their varied seasons roll'd,
How chain'd this captive heart in winter's cold;
Unaw'd by threat'nings and uncharm'd by love,
It still refus'd the quick'ning draught to prove.
Vain the return of ev'ry annual day,
Its call still slighted or neglected lay;
In vain it told me that it gave me birth,
For still it found and left me slave to earth.
Inmur'd in shades of interwoven night,
In Nature's dismal chaos, void of light,
Thus lay enwrapt my pow'rs, till mercy spoke,
And thro' the gloom a ray obedient broke.
Amazing grace! thro' this I still survive,
And boundless love has bid the rebel live;—
Bids me, for once, with joy behold the day
That brought to life this animated clay.
Since Mercy deigns to smile,—hail welcome morn!
Forever solemniz'd be thy return;
On thee let pure devotion ever rise,
And breathe to heaven unsullied sacrifice.

A HYMN.

WRITTEN IN THE TWENTY-FIRST YEAR OF HER AGE.

How shall I tune a trembling lay,
How touch the soften'd string?
Fain would I heav'nly love display,—
The God of mercy sing.

I would,—but Oh! how faint each power,
How far too high the theme;
Come, blessed Spirit, aid restore,
And raise the languid flame!

What wondrous grace! what boundless love!
What soft compassion this,
That calls my rebel heart to prove
A never fading bliss!

Long have I sought the pleasing sound,—
But sought, alas! in vain—
Explor'd in Pleasure's mazy ground,
In Nature's desert plain.

What grace that I am not consum'd,
Not hurl'd to endless night;
Mercy has all her pow'r assum'd,
And yields a cheering light.

'Tis Mercy bids me seek the Lord;
'Tis Mercy bids me fly;
'Tis Mercy speaks the balmy word,
"Repent, thy God is nigh."

'Tis Mercy fills my trembling heart
With agonizing pain,
With keen distress and poignant smart,—
Nor heave these sighs in vain.

The tears that now in torrents flow,
This Mercy will repress;
Remove the load, a pardon show,
And speak a healing peace.

Then let me humbly wait the hour—
The hour of sweet release;
Incessant, saving grace implore,
Incessant pant for peace.

At thy blest feet, my LORD and KING,
Resigned let me lie,
Till the glad peals of triumph ring,
And Faith behold Thee nigh.

Then shall the stammerer's tongue proclaim
The goodness of the LORD;
In grateful strains rehearse his fame,
In hymns his love record.

I'll warble to each list'ning ear
The feeble song of praise;
My sweet employ while trav'ling here,
To lisp Redeeming Grace!
(To be continued.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Edward K. Hobson.

Died, at his residence near Cresline, Cherokee Co., Kansas, on the 16th day of Second Month, 1892, EDWARD K. HOBSON, aged nearly Seventy-two years. He was the son of Edward and Mary Hobson (both deceased). He was an esteemed member and recorded minister of Spring River Monthly Meeting of Friends.

When a young man he had a remarkable visitation of Divine love, was awakened to a fearful sense that he was lost, or in an unsaved condition, should he have to meet death without a Saviour. He earnestly prayed, he said, for pardon and forgiveness for sin, for several days, without finding any access. But when, he said, he fully submitted his own will, and came to the end of his own strength, he came forth, it appeared to him, into a new creation wherein he had new desires and affections, and had unbounded love toward all mankind. Feeling that he was now reconciled to God through the death of his Son, he must yet be saved by his life, he resolved through the aid of Grace Divine to live a Christian life, and be obedient to his Divine Master.

In the nineteenth year of his age he often appeared in the way of the ministry in meetings, to the satisfaction of Friends; his concern was much to exhort the young not to slight the visitations of Divine love, and to walk in the ways of love and peace. He never participated in any of the vanities of the world, that so often tend to corrupt the tender minds of youth.

When he reached manhood he removed from the State of Indiana to the then new State of Iowa, and shared in the hardships and privations incident to the settling of a new country; here he made his home the greater part of the remainder of his life.

In the year 1870 he removed with his family to southeastern Kansas, where he lived the remainder of his life. Through all these later years of his sojourn, the same concern has lived unabated for the spread of the Truth. He was closely attached to the principles and doctrines of the Society of Friends, and was largely gifted to set them forth plainly in testimony. Nine teen months previous to his death, he had a paralytic stroke, which confined him to his room for a few weeks, when he put forth great effort to attend his meeting, which he did frequently five miles distant. His voice had become so weak, that it was with difficulty we could understand his broken sentences. He endured a times great bodily suffering, with great patience and Christian resignation. A short time before his close, he prayed the Lord, that He would grant him patience to endure all his suffering and forgive him all his sins, both of omission and commission, in word, thought and action. And then soon quietly passed away.

The Enchanted Road to Kandy.

BY BISHOP JOHN F. HURST.

Think of a railroad amid the tangled and varied wonders of Ceylon. You are bare, seated, and your train from Columbo for Kandy fairly in motion, before you find yourself rising far above the sea and the housetops of the beautiful Columbo, queen of the Indian Ocean. After passing two or three stations, the train begins a systematic climb, which does not cease for more than three hours. The scenery becomes wider, of deeper tints, and more magnificent. The surprises intoxicate and bewilder. Great boulders lay out on either hand, and hills which grow into mountains, can be counted by the score. But boulders and hills and mountains are all different in Ceylon from those of any other land. The wealth of vegetation which becomes a drapery to all things, gives a entirely new character to every rock, whether standing alone or combined with a mountain chain. Here, for example, is a great, jagged rock, a hundred feet in diameter, scarred and gnashed by the storms and shocks of ages. But the vines have thrust themselves into its deep lines and climbed over its jagged points, and fairly smothered every angle with their delicate and dallying fingers, so that one would think the hard rock was only placed there as a support for a tropic vine.

But this is not all. Shrubs have found the way into the crevices, and pushed their roots deeply down, and now their broad and amp branches flash out over the mossy shoulders, rich scarlet and yellow blossoms as ever borrowed color from the sun near the equator. Even the palms seem to take special pleasure in getting closely up to the rocks, then fling their great fronds right out over the granite.

The palms along this wonderful road are the kings of trees. They are the chief feature, next to the mountains themselves, of the unparalleled landscape. They have the same general truth—long, graceful, slender—but, like men, exhibit amazing differences when one comes examine them minutely. The fronds always tell the story of individuality. You see the alipoti palm, the Areca palm, the Palmyra palm, the coconut palm, the toddy palm, and I know not how many others. Each has its large class of uses, and there is hardly any limit to its applications. Mr. Ferguson says that the Palmyra palm alone can be used for five hundred different purposes. It is the Singhalese resort in all his needs. The coconut palm was just fully ripe as I went to Kandy, and everywhere the natives were eating them. At every station there were vendors of the rich fruit. The coconut, which is yellow when ripe, is partially skinned; and if you buy one, the vendor takes a big knife and cuts off the top. The juice, in one case, flew all over me, as he clipped the top off too rapidly. The nut was full of milk, which, but for its warmth, would have been delicious. The meat was soft, like an apple, and most palatable. The Singhalese, of all classes and conditions were drinking the milk and eating the ripe fruit of the coconut. It seemed as if the thousands had been waiting for the ripening of the fruit, and were now passionately enjoying it. The laborers resting by the roadside, women sitting in the doorways, and children everywhere were eating the new and luscious coconuts. There seemed to be a very craze in the eager way in which all would have them, and seem never to tire of them. Each tree is very prolific, and is highly prized by all who have the good fortune in life to possess one. The man who owns a plantation of cocoa palms is regarded as well-to-do in the world's goods. A thrifty Palmyra palm produces scores of nuts at a single bearing, and, like the orange, some on the same tree are fully ripe long before others. The palms abound everywhere. They run along both sides of the road. They climb well up the mountain sides, and run down into all the valleys. No doorway seems complete without one, to throw down its welcome shade upon all who enter it. No home is too stately or too poor to be without it. It is the cosmopolitan fruit of beautiful and laughing Ceylon. It hugs closely the railway track, grows in plenty far away from any house, bends over the thatched roof of the farmer, as if for protection, lets the gray cattle come and lean against it, and now and then drops its fronds so low down that a child can play with them and swing by them. In some instances they form a vista, like the New Haven elms, and as you drive under them, as we did in one case, they are found to have thrown out their branches to meet one another, and to have interlaced, and to have made so thick a shield that only an occasional fleck of sunshine could be seen on the red and perfect road.

But who will number the whole catalogue of trees that one sees on this single ride of seventy flowery miles? Up on the hillsides the cinchona tree abounds, and is now an important branch of culture. The Singhalese never try any product of the tropics without succeeding in their undertaking. The coffee tree has, almost alone of their sources of revenue, failed them to some extent of late. A fungus has appeared, and so injured the harvest, that, within the last few years, there has been a loss to the coffee planters of about twenty thousand pounds sterling. Several substitutes have been attempted. One of these is the Liberian coffee, introduced from Western Africa. It has been only partially successful, but there is hope that in time it will make some amends for the failure of the Singhalese coffee tree. Now the cinchona tree is one of the substitutes for the coffee. Large tracts of land are planted with it, and many great hillsides are covered with it. In the distance, the cinchona orchard has the appearance of a lemon or orange grove. There is the same deep green, and the trees stand about the same distance apart. The main exception is that the cinchona appears to be a smaller tree. Tea groves also abound here and there, and the plant grows in great luxuriance.

But the favorite plant is rice. It goes by the name of paddy everywhere in Ceylon. Paddy strictly means rice in the green stage. The Singhalese have solved one problem, how to make their rice climb mountains and come down on the other side. Rice must always have abundance of water. The seed must soak in the wet earth, and the green spires must shoot up through the shallow ponds. Ceylon has its lakes and rivers, and it is easy enough so to divert its waters, from the very top of its mountains, that they can be made to irrigate any spot on the whole island, however high the patch of land. Now there is no such thing as irrigating a mountain side in any other way than by terraces. The land must be flat, in order that the water may lie an equal depth everywhere. Hence, the entire side of the mountain is a succession of beautiful terraces. The water comes into the top section or terraced lot, and from that it descends by channels and by an outlet into the one below, and thence into the lower, until the scores and hundreds of beautiful terraces are supplied with water enough to make the rice fairly bound into beauty and a bountiful harvest. These terraced fields are not prepared loosely or irregularly. On the contrary, great care is taken to render the arrangement pleasing to the eye. If a hillside of one hundred acres is to be put in rice, the most careful plan is made to divide it into terraces, and to arrange them in relation to each other, so that when the work is over, and the sowing is done, and the rice is out in its emerald dress, you find yourself gazing upon as beautiful a piece of agricultural art as your eyes ever saw.

There is no release from the sweet bondage of this perfumed and dazzling scene. You are fairly overwhelmed with every new mile you climb in your upward road. At every turn in the way there is something new and strangely fascinating which you had not seen before. You see so much that you never thought of seeing, that you become surfeited with the prospect. I was thoroughly tired when reaching Kandy—not because of the journey itself, but because of Nature's extravagant display of plants and flowers and fruits; your eyes and sensations are overtaxed. Then, where there is neither flower nor fruit, Nature seems to take a special delight in winding wild vines in all possible directions, in making them spring to every branch and rock and get ready for a loftier leap. Many of these vines, when they had exhausted all the supports they could find, just jumped out desperately into the air; and there they hung and waved and nodded their smiles down upon us, as much as to say: "Just give us more trellis, and we would wander out on larger paths into this Elysian air."

We have reached the Kandy station. Here are tall people, the giants of this isle of dreams and history. Neither Dutch, nor French, nor English ever conquered them. Their spears have been very weavers' beams. The English would not be here to-day, with their good rule and even justice, but for the cruelty of the native king, whom the wise natives asked English help to rid them of. The English were waiting to do this thing. There they stayed, and are as firm here as the granite sides of the isle itself. A bandy, or little carriage is waiting for us, to drive us to the Queen's Hotel. Things are reversed here. You see the opposite of what you wait to see. The women do not wear combs, but the men do. So our driver, a pleasing native, has long hair, twisted into a firm knot on the top of his skull, and then kept in position by a fine tortoise-shell comb. He helps us to our seats, and soon we are whirling past the trim houses and beneath the long arms of the welcoming palms of this old, old Singhalese capital.—The Independent.

KANDY, Ceylon.

I OFTEN think that in the present day there is a danger of too much reliance being placed on mere literary knowledge, even by some very goodly people; and it has been very forcibly brought to my remembrance of latter time, the circumstance of these words that Pilate placed above the cross of our Divine Lord,—“This is Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews,” written in Hebrew, Greek and Latin. It no doubt was his intention that the people should read this inscription in their own language, but I believe it has also a deep and spiritual meaning, even as the cross has, on which our Divine Lord was crucified, and that is that human learning should not be placed above the Cross of the Lord Jesus, whom to know is life eternal. If we look over the Society we shall find that the greater part of our most eminent men and women were not very highly educated in human wisdom, but were taught in the school of Christ, for the world by wisdom knows not God, for it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. For you see your calling brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty were called, etc., etc. Therefore I could wish that more attention was paid to the guarded religious education of the children, and not so much about mere human learning. Now by this I do not wish to be understood as being unfavorable to a good liberal education, far from it, for I highly prize it; but let your moderation appear unto all men, for the Lord is at hand—see the last chapter of Philipians.—Extract from a letter of Joseph Snowdon, for several years Superintendent of West-town Boarding School.

“WE received a call this morning from a missionary. Persons are too often educated for the ministry, or for missionaries, with merely general desires to benefit their fellow-creatures, but without letting their exercises mature, so as to assume a specific direction; or, placing themselves under the direction of communities of men who practically disregard individual intimations of duty, they are turned aside from the course that would otherwise have been marked out for them by the Great Head of the Church; and the result is often either total failure or diminished usefulness, and still more frequently interminable cares and perplexities. Besides, in judging of the fitness of an appointment and its accordance with the Divine will, how liable is the mind to be biassed by considerations of a secondary nature, when a man has no other probable means of subsistence, and has a wife and children to maintain. How happy are we as a religious body, in being exempt from such trammels, in having taken the example of the apostles and early believers as our model, and the voice of the true Shepherd and Bishop of souls as our guide.”—G. Washington Walker.

"IF WE KNEW."

If we knew the cares and crosses
Crowding round our neighbor's way,
If we knew the little losses,
Sorely grievous, day by day,
Would we then so often chide him
For his lack of thrift and gain,
Leaving on his heart a shadow,
Leaving on our life a stain?

If we knew the clouds above us
Held hut gentle blessings there,
Would we turn away all trembling
In our blind and weak despair?
Would we shrink from little shadows
Lying on the dewy grass,
While 'tis only birds of Eden
Just in mercy flying past?

If we knew the silent story,
Quivering through the heart of pain,
Would our manhood dare to doom them
Back to haunts of guilt again?
Life had made a tangled crossing,
Joy hath many a break of woe,
And the cheeks, tear-stained and whitest,
This the blessed angels know.

Let us reach into our bosoms
For the key to other lives,
And with love toward erring nature,
Cherish good that still survives.
So that, when our disrobed spirits
Soar to realms of light again,
We may say, "Dear Father, judge us
As we judge our fellow-men."
—Our Own Fireside.

A SMALL MEETING.

There were only two or three of us
Who came to that place of prayer;
Came in the teeth of a driving storm,
But for that we did not care;
Since as we waited upon the Lord,
Though never a word was said,
We felt the Master present there,
And He gave us Living Bread.

His Spirit stirred our longing hearts,
And prayer and praise set free!
We felt his touch as our souls were bowed;
We heard his "Come to Me!"
Nobody saw Him lift the latch,
And none unbarred the door;
But "Peace" was his token to each of us,
And why should we ask for more?

Each of us felt the load of sin
From the weary shoulders fall;
Each of us dropped the load of care,
And the grief that was like a pall;
And over our spirits a blessed calm
Swept in from the Jasper Sea,
And strength was ours for toil and strife,
In the days that were thence to be.

We were only a handful gathered in
To that little place of prayer:
No word was said, no hymns were sung,
But the Lord himself was there:
He came to redeem the pledge He gave,
Wherever his loved ones be;
To stand himself in the midst of them,
Though they count but "two or three."

Then forth we went in the pouring rain,
But our hearts had grown so warm,
It seemed like the pelting of summer flowers
And not the crash of a storm.
"What a time renewing of strength we have had
From the Lord's right hand!" we said;
As we thought how Jesus himself had come
To feed us with Living Bread.

INDIFFERENCE to the pleasure and comfort of others is but the negative side of a supreme concern for our own. Courtesy is a quality which involves some study of other's interests, and some effort to promote those interests. For this effort the selfish man has no inclination. He cares but to please himself.

For "THE FRIEND."

John G. Whittier.

Some letters of the late venerable John G. Whittier, written during the latter years of his life, expressive of his sentiments in regard to the doctrines and testimonies of our religious Society, it is thought, might be interesting and instructive to the readers of THE FRIEND. They were addressed to a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. During the publication of the extracts from the diary of our late valued friend, Ebenezer Worth, about the year 1878, J. G. Whittier became a subscriber to THE FRIEND, which was continued up to the time of his death. The numbers of THE FRIEND in which the extracts appeared previous to his becoming a subscriber, were sent him, which he thus acknowledged:

OAK KNOLL, Danvers, Mass.,
Seventh Month 1st, 1879.

My Dear Friend:—I thank thee for thy note and the copies of THE FRIEND. I quite agree with thee in thinking the Extracts from the Journal of Ebenezer Worth indicate a character of rare unselfishness and practical piety and faithfulness to the Divine Monitor and Guide.

One is glad to get away from the empty noises of self righteous presumption, and contemplate such a beautiful unworldliness; such a close walk with the Divine Master.

I think the papers very valuable, as they furnish a lesson greatly needed at this time of loud profession and irreverent familiarity with Divine things and offensive self-glorification.

Thy friend,

JNO. G. WHITTIER.

After the publication of "Passages from the Life and Writings of George Fox," a copy was sent him; subsequently this letter was received:

BOSTON, Mass., No. 63 Mt. Vernon St.,
Third Mo. 12th, 1882.

Dear Friend:—I am greatly pleased with this condensed Journal of George Fox, and hope it may have a wide circulation, not only in our own religious Society, which at the present time greatly needs to freshen itself at the "Primal Fountain," but also among many outside of our Society, who desire greater spirituality in religion.

Very truly thy friend,

JNO. G. WHITTIER.

AMESBURY, Mass., Sixth Mo. 3rd, 1886.

My Dear Friend:—I thank thee for thy letter and papers relating to Westtown School, where the principles and testimonies of our religious Society have been always maintained.

I am glad to see that the ancient standard of Quakerism is not lowered in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

With us there is much that is trying and discouraging, and indeed in most parts of the country there seems to be a virtual abandonment of the vital doctrines of the (teaching) of the Spirit—as held by our early Friends.

But I believe that that doctrine is yet to prevail in Christendom; and if we as a society prove unworthy to be its standard bearers, there will be found in other sects, those who will take up the "Truth" which we have abandoned, and bear it forward to its final triumph.

I am, very truly, thy obliged friend,

JNO. G. WHITTIER.

Some account of the death and exercises at the funeral of our late valued friend, Morris

Cope, which were published in a local paper, were sent him, accompanied by a letter from a female friend, inquiring why the poem "Isabella of Austria" had not been included in his published works, with an expression of appreciation of some of his later poems, and of esteem and affectionate interest in himself, he thus replied to her. It will be observed from the date, that it was written very near the close of his life.

HAMPTON, New Hampshire
Eighth Mo. 3rd, 1892.

My Dear Friend:—For so I may call thee after thy kind letter.

The poem, "Isabella of Austria," was written more than sixty years ago. It was lost to sight for a long time, but a friend found it in an English paper. In my last edition in 4 vols., I have had it included.

I have read with interest the account of the death and funeral of Morris Cope. He was one of the old school of Friends, and faithfully maintained the great cardinal doctrines of the Society, which so many of its members seem to have entirely lost sight of. It is a painful sight to see whole Yearly Meetings going back to the very things which our early Friends separated from. I am comforted by the belief that the best men of other denominations are drawing nearer to the "Truth" as held by our ancestors; and I know that the falling back of so many of those who still bear our name is greatly regretted by them.

I am spending a few weeks here to avoid company, as my health is feeble.

With much love and unity I am thine and thy husband's friend,

JNO. G. WHITTIER.

For "THE FRIEND."

The following is a short account of George D. Reid, who was drafted in the time of the Civil War in the United States, taken from his home in West Brandywine Township, Chester County, Pa., and taken to West Chester, and from thence sent as prisoner to the barracks at Twenty-second and Wood Street, Philadelphia where he was confined. After remaining there some weeks, in expectation of being sent south to the army at Morris Island, South Carolina as some were sent while he was there. Friend in Philadelphia being informed of the circumstance interested themselves in the case, and by applying to the authorities at Washington, he was released by an order from there.

A few extracts from letters that he sent to his sisters when confined a prisoner shows little the state of his mind with the prospect before him.

TWENTY-SECOND AND WOOD ST. BARRACK
Eleventh Month 12th.

Having a little time, would employ it in giving you some idea of my place of confinement. The room is about thirty feet wide by about one and sixty feet long, and no employment; and each day may be the last for a number here, as we are liable to be sent away on short notice. Time appears long, but patience is the only thing, and grace that is requisite to keep up the spirits in such a place. The reason that I write to-day, is because to-morrow they may move some of us off, but we cannot tell for they hold things in their own hands; they do, it makes such confusion that it is hardly possible to know who is to go till called. This war appears to be a business that some are looking after the money and the offices that are attached to it; such are not considering the es that are being sacrificed, and the distress, caused in families by forcing men away who oftentimes the only support. A case of the kind occurred this morning, with the officers at Colonel's office. None were allowed without permission in the barracks, and my mother, going to see me, had to have a guard through the streets, as being under military rule. There were two women there that were complaining bitterly, and no doubt true what they said. They had no money to support their families, their husbands taken and no provision made for families which have to suffer. There is a man here in about the last stage of consumption, with only the bare boards for his bed. He has been drafted nearly three months. What pity for him to be lying here, when he might be better cared for at home. He appears very patient, though sick, in such a place, and the company that are around, with the profane language used; but the officers appear to care, and a life is not much thought of in time of war by many as may be seen by many in captivity here. But there is a day of recompense to come, and blessed it may be for them who are found trying to do right. I am satisfied with what Friends are trying to do in my case, whether they succeed or not. As to-morrow will be Quarterly Meeting, how I wish I could be with you, a much better place than I am amongst so much profanity. The only thing here is in the secret of the soul with Almighty; that is the way I hope it is with me. I have to keep myself as it were alone, as there is no place here for a Friend. Your letter informed me that David Cope was at Quarterly Meeting. I believe he is a good man, and if he were of his principles this horrible war would not be going on, wasting human life. It is now three First-days since I was taken from home and confined here, and the scenes acted I could scarcely believe, had I not witnessed some of them; and though trying, it is better than being sent to join the army, as they are sent from here to do. So, 'tis cause for thankfulness that I am so far preserved from this scene of oaths, drinking liquor, and fighting, among those here confined, though all alike. There is a boy here that is a substitute from Luzerne County, sixteen years of age, that I feel an interest in. He sleeps with me and I share what is sent to me with him. He appears a quiet person, and susceptible of religious improvement; but to think of the mess that he has enlisted in to kill his fellow-man. But I hope the Almighty may protect him. But what kind of protection can we expect when we go voluntarily into it; for it is said that the Almighty is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and whether in individuals or nations, the judgment is certain, though it may tarry long in mercy, giving time for repentance. My letters are not well connected will have been excused, as 'tis almost impossible to write in such a place. Thinking you would like to know how I got along at night with sleeping—no beds there—thirteen sleeping places capable of holding sixteen persons, eight with the same number above, in each room, and three rooms with not anything but boards to sleep on, and the clothes you provide for the covering; but how must those fare who are sent away to the army? The longer I am detained here, the more I feel the evils of war. May He who holds all things in his holy hands bring it to a close, and that chastisements are permitted to overtake nations for the sins of the people, and those who are opposed to war often suffer.

Through Friends' influence with the authorities at Washington I was discharged from the confinement in the barracks and returned to my peaceful and quiet home, after my long absence, and can enjoy it the more, and it is a sign of my Heavenly Father's mercies to a poor unworthy creature as I am. It is not of any good of ourselves that we are saved, but through and by his mercies alone who gave himself for us. How many if they had the opportunities that I have had, how different they might have been; but they must go as they see no way of escape. We, who see different, should feel for and pity them; and may the Lord open their eyes so that they may see clearly the things that do belong to their everlasting peace, for war is one source of the wickedness and the misery that are in the world.

After a life of usefulness and a short illness, he departed this life peacefully on the evening of Third Month 9th, 1886, in the fifty-second year of his age.

Works of a Benevolent and Religious Character.

A thoughtful reader of modern religious literature, can scarcely fail to be struck with the prominent position and great importance which the authors generally assign to active participation in works of a benevolent or religious character. In many cases it is made the test of a growth in grace and flourishing vitality, as regards both congregations and individuals.

The idea of discriminating as to the preparation for usefulness, the gifts conferred on different individuals; or the no less important considerations—whether there is any gift at all—or whether the individual is called and qualified by the only adequate authority, the Divine Head of the church, to engage in such activity, seem to be much overlooked. The great aim appears to be to set all to work who are willing, and to represent such work as promoting religion, and as proper and necessary to it.

In a well ordered family, there are services allotted to each member, to be performed in the prescribed time and way, and all regulated and controlled by the will of the ruler of the household. If each member should assume to choose his own work, and to engage in it when and as he pleased, whether qualified or not, it is easy to see that confusion and disorder would be the consequence, and probably no little injury be done.

Christ's church is no less under his government and bidding than is such a family under that of its head, and each member of it can only be rightly employed as he is filling the station, and performing the service assigned him by the heavenly Head and husband. Those who thrust themselves unbidden into religious activity, however great the extent and variety of their performances, or however they may be applauded for their usefulness and self-sacrifice, are in danger of being met by the query, "Who hath required this at your hands?"

In the warmth of natural emotion, from feelings of sympathy and kindness, or from a desire to do good, persons may engage in works ostensibly religious, and evince much devotedness and perseverance in them, and yet there may be no religious obligation or principle involved in the matter, and they may be wholly beside the proper business of the individuals employed in them. The effort may be the mere prompting of the natural mind. Desirous of doing something which bears a religious aspect, and which will commend them to themselves and to others as religious persons, they may "kindle a fire of their own, compass themselves about with its sparks, and walk in the heat and light of the fire they have kindled" and yet there may be nothing in all the zeal and activity to shield them from the sentence, "This shall ye have of mine hand—ye shall lie down in sorrow." External performances may be very correctly gone through by those whose hearts have never been changed. They may assume to instruct others in religion, when they have never learned of Christ themselves, or are even disobedient to his requirements. Hence the impropriety of making such things a test of religion, for it settles persons at ease in the idea of their having attained, when they need to be taught the very first lessons in Christian knowledge.

Far be it from us to discourage even the least child from the discharge of any duty assigned it by the Head of the church. We would rather have all incited to faithfulness in all the Divine requisitions, even to the smallest particular. But let it ever be borne in mind that religion is an inward work; a work of the heart, and not of the head; and that to live and walk in the Spirit, with Christ, comprehends its essence. There may be great danger of turning from this inward work, which is crucifying to self, and attended with many humiliations and mortifications; and substituting for it the more easy routine of specious religious activity, and thus suffering great loss; becoming lean and dwarfish in a spiritual sense, instead of growing in grace and daily waiting on the Lord, and inwardly watching against sin, so as to be perfecting holiness in his fear.

There is room in the church for the exercise of every gift, which the Holy Head of it sees meet to dispense to his servants, and there is no shortness or stinting on his part. What is wanting is humble submission to those fiery baptisms which purify the soul, and prepare it for the reception of the Lord's gifts. Where these baptisms are patiently endured, until the times are fulfilled, and the period for being shown unto Israel is fully come, then "a man's gift maketh room for him," whatever that gift may be; and a door of usefulness in the church is opened to him, under the leading and government of the great Giver, who will always help every obedient servant to occupy the gift profitably and acceptably in his fear.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Zebras.—Galton observed that in the bright starlight of an African night, zebras are practically invisible even at a short distance, though their peculiar striped appearance is of decided protective value in the daytime. Schönland writes to Nature from South Africa that, in a recent zebra hunt, several members of his party commented on the difficulty of seeing zebras even at moderate distances although there was nothing to hide them, "the black and white stripes blending so completely that the animals assume by day a dull brown appearance quite in harmony with the general color of the locality in which they are found." A hunter saw a wounded zebra which he mistook for a big baboon, writing: "It galloped like a baboon from me, and I could only see that the color was grayish-brown." When the zebra stops, its stripes are, of course, easily seen; but when galloping the stripes blend, and the animal looks as if dull brown.

Prickly Pears.—Prickly pears grow so rapidly and spread so widely in South Africa that the British colonists think them a great nuisance. They applied to the Foreign Office for instruction as to the best way of suppressing them.

Great Britain puts the world under tribute for ideas. The Foreign Office sent to the British Legation in Mexico, where the prickly pear is said to be of the same kind. The Mexicans sent word that they do not try to suppress it; that the spines can be burnt off, and that cattle then work and thrive on the pear; that sheep love it and grow fat, requiring little or no water. Hundreds of thousands of goats live on nothing else. The dry leaves supply fuel for the camp; the young shoots make good soup, pickle, and salad; the sap makes excellent size and glue; the leaves make an invaluable poultice for wounds and rheumatism. Wine is made from the fruit; The juice when boiled makes a pleasant sweet, and the fruit a most delicious preserve.

What an illustration this of how to make the best of everything. It would be good for many persons if, instead of groaning under obstacles and impediments, they would make them a subject of study, and occupy themselves in trying to extract something to advantage. "Afflictive Providences" would then often prove the greatest blessings.—Selected.

Effect of Leaves on Fruit.—It has been the practice of vintagers in the Old World to take off nearly one-fourth the leaves when the grapes are ripening, under the impression that sun and air aid the ripening, or sugar-producing process, and some imitators of these Old World practices are found in American vineyards. A French experimenter, Muntz, has published in Comptes Rendus the results of careful testing during the last year, and finds the reverse to be the fact. There is less sugar in grapes from vines defoliated than from vines with an abundance of healthy foliage. The change of starch to sugar is not so much a chemical process in which the sun or light plays a direct part, as a vital process which requires an abundance of healthy leaves to carry on properly.

A Wonderful Magnet.—Probably the largest and strongest magnet in the world is that at Willett's Point, New York. It came to be made by accident. Major King happened to see two large fifteen-inch Dahlgren guns lying unused side by side on the dock.

He immediately conceived the idea that a magnet of enormous power could be constructed by means of these cannon, with sub-marine cable wound around them.

"The magnet, which stands about ten feet from the ground, is eighteen feet long, and has eight miles of cable wound about the upper part of the guns. It takes a force of twenty-five thousand pounds to pull off the armature. A crowbar applied to the magnet required the combined force of four strong men to tear it away. A seemingly impossible experiment was performed with some fifteen-inch cannon balls. They were solid, and as much as a strong man could lift; yet the magnet held several of them suspended in the air, one under the other.

"The most interesting experiment was the test made of a non-magnetic watch. Ever since the great railroads of the country have compelled their employees to provide themselves with time-pieces that would not be affected by the magnetism generated by the car tracks, there has been much speculation as to whether such a watch could be made, and a sharp rivalry has been going on between the American and Swiss manufacturers. The test was highly satisfactory. The magnet was so powerful that an ordinary watch was stopped stock still as soon as it came within three feet of it, while an American non-magnetic watch was for ten minutes held in front of the magnet, and it did not vary the hundredth part of a second.

"An amusing experiment was made with a sledge-hammer. When one tried to wield it in a direction opposite to the magnet, he felt as though he were trying to hit a blow with a long feather in a gale of wind."—Selected.

Sleeplessness.—A lady who had been unable to sleep save at very short intervals, and then not soundly, was advised to try the following: Choose a spot of ground not too sunny, but perfectly dry, spread on it a comfortable or thin mattress, have a pillow, and with the eyes shaded from the light lie down and stay there till sleep comes. She did as advised. After lying on the ground for a while she found sleep creeping gradually over her, and a feeling of rest came over her to which she had long been a stranger. Every day, every clear day, she lay upon the ground thus for several hours, almost always falling into deep and refreshing slumber. Thus her habit of sleeplessness was broken up and she regained a degree of health that she had long been a stranger to.

The old fable of Hercules and Antæus has a great deal of truth in it. When we touch Mother Earth she strengthens us. She pours her magnetism around us and into us until we grow strong and stronger. If you have a feeble, sickly child, mother, let it play in the dirt, sitting on the ground, and dressed for its play; or, if you are averse to dirt, have a load of clean sand drawn into the back yard and let the child sit in the sand on the ground and play in it. You will be surprised and delighted with the result.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Extracts from G. W. Walker's Travels in South Africa.

We proceeded to Clumber, in Cape Colony, South Africa, calling on William Gradewell and Richard Hulley, two industrious settlers, who are bringing up their children with regard to an inheritance that is enduring. The last mentioned, with much simplicity, related the following circumstance in his own experience.

He had been with a convivial party, not being at that time an awakened character, and had given way to excesses. Going shortly after to obtain some honey for a sick acquaintance, he climbed a tree in which was a bee's nest, and a branch gave way with him, so that he was precipitated to the ground. Two of his ribs were broken, and he was otherwise much injured, so as to bring on high fever, and ultimately tetanus or lockjaw. He was lying on his bed one night, having been for nearly a fortnight without sleep, and fully anticipating death to be very near, when his mind became awfully impressed with the danger he was in, both as regarded soul and body, feeling assured that if he died in no better condition, his soul would be lost forever. Under deep convictions for sin, he contrived to roll himself out of bed, and getting upon his knees, prayed to God in an agony of distress, to look down upon him in mercy. While thus engaged he thought a voice spoke intelligibly to his spiritual ear, saying, Persevere; and as he maintained for some time this earnest exercise before the Lord, he felt himself cured of his lockjaw and of his injuries. Overcome with joy and hardly daring to believe his senses, he turned himself round and round, and felt his ribs with his hands until assured that he was effectually healed when he again got into bed, and with a heart overflowing with gratitude and the tears streaming down his cheeks, lay praising God, who by his wonderful power had wrought such a deliverance. All this time he remained under great excitement, and had no disposition to sleep, but as he was looking to the Lord and praising him for his mercy, the same voice that had before spoken to him inciting him to persevere in prayer, now sounded in his ears the words, Peace be still; upon which he felt a capacity to stay his mind in quietness and reverent thankfulness upon God, and fell into a sound sleep which lasted till morning. On awaking he arose, dressed himself, and went about his usual avocations in perfect health, and with mind renewed and changed, determining therefore that he would serve his Redeemer with righteousness; and from that period he maintained a consistent Christian course."

In a journey from Grigua Town to the Kuruman, distant one hundred and twenty miles, 1830, G. W. Walker writes:

"Near to this place, Roger Edwards, one of the missionaries at the Kuruman, had rather a serious adventure with lions. He was on a journey from the Colony, whither he had been on a visit of business, and wishing to rejoice his family, had pushed on in the night. Just as the moon was descending below the horizon, suddenly concluded to stop. He was attended by a single Hottentot, who, in addition to the horses they rode, led a mare, which had a foal that ran by her side. On alighting, they placed their saddles under a bush, and knee-halted the horses, turned them adrift to feed. As Edwards lay down on the ground to rest, he became very uneasy in his mind, and could not divest himself of an impression that danger was near. Nevertheless, after committing his soul and his companion to the protection of the Almighty, he sought repose; but sleep fled from his eyes. In this wakeful state, with his attention peculiarly alive to any interruption of profound silence that reigned in this region of profound solitude, he heard the scream of the horses; and presently he heard the roar of a lion. At the same moment the horses approached, fleeing in the direction of the bush where he and his attendant were resting, until within a short distance of the spot, they turned off along the main road toward the Kuruman, with the lions closely in pursuit. Roger Edwards looking earnestly in the direction of the moon's last receding rays, saw distinctly a large lion at but a short distance, and as if it were dubious whether to follow his companions after the horses, or to come forward to where human prey awaited it. The missionary literally quaked for fear, being ready to throw himself up for lost, for he had no human aid of defence, but he cried in secret unto the Lord. To his great relief the lion presently turned to after its fellows. Overcome with fatigue, travellers, in spite of their fears, fell asleep under the bush, where they reposed unmolested until the break of day. They then traced the footsteps of the horses along their homewards. It appeared from the spoor of the lions that five of them had been in pursuit. The two horses made their escape without being injured; but the mare fell a prey to the lion, and the foal keeping by its mother, as posed, received a wound in its neck, but it got clear off, and survived its rough treatment.

The day was spent in reading with our e, and in waiting upon the Most High. e thus employed, my mind was peculiarly ole of Divine consolation, the Lord being to be unspeakably precious. Yet the view of own vileness, misery and need, in myself, f Him who is our life, made my eyes run with tears of deep humiliation. How emphatically true it is, that we 'are saved by e, through faith, and that not of ourselves, e the gift of God, not of works, lest any man d boast.' Yet are we 'God's workmanship, ed in Christ Jesus unto good works, which hath before ordained that we should walk tem.' Good works are easy and natural, so eak, to that new creature which is of God's ion; they are therefore not man's own s, nor is the glory of them due to him, but od, who worketh in man to will and to do s own good pleasure. Sin only is natural an in his fallen and unrenewed state; fore guilt and shame are his only portion nself."

Horse Sickness in South Africa.

The horse sickness in South Africa causes heavy loss that I am tempted to dwell on subject. Most of authorities are of opinion t is useless to purchase horses for African eys, unless they are what is termed "salted," s, have had and have recovered from the ess. Such horses, however, are, for the e part, sorry, wretched steeds, without a e, with very inferior strength. They by eans enjoy perfect immunity from further s of sickness. Large prices, moreover, ing from £50 upward, are asked for them. r Giles resolved to ascertain whether by e and constant care he could not, at least eason of the year, preserve his horses from ickness. He had to encounter a great of derision from persons of all sorts of ience, who freely prophesied he would not e a horse alive to Tuli. Mr. McKay, who e took the charge of the horses, gave the ing details of his management: First, the e are never watered before 11 A. M. or e 3 P. M. This precaution is adopted against vils occasioned by the morning and eve- e dews, at times and in certain places very e. Secondly, when outspanned, the horses e covered with a horse rug, buckling over the e and with a blanket rug, doubled, coming e back over the loins. At sundown the e are fed in nosebags, the bottoms of which e been carefully tarred. Three times a e each horse has its nostrils slightly tarred e, once a week a tonic dose is administered e, composed of about two wine-glasses of e with enough quinine to cover a shilling, e diled up, mixed with the gin. Further in e with an evil reputation for horse sick- e, the horses were never allowed to go to the e or other water; buckets of water were eht to the camp and allowed to stand for e or more in the sun, and then slightly e d by mixing warm water. The great and e pal precaution is that some trustworthy e should daily see that the grooms carry e these regulations conscientiously. A few e neglect destroys the effect of all the e ef days and weeks. I admit that many per- e assert that all precautions against horse sick- e are unavailing, and that we were favored by singular luck which could not be expected to follow us long.

On the 3rd of Sixth Month one of the mules was attacked by the dreaded "horse" sickness, and was dead in three hours. This sickness is well known in South Africa. It attacks horses and mules suddenly, but donkeys are exempt. An animal is quite well up to a certain time, in fact, it may be in rather better fettle than usual, when suddenly it appears unwell. It ceases to work and becomes very tottery. In a few minutes it is noticed to be breathing hard, and its nostrils working are evidences of great distress. Almost at the same time a discharge of mucous appears at the nostrils, which presently becomes very profuse. The distress increases, and in a few hours the animal, becoming weaker and weaker, and more and more distressed in its breathing, falls down and dies. Post-mortem shows general congestion of the internal organs, especially of the lungs. All kinds of remedies have been tried, and have failed. In the case of our mule, half a bottle of gin and a large tablespoonful of quinine were at once administered, and this seemed to revive it for a time; but soon the weakness came on again, and the animal died. — Men Mines and Animals in South Africa.

Affirmations vs. Oaths.—The recent opening of Parliament was characterized by one fact indicating the marked change which, scarcely noticed, has come over England. Not less than eighteen members availed themselves of the privilege for which Bradlough fought so long and so persistently, and made affirmation instead of taking the oath. Among them were John Burns, the labor leader, Naoroji, the Indian member, Caine and Jacob Bright. In such marked contrast was their procedure to that of the groups of five, who, Testaments in hand, hurried through the form of oath, that The Christian World says:

"It will be well for religion and for decency when there is no needless formal appeal to the Almighty at all, but when the Member's solemn affirmation of allegiance will be all that is required."

Avoid Evil Communications.—He who utters a wanton suggestion to corrupt the innocence of chastity, may set fire to passion that cannot be quenched. The loan of a pernicious book, the insinuation of an infidel thought, the repetition of an unclean story, the irreverent use of God's Word, is often fraught with undreamed-of mischief. Beware how you play with the fire of wicked suggestions that may kindle a flame of sin in a fellow-creature's heart! For it will not be in your power to "make restitution," and in the day of final reckoning you will be called to answer the question, "Who kindled that fire?" — T. L. Cuyler in The Independent.

Presence of Mind.—Our Annual Friend relates the following anecdote: While officer Regan, of the "Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals," was patrolling in the vicinity of One Hundred and Thirty-eighth Street and the Harlem River, he was informed by a car driver that a horse had fallen into the river and was gradually sinking down into the mud. Hastening to the spot, Regan found the horse almost buried up to his neck. To rescue the animal alive would require prompt and intelligent action.

The part of the river where the accident occurred is being filled in, and the horse fell into the water at a point where the edge of the river joined the mud-bank. In its struggle to escape from drowning, the horse swam toward the treacherous earth, and in a few minutes was unable to move. It was as much as a man's life was worth to attempt to reach it, as there was no water in which to row a boat, and the mud was too soft to bear a man's weight. All hope of rescuing the horse had been abandoned, and a hundred spectators were helplessly waiting to see it die a most horrible death.

The Society's officer was greeted with cries of "Too late," "Never at hand when wanted," etc. Paying no attention to the jeers of the crowd, Regan got a single line, about two hundred feet long, fastened one end to the bow of a flat-bottomed boat, and passed the other to some laborers on the bank. Taking with him another strong rope about four hundred feet long, he got into a boat and directed the men to haul on the rope. At a glance the officer's scheme for the rescue of the horse was apparent, and the jeering crowd of idle spectators instantly became a corps of active and willing assistants to aid the officer in his intelligent and practical efforts to save the half-smothered horse. The men on the bank hauled the boat over the slippery mud to the side of the horse. Regan passed the rope he had taken with him around the body of the animal, made it fast in front, and gave the signal to pull him back to the river. Every man who could find a hand-hold on the rope began to pull, but all in vain; the mud held its victim immovable. "Keep a tight hold on the rope, men," cried Regan; "don't let him sink; we'll get him out yet;" and he started on a run toward the river. It seemed to the crowd as if their leader was going to desert them. But no; he was seeking more powerful assistance.

The captain of a tug-boat, on his way down stream, had stopped his vessel to watch what was going on. Regan shouted to him, "Captain, give us a pull?" "All right, with pleasure," was the hearty response. Soon the little steamer was got into position and the end of the rope was passed from the shore to the vessel. The signal was given to the engineer to go ahead slowly. The rope tightened, the mud-bank around the imprisoned animal began to open, and soon, amid the cheers of more than a thousand spectators, the helpless creature was towed into deep water and was assisted by willing hands to reach terra firma.

Tolerance.—"Other people than Auld Lights may be saved, but it will take them all their time." This saying, which the Scotch humorist puts into the mouth of a good but narrow woman, expresses very keenly the measure to which modern toleration often extends. We are not willing to say that there is no salvation outside our church, but we believe that those who are inside it will have an easier time in getting to heaven than their neighbors. But in truth it will "take us all our time," whatever the road we go by. There are no easier terms than the strait gate and the narrow way for the best circumstanced of us. No less than a surrender of the whole life will God take at our hands. — Selected.

The One Thing Needful.—"We must do such and such things," say some. Yes, possibly, you must, if you are determined at all costs to live, to be prosperous, to grow rich; but there is no must at all if you are determined at all costs to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. * * * I say it feeling the extreme difficulty of speaking to men who are often exposed to great temptations, but I say it with deep conviction: it is always possible that the true man and the good will have to be ruined, and it is always necessary that the true man and the good prefer ruin to one slight deviation from the path of simple truth and righteousness.

Such words are in the spirit of the men who said, "Whether it be right in the sight of God to obey men rather than God, judge ye." Our religion needs to be tested, our faith needs trial in order that it may be refined; and let not the Christian imagine that he is at liberty to bow to every storm, to shirk every conflict, and to conform to doubtful practices because they are the custom of the world. — Selected.

"HAPPY am I, for what I do I like!" But so doth the beast. Shall this, then, be thine end, to do no better than the beast? To do better, thou must do without murmur, not what thou wouldst, but what thou shouldst.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A dispatch from Washington, dated Ninth Month 29th, mentions that "The two vessels for whose construction proposals were issued yesterday by the Navy Department will make an important addition to our naval fleet. In armor, armament and equipment these two proposed ships will equal, if not surpass, any ships of a similar type in existence. Their fighting powers will be of the first order, and their great speed will enable them to run away from a ship superior to them in fighting ability. Fully equipped and ready for commission the two ships proposed to be built will cost in the neighborhood of $8,000,000." If $8,000,000 were expended in "redeeming the human mind from error," there would "be no need for arsenals and forts;" or for war ships either, by our Government.

Postmaster General Wanamaker has signed a contract for the new issue of what will be known as the Columbian series of postage stamps. The stamp will be of the same height as the present issue, but will be twice the width, and the illustrations will include various scenes connected with Columbus' voyage and discovery. The new stamps will be ready about the first day of next year.

The whaling steamer Mary Hume has just arrived at San Francisco after an absence of two and a half years. She had been given up for lost. The vessel spent two winters in the ice, and only six of her crew survived. Her catch, however, represents a value of $400,000.

Buffalo capitalists will build a large tower and observatory at Niagara Falls for the benefit of sight-seers. It will be 250 feet high, and will be ready by next spring.

The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1891 gave the number of cigars manufactured in the United States and withdrawn tax-paid as 4,474,892,767; the number of cigarettes as 2,684,538,760. The number of pounds of manufactured tobacco was 243,505,848, and the number of pounds of snuff was 10,390,194. If cigars be estimated to have sold at the average price of five cents apiece, cigarettes at one cent apiece and snuff and tobacco at fifty cents a pound, the retail tobacco bill would be $377,538,046.95.

There have been but two years since 1875 (namely, 1883-4) which have shown as large an amount per capita of distilled spirits "withdrawn for consumption" as in the year ending Sixth Mo. 30, 1892. In the same time the increase of fermented liquors consumed has risen steadily from 6.71 gallons per capita in 1875 to 15.28 gallons per capita in 1892.

On the 30th ult. five members of the strikers' Advisory Committee were arrested at Homestead, charged with the crime of treason against the Commonwealth. The informations were made by County Detective Beltzhoover before Chief Justice Paxson, of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, against thirty members of the Advisory Committee. The prisoners were taken to Pittsburgh. This is said to be the first time in the history of the State that any resident has been charged with treason against the State. The penalty is twelve years' imprisonment.

On the 2nd inst. three young women who have been in the New York Training School for Deaconesses for the past two years, were ordained Deaconesses by Bishop Potter, at Grace Church, New York. Their work will be among the East Side tenement houses.

Work at the granite quarries at Westerly, Rhode Island, was resumed on the 3rd inst., the agreement between the manufacturers and cutters having been signed on the 1st inst.

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 413, being 5 more than the previous week, and 73 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 203 were males and 210 females; 43 died of consumption; 41 of diphtheria; 37 of diseases of the heart; 32 of marasmus; 29 of pneumonia; 26 of cholera infantum; 14 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of convulsions; 12 of old age; 11 of casualties; 11 of apoplexy; 11 of typhoid fever and 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; medium, 4½ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4 cts.; culls, 2 a 3½ cts. Lambs, 3 a 6½ cts.

HOGS.—Good Western, 8 a 8½ cts.; other Western, 7¾ a 7¾ cts.

FOREIGN.—Stuart Knill was elected Lord Mayor of London on Ninth Month 29th. Strenuous opposition was made on account of Knill being a Roman Catholic.

Welsh newspapers declare that Gladstone has invited an eminent Welsh ecclesiastic to draft a bill to disestablish the Church in Wales. They add that the bill will be prepared in a manner that will be acceptable to the Welsh clergy.

In the financial columns of the English press it is declared that the manufacture of tin-plate in the United States, after a trial of twenty-one months, does not equal two per cent. of the amount required there. It is a firmly settled belief on this side of the Atlantic that there is no tin on the other side, and that even the McKinley tariff is unable to create it.

There is a deep and widespread excitement in North-western England, says the New York Sun, over the approaching strike of the Lancashire cotton operatives. That a gigantic strike will occur is certain. The relations between the master cotton spinners and the operatives are at severe tension, and a settlement of the pending difficulties appears out of the question. The masters see no relief from the gloomy situation but a reduction of wages, and the operatives retort with a demand for a reduction of hours. The cotton trade of Lancashire, according to competent observers, is becoming increasingly perilous, and there is no apparent prospect that conditions will improve, even in the distant future. The Manchester Courier warns the masters and the men, that should a strike occur, both parties would suffer acutely, and the cotton manufacturing trade will probably be seized by competitors and lost forever and irretrievably to Great Britain. The Manchester paper therefore urges both sides to aim at an amicable arrangement. It believes that the present difficulty could be obviated by the federated masters making all the mill-owners agree to short time. These papers speak with an earnestness that no more than echoes the deep-felt anxiety of the public on the question at issue in Lancashire.

A despatch from Marseilles, on the 27th ult., says: Herr Liebknecht, in an interview to-day said the German Socialists were strongly opposed to the German military law; that Germany was dying of militarism; that the German army was really directed against the Socialists, and that the Socialist party in Germany would gain 1,000,000 votes more in the next election.

The Times Vienna correspondent says that the recent visit of a Hungarian deputation to Louis Kossuth may have unforeseen results, as Kossuth advised the Hungarian Parliament to insist that the law of Pragmatic sanction, securing the accession of a female, in the event of the extinction of male heirs, to the throne, be deposited in the Hungarian state archives, his inquiries having led him to believe that otherwise it would be lost or destroyed.

The peace strength of the German army is to be increased by about 95,000 men, at an annual cost of 80,000,000 marks. This large addition to the army, though it is consequent, to a certain extent, upon the practical adoption of a two-years' instead of a three-years' term of service will necessitate a much larger annual contingent being drafted into the ranks, and looks ominous for the peace of Europe.

The Emperor protests that in increasing the army he is actuated by the best motives, and that he is most anxious for the preservation of peace. This, he believes, will best be maintained by preparing for war. Besides its peace army, France outnumbered Germany's by 25,000, and on war footing by 340,000. The scheme creates much irritation in Germany. Bismarck is opposed to it.

It is stated from Hamburg that although the theatres are full and the variety shows and beer saloons have rarely done a heavier business, the suffering in the city is extreme. In Hammerbroeck nine persons died of typhoid fever, induced by insufficient nourishment.

Seven of them were in the families of clerks who had been dismissed on account of the lull in trade. speedy revival of business has not come as was expected. Many shops open daily, yet no general resumption has been effected. In the Spitaler, S and Neiden streets no business at all is done. In shipping district a similar state of distress prevails. Infant mortality is increasing. The physicians that the scarcity of food and clothes among the employed will result in a series of minor epidemics throughout the winter.

The Canadian Minister of Justice is said to be of the opinion that those Canadian sealers that taken seals in Behring Sea this year and escaped, are still liable to prosecution for violation of the proclamation prohibiting the catching of sea that sea this year. Some of the vessels left early the reason, before the modus vivendi was renewed.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

She was much esteemed by John Wesley, and other distinguished characters in the Methodist connection, and was frequently urged to come what is called a class leader; but she only confessed to him, and other members of the society, that her views were not perfectly concordant with their tenets, and she uniformly refrained from taking any active part amongst them. Her exercises of mind, under the gradual discoveries of the Divine will concerning her, being in degree unfolded in some letters to her dear and intimate friend, it is thought the following extracts will be acceptable to the reader.

May 10th, 1771.—"I have nothing, my dear friend, to tell you, but of mercies—nothing but unbounded love should be my theme. The Lord is indeed gracious, and has lately enabled me to feel it. Oh! what sweet calls, what gentle admonitions has He indulged me with. The feeble structure of clay is impaired—but, glory to my God, my soul feels the invigorating influence of his grace; in some moments of remembrance lately, it has been ready to burst its prison, and I have earnestly longed to be with the Beloved, nor can I think it will be long. O glorious prospect? Oh! my friend, if my next meeting should be around the throne! While I write, my heart feels unutterable desires. Pray for me, that the work of grace may be completed in my soul. I believe it will—I want everything, and am fully confident that God will supply all that is lacking. In the presence of some, this might appear as the wild excess of enthusiasm; to my friend it will wear a different aspect, and I trust, engage her in my behalf at the throne of grace. This, however, we are certain of, there is no danger from anything that leads to God, and an impression, whether real or imaginary, of our nearness to Him, cannot but give a solemnity to the mind."

November 5th, 1771.—"Do not you, do I, feel the need of just such an all-sufficient Redeemer, as the compassionate Jesus? Blessed be His name, we cannot, we would not do without Him, as our Prophet, Priest and King. Our poverty is indeed our greatest riches: we are content, yea, we rejoice, that our whole dependence is on, and our entire support derived from Him in whom all fulness dwells; as having nothing and yet possessing all things. Christ is indeed eyes to the blind, ears to the deaf, feet to the lame, yea, all the sinner wants. For my own part, I feel I am all weakness and helplessness, having everything to learn, but find the Lord Jesus to be that rock whereunto I may always resort. I long to be more closely united to Him, who hath so graciously condescended, and mercifully delivered me. Oh! that my one desire, aim, and intention, may be to live to his glory."

—"To be in the will of Him who does all things well, is blessed; may we bow continually to his easy sway. Oh! what happiness should we find resulting from the desire that He might choose for us. Surely infinite love joins with infinite wisdom, and wills our peace. May our language then be ever this—

'Melt down our will and let it flow
And take the mould Divine.'

—"Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Jesus Christ, who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross. Oh! my friend, let us press toward the mark, this glorious mark of conformity to our Divine Lord and Master. Does nature, that principle which cries, spare me, oppose, and strongly resist the operation of that power which lays the axe to the root of the tree, and forbids self-indulgence? yet, let us in the strength communicated, obey that command, "follow me;" and will not every act of self-denial we are enabled to perform, weaken the power of our enemies, and encourage us to persevere in the glorious combat? Verily it will, and also meet a present recompense of reward from condescending grace. Come, then, my beloved friend, gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and watch unto prayer; the Bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet Him; meet Him, by adverting to Him in your own heart, where He waits to speak in righteousness, mighty to save. Oh! for that attentive listening to his secret voice, which one felt who said, 'Be still, Oh, my soul! speak, Oh, my Love!' I had almost said, 'Hail, celestial silence, sacred source of heavenly safety, sweetest spring of solid peace. I know not of any path besides that is truly safe,—it is an impregnable fortress. 'I will watch to see what He will say unto me,' was the determination of an ancient servant of the Most High: may my friend go and do likewise, and may the God of all grace enable his weakest worm to follow every solemn injunction, and obey the dictates of his spirit. Pray that I may ever keep an attentive watch, lest I should be surprised in an hour I expect not."

—"I have frequently wished for an opportunity of addressing you through this channel, but in vain, till the present moment, and with more than usual pleasure, I embrace it; but what can I say? Not rich and increased with goods, but poor and needy, where is my spring of help? Even in Him who is the Alpha and Omega; if in matchless condescension He deigns to communicate, as his is the power, to Him also may the glory be ever ascribed! I suppose my friend expects an interpretation of what has been lately hinted, with regard to the approbation I feel of the Quakers' mode of worship: on this point I have little to say, yet with the most unreserved freedom will I speak to that friend, whom I wish to know the inmost recesses of my heart. I need not tell you how exceedingly different my natural disposition is from the love of solitude, whether internal or external. Prone to activity, and fond of dissipation, I pursued the attraction, till a more powerful and all conquering one allured me. Since I have known any thing of the peace which is from above, retirement has been pleasant, though a principle of acting was yet alive; this was encouraged by my connection with the Methodists, who, I need not tell you, are in the active class. Having premised how opposed to my own, I think I may conclude, that the Spirit of God has now produced a cessation of self-working within me, and by emptying as from vessel to vessel, is showing me I have every thing to learn, and that by lying in his forming hand, the temple will be raised to his own glory; this leads me into the inward path of abstraction from those things I once thought essential, and to the confirmation of these feelings the ministry of the Friends has much contributed; the small still voice has whispered unutterable things to his unworthy dust in their assemblies, and given tokens of his approbation to my meeting with them. Adored be his condescending love! Hitherto then hath the Lord brought me, and who hath been his counsellor? Verily his own unerring wisdom: the future, with the past, is his; ignorance itself am I. I have no light, but as He diffuses it, and He has graciously promised that his followers shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life; they shall be taught of God. Is this Divine Teacher my friend? May I be all attention to Him who has given me the desire to be instructed by Him. To this guiding, my much loved friend, I leave my cause: I feel it my privilege to wait upon God. I know not that it is my duty to be joined with this part of the flock, though my mind strongly unites with them; my path must be more illumined before I presume to take a step so important. I want not a name, need I tell you so? it is the nature of that Christianity which is life and spirit, that can alone administer real peace to mine and to every soul. Permit me then, my friend, to meet with, and love those who are the subject of your fears—your friendly, tender fears—and think not that I shall ever realize these, unless plainly directed thereto. My ever dear friend will, I doubt not, bear me on her heart before the throne of grace, where I trust our united language will forever be—"Father, thy will be done."

Many other of her religious acquaintances also testified their uneasiness at her evident attraction to the Society of Friends; and John Wesley wrote to her in very strong terms of disapprobation. The following letter to him closed her correspondence with this highly esteemed friend, who afterwards continued to treat her with affectionate regard, and to speak of her in terms of respect.

LETTER TO JOHN WESLEY.

JULY 29th, 1772.

"My very dear and worthy friend:—For once can I say, the receipt of a letter from you has given me inexpressible pain; I am, therefore, constrained to address you in this manner, before we personally meet, as I fear my spirits would not enable me so freely to speak, as to write the undisguised feelings of my heart. I believe the apprehension of my valuable friend and father, arises from a tender affection for an unworthy worm; of the sincerity of which he has only added a fresh and convincing proof. Whether I may give weight to, or dissipate your fears, the most unreserved declaration of my sentiments will determine. Your reviving in my remembrance, the many favors I have received from the liberal hand of mercy, since my connection with our dear friends, is kindly proper; I think I have some sensibility of the love of God towards me in this respect, and esteem that memorable hour when I heard the gospel trumpet among them; the happiest of my life. Yes, my dearest sir, my heart burns while I recollect the attraction of heavenly grace! the many, the innumerable mercies since then received, I desire with thankfulness to acknowledge; and which, unless the spirit is separated from the gracious Author, cannot be forgotten. 'Beware of striking into new paths,' says my revered friend. Much, very much, should I fear exploring any of myself, or taking one step in so important a point, without the direction of Him, who is emphatically called, 'Wonderful! Counsellor!' To his praise be it spoken. He has given me the desire to be guided by Him; and I humbly hope, in obedience to this Holy Teacher, I have at some seasons lately attended the Quakers' Meeting, but not at the time of our own worship, except Sunday evenings, when, with truth I say, the excessive warmth of the room was too much for me to bear. I am obliged to testify, the Lord has clothed his word delivered there with Divine power, for which the heart of my dear father will rejoice, since

'Names, and sects, and parties fall,
And thou, O Christ, art all in all!'

With regard to silent meetings, I apprehend their authority may be known by the power they are attended with. I have not been at such, yet in my own experience find the unutterable prayer to be the most profitable, and am led much into what is so beautifully expressed in one of our hymns.

'The speechless awe that dares not more,
And all the silent heaven of love!'

I long to be more internally devoted to that God, who alone is worshipped in spirit and in truth; and find, in order to keep up a spiritual intercourse, there must be a deep, inward, silent attention, to the secret intimations of Divine love, for which my inmost soul aspires to Him, who has promised to fulfil the desire of them that seek Him; and is this, my dear sir, 'stepping out of the way?' Surely it cannot, while I find a peace that passeth all understanding. Can this lead me to think slightly of my old teachers? Oh! could my heart be opened to my friend, he would see far other characters impress. Will this teach me to neglect my meetings? I esteem them great privileges where, not custom, but a sincere desire for God's glory is our principle of action. What further can I say to my honored friend, after disclosing so much of that heart which holds him in most affectionate and respectful love. I can only add the request, that he would join me in that emphatic prayer to the God of all grace, 'Thy will be done;' to which an attention and obedience will, I trust, divinely influence his very unworthy, but gratefully affectionate,

M. STOKES."

(To be continued.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

J. G. Whittier.

The death of our friend Whittier has shown in a striking manner the strong hold which he had on the sympathies and affections of the people generally. An affection due to his noble traits of character, to the beauty of his poetry, and to his amiable disposition. The public papers teem with sketches of his life and loving reminiscences of his acts and sayings.

The Christian Advocate says: "None of his biographers have anything to apologize for or extenuate. No excuse for vice as 'prerogative of genius' needs to be invented; no stinging, merciless satire to be accounted for on the ground of temporary anger or permanent malice; no painting of sin in rosy colors or damning virtue with faint praise."

While this eulogium is in the main correct, yet it cannot be denied that in his battle with slavery and other moral evils, the poet snote with tremendous force the advocates of those wrongs which he abhorred: as Lowell expressed it—

"Singing and fighting in front of the war,
And hitting his foes with the mallet of Thor."

When Governor Porter, in his inaugural message to the Legislature of Pennsylvania in 1838, referred to the Anti-slavery agitation, and said he could never consent "to countenance" it, the poet responded—

"No 'countenance' of his, forsooth!
Who asked it at his vassal hands?
Who looked for homage done to truth,
By party's vile and hateful bands?"

And he goes on to remind the Governor of a former vote he had given in favor of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and after referring to other instances of versatile politicians, adds—

"And shall that one unlucky vote Stick, burr-like, in thy honest throat?"

As I read over his "Voices of Freedom," although my blood is cooled by the frosts of age, I feel some of the same stir and excitement, which kindled my feelings to a fervor, in the days of youth, when they were first sent forth from the poet's brain.

A contributor sends to the Christian Advocate some reminiscences of Whittier, from which the following are taken:

The story is told that the poet appeared one winter in a handsome ulster, clad in which, he attended a school examination up among the hills. He was standing beside the teacher, who was catechising a dimpled little dot in geography.

"What are the provinces of Ireland?"

"Connaught, Leinster, Munster, and—and—"

Here the little girl stuck, put her chubby fingers in her mouth, and sought inspiration successively in her toes, the corner of her apron the ceiling, and the poet. He smiled; her face brightened sympathetically. The entente cordiale had been established between them. He patted his ulster significantly; she looked him inquiringly. He nodded, and she burst out with:

"Oh, Miss Simmons, I know now! They a Connaught, Leinster, Munster, and Overcoat."

His poem, "In School Days," hints at a school girl sweetheart, who spelled the word in school which he missed, and lingered at the door after school to say:

"I'm sorry that I spelt the word;
I hate to go above you,
Because"—the brown eyes lower fell—
"Because, you see, I love you."

His exquisite poem, "My Playmate," suggests a pathetic romance of which the world may not know.

During all these years he has worshipped in little meeting-house, incapable of seating more than forty, taking his part in a service where organ was heard, and sometimes no word spoken. The "thee" and "thou" from his gentle lips has a peculiar charm.

He was modest even to shyness. When twelve years old, he said, on being called to the temporary editorship of the New England Review, of Hartford: "I could not have been more utterly astonished had I been told that I was appointed prime minister to the great Khan of Tartary." And when, on his seventieth birthday, the publishers of the Atlantic Monthly gave him a banquet, where all the great men of the century did him honor, he was full of wonder and compared himself in his little poem to a bewildered man,

"Who in the old Athenian days
A beggar slept, and crowned caliph woke."

The New York Tribune gave, some years ago, an interesting conversation between Whittier and an Englishman. Whittier expressed surprise that his guest knew so much of his poetry by heart.

"I wonder," he said, "thou should'st bury thy memory with all that rhyme. It is not well to have too much of it; better get rid of it as soon as possible. Why, I can't remember any of it. I once went to hear a fine orator, and he wound up his speech with a poetical quotation, and I clapped with all my might. Some one touched me on the shoulder, and said: 'Do you know who wrote that?' 'No, I don't; but it's good.' 'You wrote it yourself.' The fault I have written far too much. I wish half of it were in the Red Sea."

He had a horror of being lionized. Elizabeth Whittier, in a conversation with S. M. Child, told of their trials with curiosity seekers. Her brother is too kind to wound the feelings of any one, but when his strength became overtaxed he occasionally made innocent little plans to throw himself of strangers: "Thee has no idea how much time Greenleaf spends in trying to see these people in the streets. Sometimes he comes home and says, 'Well, sister, I have had hard work to lose him; but I have. But I can never lose a her.'"

LINCOLN'S PERSONAL APPEARANCE.—Some one, it is said, remarked in the hearing of Abraham Lincoln, when President of the United States, that he was quite a common looking man. "Friend," he replied, gently, "the Lord likes common looking people best. That is why he has made so many of them."

FROM "THE EPISCOPAL RECORDER."

The Influence of Constantine on the Christian Church.

BY B. WELLS, KANSAS CITY, MO.

For the first three hundred years of its existence, the Christian Church suffered under the iron heel of persecution. Ten times and more, the despised band of religionists went through the fires of persecution. All the power of the State, all the influence of society, the scoffing of the satirist and the genius of poetry and oratory were brought to bear against them. The whole social fabric was based on lines opposed to its reception. The language of poetry and song was flung around the form of heathenism to beautify its hideousness. Christianity was represented as attacking the social organization, and as sapping the foundation of the religion which the wise men of the day and their ancestors had held as ancient, venerable and holy. It was represented as a destructive and enoclastic religion, whose followers were in the lowest walks of life, and unfit companions for the learned. It was such a view of our religion that made the calm, philosophical Tacitus speak of them as followers of "a pernicious superstition" who ought to be destroyed. With a better understanding of them, the younger Pliny expressed the opinion that: "Whatever may be the principle of their conduct, their inflexible obstinacy appeared deserving of punishment."

But the followers of Christ were undaunted amid the fire that was brought to bear upon them by all the powers of evil. With united strength and unbroken front they closed up their ranks, and calmly pressed onward, awaiting the good pleasure of Him in whom they trusted.

With the coming of Constantine came the cessation of persecution and of social ostracism. The despised religion became the religion of the State. Christian rites were no longer celebrated in caves and catacombs. Temples that were resounded to the worship of Jupiter, Venus, Apollo and Minerva, now opened their doors to the formerly discredited religion. The bronze statue of the Olympian God was turned on that of St. Peter. Thus Jupiter became St. Peter.

But the elevation of Christianity to the position of the State religion did not make all Pagans Christians, and there still lurked beneath the surface the old enmity, ready to break forth when the hand of Constantine should be withdrawn. Heathenism was quiescent, but by no means dead. The cast of thought of ages could not be reformed in one short life-time. Its rites and ceremonies were still celebrated, but with diminished glory.

Constantine was too wise a ruler to lose sight of the fact that it was very undesirable that a feeling of jealousy or bitterness should exist between these two classes of his subjects. He desired to build up Christianity without antagonizing heathenism. He understood the new religion imperfectly. He was an expert in the art of compromise.

In his opinion, it was desirable to use every office to draw his Pagan subjects into the fold. To facilitate this movement, it was desirable to soothe the way by which they were to come. They must also be made to feel at home after they had crossed the line. To this end might they not borrow some of their customs with them, and graft them on to the tree of Christ's own planting? Little by little these customs might be lopped off, after their minds had become more enlightened. He lost sight of the fact that the graft might poison and kill the tree; the customs might survive after they had strangled the Church.

This first Christian emperor patronized the Church rather than nourished it. While he was a Pagan, he had held the position of Pontifex Maximus, the highest position under that religion, and he now assumed a semi-dictatorship in the Christian fold. He believed himself as specially fitted to unite the two systems. He might abolish Paganism by absorbing it into Christianity. He publicly demanded the observance of Sunday ("dies Solis."). He declared that he would never enter a heathen temple. Yet he professed an admiration for Apollo, and permitted the divining of future events by the augurs. He gave countenance to many things directly forbidden by Christian theory and practice. Alas, for the purity of this age of compromise! Safety had been secured at a fearful price.

To this attempted blending of the two systems, this putting heathen wine into Christian bottles, we can trace the existence of many customs in the Church of Rome.

The Pope of Rome, since the days of Constantine, has been designated by the name of "Pontifex Maximus." That was the name of the highest officer of the heathen college of pontiffs, whose duty it was to regulate the service of the gods, and for many hundred years before the advent of Christianity in Rome, he held a position of power and influence in that city. By degrees the office became attached to that of the Emperor. Julius Cæsar, and all the emperors down to Constantine, held that position, and the latter left it as a doubtful legacy to the Church of Rome.

The priests who waited on the altars of the Egyptian god Anubis, who was worshipped at Rome, had their heads closely shaven. From the time of Constantine to this date, this custom has been adopted in the Church of Rome, and it is the distinguishing mark there to-day.

The use of candles has become inseparably connected with every service in Romish and ritualistic churches. But far back of the coming of Christianity to Italy, we find that candles were burnt in ancient Rome before the shrine of Saturn.

We read of the statues of Jupiter, Venus and other deities being dressed in curious and costly robes, and of idols of lesser note, decked in similar style, carried about in procession. That this custom has survived the death of the system to which it belonged, and prevails to-day in the Church which has succeeded it, needs no argument to support it.

The Romans of the days of the Cæsars deified their heroes, and erected shrines to their worship. Catholicism canonizes her saints, builds temples to their memory, and offers prayers to them to ask their aid and intercession, an act dangerously near the line of idolatry.

Who has not heard of "holy water," placed inside the church door, with which the worshippers there sprinkle themselves? This custom also came down the stream of time from remote antiquity. The heathen temple at Delphi had two vessels containing such water, placed one at the right hand and one at the left. They were of gold and silver, and were presents from Croesus, the Lybian king. The water was used in the same way under the ancient and modern religions.

Kissing the Pope's toe has prevailed in Romish circles for nearly thirteen hundred years. We read of kings and emperors prostrating themselves before the alleged successor of St. Peter, and kissing his great toe. Before the introduction of Christianity into Rome, the heathen officer, Pontifex Maximus, presented his toe to be kissed by his admirers.

But we must not forget the burning of incense in churches of ritualistic pretensions. It is used more particularly in connection with eucharistic service, in public worship, and in the burial of the dead. The Egyptian priests before the Christian era, brought the custom to Italy, and when heathenism vacated, under the rule of Christian emperors, the use of incense descended with the other rites, and became the property of the prevailing religion.

Dear Friend:—I was duly favored with thine by my sister at Lea Hall, and should have written sooner had ability and leisure united, for there has lived in my mind a salutation to thee, the object of my tender solicitude, and to thy wife, thy companion in every tender sense, the joint object of my affectionate well-wishing. I consider you as now entering upon the more arduous scenes of this life, and filling more important stations than in your single state, and most earnestly desire you may now, on your first entering into the more arduous paths, be wisely directed, for much depends on this important crisis. With a heart replenished with the warmest affection, I recommend the Psalmist's words, representing the wise of all ages—"In the name of our God we will set up our banners." This is a proper allusion to your state, who have entered together into the most delicate and tender bonds of union, to be each other's helpmates, to soften every care, to enhance every comfort, to divide every burthen reciprocally and mutually, and to help each other in every temporal respect; and not only so, but to go up hand in hand together to the house of God, and to the mountain of his holiness, in order to enjoy this permanent felicity of the conjugal state. In the name of our God, now set up your banners; let nothing divert your minds from an humble, attentive care to put yourselves under his protection; implore his guardianship and tuition, He alone can help you in times of probation, and defend you in the perilous hour; guard you from the dangers of unsanctified seeming prosperity, and place his everlasting arm underneath in the time of adversity; place in Him your confidence, that you may not be moved; the world with a variety of blandishments, will present its schemes of happiness, and make large promises of a good it has not in its power to bestow; but may you carefully remember, that in the world, or under the prevalence of its spirit, you will find disappointment and trouble, but in the name and under the banners of God, peace; peace flows as a river, and all the cross events and painful allotments are sanctified and sweetened.

Beware, therefore, my dear friends, of rushing into the world of dissipation, which often attends a circumstance similar to yours; beware of a vain confidence in the smiles and caresses of men and women of this world's spirit. Beseech the protection and guidance of Him who ought to be placed supreme in families, and buildeth up a sure house to those who in all their ways acknowledge Him, and cast themselves under his protection. I trust a holy visitation hath given you an understanding, what it is that makes for true peace; enter not into selfish deliberations how to avoid plain duty; protract not your stay in a land of jeopardy and danger, by taking counsel, but not of God, and covering yourselves with a covering, but not of his Spirit. The state of the Church in that city requires of you to come up to the help of the Lord, against the mighty inundation of folly and forgetfulness which prevails; there are no wages equal to those He gives his servants, for surely the reward of the faithful laborer is exceeding great; peace, tranquillity and glory are upon their heads for ever. Thus, beloved friends, my soul travails for you, for your present and everlasting welfare, that the solemn engagement you have mutually entered into may be truly fulfilled, and your happiness established upon a most durable basis. The eye of passion, in the short-lived fever of the mind, sometimes improperly called love, flatters itself with objects of imagined amiableness and beauty; this is transient and mutable; but affection founded on mutual esteem, for an object which religion and virtue have rendered truly estimable, hath a permanency in it equal to the causes which produced it.

It is not in my mind to descend into every particular point of conduct necessary for your happiness; these will be clearly opened as occasion requires, and help administered to come up in every duty, to render you truly comfortable and happy, useful and honorable in the Church and in the world, and objects of Divine favor and acceptance; but allow me to recommend a close attendance of meetings, both for worship and discipline; in this most reasonable service the soul has often been unexpectedly replenished with good, and its strength renewed to step forward in the holy path.

Dare not to live without God in the world, lest he withdraw his blessings, and then who can make up the deficiency? My health continues precarious; my ankles and feet are weak; this is also the case with my right hand; I have been obliged to drop my pen several times in this essay to salute you, which may account for several inaccuracies besides those in writing; nevertheless, warm affection fills and strengthens my mind youwards, in which I wish you present and everlasting welfare, with a tenderness as nearly paternal as I am capable of.

SAMUEL FOTHERGILL.

"I HAVE long been convinced that much treasure laid up for children, who we cannot be sure will make a good use of it, is not a thing that should be coveted by the true Christian. Certainly where it is withheld, it should cause no repining. While the means, to those whom we may leave behind, of supplying present necessities, is to be accounted a great blessing, much beyond is often an injury or a curse; and the prospect of such abundance is peculiarly apt to have an injurious influence on our children, destructive of humility and dependence on a superintending Providence. These considerations, which have long been deeply rooted in my mind, have a wonderful effect in reconciling me to that state wherein, "having food and raiment," accommodated to that sphere in which I am necessitated to move, I hope I shall be content. I feel it often a trial not to be able to dispense as liberally to others as I could wish, yet still I give a little that I may not lose the habit of giving, as thou used to observe, should be the care of those in limited circumstances."

—Extract from a Letter of G. W. Walker.

THE THREE BIDDERS.

SELECTED.

Just listen a moment, young friends,
And a story I'll unfold—
A marvellous tale of a wonderful sale,
Of a noble lady of old.
How hand and heart in an auction mart
Her soul and her body she sold.

'Twas in the kings' highway so broad,
A century ago,
That a preacher stood of noble blood,
Telling the poor and low
Of a Saviour's love and a home above,
And a peace that all might know.

A crowded throng drew eagerly near,
And they wept at the wondrous love
That could wash away their vilest sins,
And give them a home above;
When lo! through the crowd a lady proud,
Her gilded chariot drove.

"Make room! make room!" cried the haughty groom
"You obstruct the king's highway;
My lady is late and their majesties wait,
Give way there, good people, give way!"
But the preacher heard and his soul was stirred,
And he cried to the rider, "Nay."

His eye like the lightning flashes out;
His voice like a trumpet rings;
"Your grand fête days, your fashions and ways,
Are all but perishing things;
'Tis the king's highway, but I hold it to-day
In the name of the King of kings."

Then he cried, as he gazed on the lady fair,
And marked her soft eye fall:
"Now here in His Name a Sale I proclaim,
And bids for this fair lady call;
Who will purchase the whole, her body and soul,
Her coronet, and jewels and all?"

Three bidders already at hand I see—
The World steps up at the first,
'My treasures and pleasures, my honors I give,
For which all my votaries thirst;
She'll be happy and gay through life's bright day,
With a quiet grave at the worst.'

Next out speaks the Devil and boldly bids,
'The kingdoms of earth are all mine;
Fair lady thy name with an envied fame,
On their brightest tablets shall shine;
Only give me thy soul and I give thee the whole,
Their glory and wealth to be thine.'

And what wilt thou give, O sinner's true friend;
Thou Man of Sorrows unknown?
He gently said, 'My blood I have shed,
To purchase her for mine own;
To conquer the grave and her soul to save,
I trod the wine press alone.

I will give her my cross of suffering here,
My cup of sorrow to share;
Then with glory and love in my home above,
Forever to dwell with me there;
She shall walk in light in a robe of white,
And a radiant crown shall wear.'

Thou hast heard the terms, my lady fair,
Offered by each for thee;
Which wilt thou choose and which wilt thou lose,
This life or the life to be?
The figure is mine, but the choice is thine,
Dear lady, which of the three?"

Nearer and nearer the preacher's stand,
The gilded chariot stole;
And each head is bowed as over the crowd,
The gospel accents roll;
And every word which the lady heard,
Burned into her very soul.

"Pardon, good people," she kindly said,
As she rose from her cushioned seat;
As the crowd made way, you might almost say
You could hear her pulses beat;
And each head was bare as the lady fair,
Knelt low at the preacher's feet.

She took from her hand the jewels rare,
The coronet from her brow;
"Lord Jesus," she said as she bowed her head,
The highest bidder art Thou;
Thou hast died for my sake, and I gratefully take Thy offer—and take it now.

I know the pleasures and treasures of earth,
At best they but weary and cloy,
And the Tempter is bold but his honors of gold
Prove ever a fatal decoy;
I long for Thy rest—Thy bid is the best;
O Lord, I accept it with joy.

I turn from the pride and the ambitions of earth,
I welcome thy cross now so dear;
My mission shall be to win souls for Thee,
While life shall be spared to me here;
My hope ever found with Thee to be crowned,
When Thou shalt in glory appear.

"Amen!" said the preacher with reverent grace,
And the people all wept aloud;
Years have rolled on and all have gone,
Who around that altar bowed;
Lady and throng have been swept along,
On the wind like a morning cloud.

But soon, O how soon, the glory and gloom
Of the world shall pass away;
And the Lord shall come to his promised throne,
With his saints in shining array;
May we all be there with the lady fair,
On that coronation day!

A MEMORIAL OF THE MONTHLY MEETING FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA, CONCERNING OUR DECEASED FRIEND, ABIGAIL HUTCHINSON.

Under a lively remembrance of the dedicated character and religious labors of our late beloved Friend, Abigail Hutchinson, we have engaged to preserve some account of her life and Christian experience.

She was the daughter of John and Margaret Hutchinson, and was born in Philadelphia, Fifth Month 1st, 1798. She was educated in school under the care of Friends; and submitted her early life to the restraints which her parents were concerned to place around their children. But about the year 1828, she, with others, was led away from the profession of the Truth, and unflinchingly maintained by her parents, she lost her right of membership in our religious Society.

Through the enlightening influence of the Holy Spirit, she was, however, given to see, through the coming, sufferings, death, resurrection and ascension of our blessed Lord and Saviour, a new and living way of redemption had been opened for all mankind; and also to the root and ground from which our Christian testimonies proceed; and having been brought into deep sorrow and concern for the course she had pursued, she made acknowledgment thereof to the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Southern District, and was reinstated in membership by it in the Sixth Month, 1841.

Continuing to yield obedience to the operations of the Holy Spirit, a gift in the ministry was conferred upon her. She had felt for many years that she might be called to his service; but, as she subsequently wrote, she did not feel that the time had come for her to engage in it until after the death of her beloved mother. "When," she said, "it seemed as though the mantle had fallen upon me; and the first time I felt constrained to speak, was when her memorial was read in our Monthly Meeting." This was in First Month, 1850. For several months after this her voice was not again heard in any way in our religious meetings, but during the following winter, in the course of an ever ating in the Arch Street house, after passing through great conflict and exercise, she was ready to yield and express what was upon her mind, when a beloved minister arose and spoke; upon which she felt that she might be abused; but after he had taken his seat the words again presented, and, to use her own language, "It seemed as though a voice said, 'Obey me in voice and live, or spiritual death will be thy portion.'"

He adds, "I was enabled to arise, and expressed the words of our Saviour, 'Say not ye, there are yet four months and then cometh harvest.' Behold I say unto you, lift up your eyes and look on the fields, for they are white already to harvest. And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal.' Oh! the sweet peace I felt; nothing troubled me; yet, I was a weak one! I felt, notwithstanding the Lord's goodness in granting sweet peace and rest, I wanted, as a sign I was right, that some friend might call and see me."

The next evening, the minister who had spoken in this meeting, our late valued Friend, William Evans, whom she esteemed as "a father in the Truth," made her a visit, which was very comforting to her.

Her gift in the ministry was acknowledged at the Monthly Meeting in 1854. Her labors in that line were characterized by much humility and tenderness of spirit, and being careful to keep within the bounds of her gift, they were attended with a solemnizing effect upon the meeting and the comfort of the right-minded. Her communications were generally brief, and a faithful care was observed to attend closely to the pointings of the Divine finger. Self being kept out, and being accompanied with the purifying power of Truth, her ministry had the effect to gather to the source from which it came.

Her appearances in prayer were marked by a humble, child-like faith, and she was often urged to intercede, that all might be strengthened to "trust more confidently" in the source of eternal strength—and a sense of her near approach to the Throne of Grace, often brought tears under a measure of the same precious being.

He was often much favored in administering consolation and encouragement to individuals, particularly to those under bereavement, and to the sick; and her visits to such were at times peculiarly acceptable. On one occasion, at the bedside of a person who was in great distress, he was engaged to supplicate for the extension of the love of Divine mercy, when he became quiet. After she had ceased, he expressed his thankfulness for the visit, and shortly afterwards expired.

He was endued with good natural abilities, and a cheerful, social disposition, which, under the sanctifying influence of Divine Grace, rendered her company interesting and instructive, and as she advanced in years, endeared her to many of the younger class as a sympathizing friend and counsellor.

He was a diligent attender of the meetings of which she was a member, and was occasionally drawn to attend those at a distance from home, and in a few cases was engaged in such service with a Minute from her Monthly Meeting.

In many of her religious engagements she was strengthened by the sympathy of her beloved sister, Elizabeth Hutchinson, a valuable laborer in the Truth, who possessed the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit; and with whom she lived in much unity until the death of her sister on the 31st of Twelfth Month, 1873.

For many years Abigail Hutchinson was in the practice of recording from time to time, the exercises of her mind. From memoranda made during some of the latter years of her life, the following are extracted:

"I have earnestly desired simply to attend to the pointings of the Divine finger, not to go before nor to linger behind my Guide. I have felt peace in yielding obedience in expressing what was required of me. I believe there are many who desire the welfare of Zion and the enlargement of her borders, and if faithfulness is abode in, yielding obedience to the Lord's requirements, there will be raised up burden bearers and testimony bearers to support our Christian doctrines and testimonies, that the Church may yet come up out of the wilderness, leaning on her Beloved. Be pleased, O Lord! to hasten the day when the knowledge of thee may cover the earth as the waters do the sea."

"How lightly some of the testimonies for which our early Friends suffered imprisonment and death, are esteemed by many, who think we make the way harder than it is, ourselves making crosses, &c. Our dear Redeemer hath said, 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily, and follow me.' There is no new way to the kingdom, no other way than that our ancient worthies have trodden, the way of self-denial and the daily cross.

"I feel as one of the hindermost of the flock, and as of very little use, having done so little for my dear Lord and Saviour, who has done so much for me. Oh, for more purity of heart! Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts; and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting. I do crave that all that is not right in the sight of God, my Saviour, may be removed, that I may be prepared for an entrance into the kingdom of eternal rest when done with time; and my spirit be joined with the purified and redeemed of all generations, that stand before the throne."

On the 7th of First Month, 1882, her beloved brother Thomas, a Friend highly esteemed on account of his humble and exemplary life, was removed by death. This bereavement was deeply felt by her, but she was enabled to write on the 28th of the month:

"As I lay on my bed a few mornings ago, dwelling on my strippedness and loneliness, the language came before me, 'Put on strength in the name of the Lord, finish thy work and there will be a mansion prepared for thee.'"

In a letter to a friend written in her ninety-first year, she uses this language: "How many have been taken of latter time from works to their eternal rewards, their seats left vacant, but He who raised up and qualified faithful laborers to be pillars in the Church, is as able now as ever He was to raise up and qualify others to fill the vacant places. There are among our young Friends, some who, if faithful, will have to take up the cross and show themselves more openly than they have done on the Lord's side, that the broken ranks may again be filled."

About three months before her close, she wrote to a friend: "I feel, through the mercy of my Holy Redeemer, all has been forgiven and blotted out, and the cheering hope, when the Lord is pleased to say it is enough, of being united with our loved ones."

Her health had been feeble for many years, yet she was not entirely prevented from attending our religious meetings until about six months before her death. In this period of seclusion, she wrote: "I have had some comfortable, quiet meetings in my chamber, the dear Master has been very near, praises to his name!" Thus supported by a sense, from time to time, of the Divine presence, she peacefully drew near to the close of her life, which took place on the 16th of the Sixth Month, 1890, in the ninety-third year of her age.

For the "FRIEND."

Extracted from a Letter by one of the Helpers at Tunessassah.

[The following extracts from old letters give an interesting insight into the labors among the Indians of some of the valuable Friends who have devoted a portion of their time to the benefit of the Indians on the Allegheny Reservation.—Ed.]

Seventh Month 1st, 1861.

Our vacation is just ended. Abel and Caroline Blackburn and myself returned from a visit to Horse Shoe, Seventh-day evening. Abner took us up to Redhouse, about seven miles from our place, where there is a small settlement of Indians.

The wife of Joseph Turkey was glad to see me, though we were strangers to each other. Said that she felt thankful to her Heavenly Father that I had been sent out. That she had been thinking she would try to take the advice of those who were interested for her good, and desired that I might be helped and preserved, and that the Lord might bless my labors to her people, expressing a great concern for her mother who is still a Pagan. After visiting most of the houses there, we went up to Jimerson town, where I found one woman sick, to whom I gave some advice as to housekeeping, and some relative to being good, and then left. But after coming from the next house, I found I must return and make some inquiry as to her belief; her husband coming in, interpreted for me. I had to direct her to the Saviour. He said he was very glad I had come; that his wife had felt some concern about herself, and had thought much about Friends. He wanted Friends to visit them whenever they came that way, and hoped I might be kept and preserved as long as I lived. He had been one of Joseph Elkinton's scholars and his wife had been here some time. I visited Isaac Jimerson's wife, another sick woman, who looked very pleasant when I went in; but my tarry there was too long. Although I hurried very much we were told the last car had gone, and we had to walk to Great Valley, where we lodged, three miles distant. It was a nice, cool morning, and we got along better than we expected, though the feet of my companions blistered some, but mine did very well.

We had a comfortable night's rest and started out quite bright next morning for Horse Shoe, which is not far from Great Valley. We visited all the houses where they were at home. One where I had been once or twice before was very far from being nice, and I could see but very little improvement; so I took off my bonnet and shawl, and told the woman I would help her clean up her house. I asked one or two other women who were there to help me—one of them assisted me in making beds, and I cleared all the rubbish from under the beds, sweeping out and assorting out. The women in the meantime cleaning the cupboard, and sometimes looking as if they would decidedly prefer my being in Chester County! I went on just the same as though it were all smiles, and when we were done, I gave the one who had assisted me a piece of money, for helping me so good, and not getting cross. When the old woman (who had gone to the woods for some kind of medicine) came in, I asked her if we had not made her house pretty good? "Oh week," which means very good. I told her she must try now to keep it so; and left them, both looking very pleasantly.

We returned to Great Valley, where we took the cars, arriving safely at Steamburg, where we found Abner waiting for us with the carriage, and got home before dark. Abby kept house while we were gone.

I expect uncle S. Cope remembers what Dodge Fatty said to him when we called at his house. That what he heard him say at meeting made him think a great deal, that it seemed to open his heart. He spoke to some of the family here since of the meeting, how it made him feel; also told of another Indian who the next day after was chopping wood. He said how much he thought about what he had heard, and going further into the woods had prayed. So, uncle S., I can see his preaching had some effect. I hope the labor will not all be lost that has been bestowed on this people.

LETTER FROM AN INDIAN GIRL.

"Fifth Month 31st, 1861.

My dear teacher, Abel Blackburn:—This is the last afternoon for us to write letters. I thought before thou told us, we had better write composition or letters to thee or Caroline and Abigail, that I would take the pleasure of writing to thee. Thou hast done a great deal for me and taken a great deal of pains for my improvement. And is it not my duty to write a line to thee in which to express my thanks? Surely I will try and be one of those who feels thankful for all the good, whatever it might be, that is done for them. I have enjoyed this short session very much, both in and out of school. I hope, if I stay another session, that it will be as pleasant as this has been. It is indeed pleasant, when we have been so long engaged in studying our books, to be free from it a short time. I wish thou could go home too and spend a few happy days with thy brothers and sisters, father and mother, as thy scholars will, and so return with renewed mind.

This is a beautiful afternoon. Where shall we be, what shall our employment be, when this day comes round again? Shall the hours be as happily spent as they are now? Ah! our souls will be existing in some place, either our time will be passing away in this world, or in the world which will never end, and where life will no more change.

From thy affectionate scholar,
CYNTHIA E. PIERCE."

"TUNESASSAH, June 1st, 1861.

My dear friends:—I had a little opportunity to write to you all in one letter. I thought it best because I did not know that I shall come to school again. I am very glad that you took a great deal pains to learn me. I thank you all. And please forgive whatever I have done that you did not like it. I don't want to do anything that will make you feel bad. I don't want to do wrong. But something tempts me, that I get so cross it makes you feel bad. I mean last session that I did not do right. I so sorry what I done. I would like to come again if my father is willing.

From your friend,
NELLIE E. PIERCE."

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

Children and their Parents.

"Dear Friends, we believe there are many of you, and especially of the youth, who, in a good degree, have given up, and are giving up your hearts to serve the Lord. May you submit with patience to all the repeated baptisms necessary for your refinement. The gospel hath its tribulations, but they are not like the sorrow of the world, which worketh death. They are intended to disturb the polluted rest in more worldly enjoyments; and to unite you to the living members of Christ's body, in whom the same things have been accomplished; and, if they be accepted as tokens of his love, and abode under the allotted time without repining, they will completely unite you to Him, the Holy Head.

Wherefore, ye dearly beloved youth, our treasure, in whom we sometimes dare to delight, and to hope that you will one day succeed to the places of those faithful laborers, who have passed and are passing from works to rewards; we entreat you, dear children, with tender solicitude we press it upon you, flee from everything which tends to despoil you of your innocence, and to render your minds less receptive of that holy influence which your enlightened judgment demonstrates to be Truth.

And ye parents, be ye solicitous to discharge your important and solemn duty with scrupulous attention. It is often too late to warn the youthful mind of danger, when your own negligence or indulgence hath suffered your offspring to deviate from that path of simplicity, in which you have thought yourselves bound to walk, and in which you have found peace. If you fail to suppress the early beginnings of undue liberty, how can you expect a blessing on your endeavors, when further deviations at length arouse your attention; and how, having failed to rule your own houses well, can you expect duly to 'take care of the Church of God,' by performing that too much neglected duty of private admonition therein? There were of old those who brought children to Christ, in the days of his flesh; and now the religious parent can breathe no warmer aspiration for them, than when he spiritually commends his tender offspring to the protection of his Lord. But, see, Friends, that you encourage no propensities in them which prevent a union with Him. Restrain them, we beseech you, from associating with those whose influence and example lead away from his law; and be especially careful that you introduce not among them publications which are either wholly or in part repugnant to the faith as it is in Jesus. Let it be your daily care to endeavor, after closer communion with Him, and to walk in meek submission to his commands; so may you gain over the minds of the youth providentially placed under your care, that ascendancy which arises from the united efforts of sound judgment, truest love, and a good example."—From an Epistle of London Yearly Meeting, 1800.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Some California Bird Acquaintances.—I was sitting one day under a pepper-tree on a hill, when my attention was attracted to a small brown bird hopping in front of a cactus hedge near at hand. Just there the pads were dense and bristling with spines as sharp as needles—apparently a formidable barrier for even feathers. But suddenly, as I watched, the small bird slipped between the lumpy leaves at the very spiniest part of the clump, and disappeared from view. It was not until many days afterward that I suspected she had her nest there behind that prickly copse.

A young ranchman, returning from cultivating in a river valley, sought and found it for me, and pronounced the bird the cactus-wren. He had observed these nests frequently, he told me, in "brushing" wild land; but it was some time before the idea that they were really nests occurred to him. He had thought them loose débris, hurled into oblong shape by the wind and caught and held by the spines where they were fiercest. He paid them little attention when the torch set fire to the wild acres. One day, however, breaking into one accidental with his finger, he was surprised to discover eggs within. The little leaf conglomerate shaped much like a bottle, was lying secure on its side, just at the point where a main stem forked into branches; and the eggs rested on downy mat of cactus spines, turned "soft side inward." At the end, placed almost precisely as the mouth of a bottle is placed, was a small round aperture through which the bird gained entrance to her domicile. As Madame Wr was not at home on the occasion of this unemonious call, he bore the nest away, and I then had opportunity to study its structure. Stimulated by this discovery, curiosity led him to investigate numerous other apparent haunts of loose leaves in similar positions, and he invariably found them to be nests—some tenacious, some the receptacle of eggs, some occupied by young.

I imparted this information to a friend, surveyor, and he at once recalled hundreds, he said, of these accumulations of twigs and leaf-deposit, which he had noticed when tramping through cactus thickets. He had never thought of their being habitations. He afterwards proved the existence of a great number of the "hundreds," by gathering and bearing them home. Nearly all were choked with leaves; in many, the entrance aperture was entirely closed by rubbish and webs; but I showed evidence of occupancy. Dissecting them we found them composed of a mass of broom-stuff—chiefly, grass, spines and stubble—thrown together in an exceedingly loose manner, knitted to firmness by ravelled cobwebs, spider threads, and filaments of various delicate descriptions. Often the nest was shielded from observation by a covering, equally loose, miscellaneous odds and ends. Evidently, cunning wren knows how to place her young well out of the reach of dangers.—Estelle Thomsen in Christian Union.

Playfulness of Birds.—"Crossing early one summer morning the Nantasket Beach, on my way to catch a Boston boat, I noticed a gull barking at and chasing some swallows, which kept skimming along the surface of the sea, and keeping just enough ahead to tease him imperfectly. Shortly after, I saw another swallow join in the sport, and practice the same tactics. Presently one of them soared upward, while the dog continued the chase, when suddenly the bird pounced down upon the dog's back, and, chieviously pulling out a hair from his coat. The swallow did twice in succession, to the bewilderment and annoyance of the poor dog."

He next relates an anecdote which illustrates the summary justice which is sometimes executed upon evil doers by the lower animals. He says:

"Happening shortly afterward to mention this odd prank of the swallows to a friend, he told me had seen the same birds play similar arks on kittens, who were basking in the sun, being careful, however, to avoid the maternal cat. He also told me of another incident he had witnessed, in which the sparrows had shown even more mischievous acuteness. One day, while watching the birds in his yard, to study their habits, in which he was interested as a naturalist, he saw a swallow enter the temporarily vacated nest of a sparrow, under the eaves of an out-building. When the sparrow tried to get back to its nest, it found the swallow pronounced therein and ready to do battle for its possession. A lively skirmish now ensued, but the swallow remained master of the situation. In answer to the sparrow's repeated calls, several other sparrows appeared, and a spirited assault followed to oust the beleaguered invader, but in vain. In a few minutes all the sparrows left but one, who remained to mount guard, and to strive to distract the enemy by an occasional onslaught on the nest, when suddenly more than a dozen sparrows arrived with bits of straw, tow, &c. in their beaks, with which they closed upon the nest, leaving the living inmate shut up therein to die a lingering death."—Bender, in New England Magazine.

Estivation.—A rarer and even more curious phenomenon than hibernation, or winter sleep, is a writer in the Mediterranean Naturalist, is estivation, or torpidity of certain animals during the dry season. As one of the mammals which is most sensitive to heat and dryness, M. Duonot mentions the tanrec, of Madagascar, an insect-eating creature resembling the hedgehog. It is very active during the rainy season, but lies torpid in a shallow burrow for nearly six months in the dry period. The most remarkable summer sleepers, however, are found in a group intermediate between the batrachians and fishes, and comprising at present but few animals. Their anatomical structure resembles that of the fishes, and a bronchial apparatus allows them to breathe in the water, while a pulmonary apparatus enables them to absorb the oxygen of the air. A careful study of the protopterus shows that during the entire dry season, lasting about nine months, it remains buried in the dried-up mud at a depth of six feet, and is surrounded by a sort of cocoon, which incloses it hermetically. Air penetrates through a narrow channel to the animal, which in this state breathes, not only through a lung in which the swimming-bladder is transformed, but through its wide, membraneous tail. On the return of the rainy season, the dried mucus covering the animal dissolves, and the creature tightens out from its doubled-up position, and swims in the water for three months.

A good example of conscientiousness was shown by Robert Barrow, who, in 1696, was shipwrecked on the coast of Florida. The ship's company, falling into the hands of the Spaniards, pretended that they were Spaniards, of whom those Indians stood in fear; but when Robert was asked, "Art thou a Nickaleer?" which is an Englishman, he answered "Yes." The savages stripped him of his clothes, and were apparently bent on murdering the whole party, placing themselves each behind one, with knives in their hands. But on a sudden it pleased God to work wonderfully for their preservation, and instantly all those savage men were struck dumb, and like men amazed. By prayer, Robert Barrow wrestled with God, and was delivered from those unreasonable creatures, desiring to lay his home among his faithful friends in Philadelphia. And God gave him an assurance before he was yet off his knees, that his prayer should be answered.

After his arrival in Philadelphia he was removed from the vessel to the house of a Friend, where he soon after died. To some who called upon him, he declared that the Lord was with him, and all things were well, and that he had nothing to do but to die.

The Universal Peace Congress at Berne, Switzerland.—The Herald of Peace states that 308 delegates had been appointed to this body. Among the resolutions passed by it was one urging that the different States of Europe should be joined in a kind of federal union, with a permanent Congress of nations, to which should be referred the settlement of all international questions. Another recommended disarmament as a substitute for the present policy of preparing armed forces to secure peace. Another recorded its strong disapprobation of the system of negotiating loans for the purpose of enabling one nation to slaughter the people of another.

Military Conscription.—The Fortnightly Review contains an article by "Ouida," who has acted as a foreign correspondent of the London Times, showing the evil effects on the nations of Europe which have resorted to a forced conscription to fill their armies. The following is an extract from her paper: "I can conceive nothing so appalling to the world as would be the forcing of the military temper upon its entire multitudes. Militarism is the negation of individuality, of originality, and of true liberty. The French Republic has the same corruption, the same tyrannies, and the same coercion by bayonets for which the two Empires were reviled. Germany is a hell of despotism, persecution and espionage. In Italy, the whole people sweat, groan, perish, under the burdens laid upon them for the maintenance of the vast battalions of young men imprisoned in barrack-yards in enforced idleness; whilst the fruitful lands of the Peninsula, from Venice to Calabria, lie untilled under the blue skies; the spade and the scythe rusting, whilst the accursed sabre and musket shine. This is all that Militarism, with its offspring Conscription, has done for the three nations who most loudly protested their free principles."

Morocco.—The Slave Trade.—A caravan which lately arrived at Tendouf from Timbuctoo brought 4 000 slaves, principally young girls and boys. So great was the influx of slaves at Morocco city, that instead of holding the market twice a week, as usual, it was held daily for three weeks, and the prices were comparatively low, ranging from £10 to £14 a head. During the feast of Ramadan the Kaid, who come to Marakesh, in order to present gifts to the Sultan's son, who is the Khalifa of his father, agreed that the most acceptable present would be some of these young slaves from Timbuctoo. There were forty-three Kaid, and each of them gave this young man, only eighteen years of age, three slave girls and two slave boys—over two hundred young slaves in all. As the young Khalifa has a bad reputation for cruelty and other vices, the fate of these young captives is a miserable one.—Herald of Peace.

Under the British Flag.—Natives Promiseously Punished.—We have more than once called attention to the idiotic destruction of native villages in the South Sea Islands, by the British war vessels, in punishment of alleged "native outrages." In a report to hand, Eighth Month 16th, 1892, from Lord Charles Scott, the Admiral on the Australian station, we have a more than ordinarily reprehensible instance of this ineffably stupid sort of thing. On the Island of Santo, one of the New Hebrides group, a planter named Sawers was killed some time ago. Who killed him, or why he was killed, was never ascertained. But as usual the nearest native village had to pay the penalty. Her Majesty's gunboat Katoomba, and the French cruiser Saone, proceeded in company to the scene of the outrage.

Usually the British war vessel monopolizes all the honor and glory of deeds of this description, but as the New Hebrides are under the joint control of England and France, our neighbors across the channel were allowed to have a hand in this particular exploit. On arriving at the scene, the two war vessels landed parties of marines, and, having joined forces, marched on the doomed village, which they found entirely deserted, the natives, well knowing the object of their visit, having fled at their approach. The rest of the story is best told in the official, unemotional terms of Admiral Lord Charles Scott: "As it was impossible to trace them, the party contented itself by destroying the village and the plantations." Thus we have England and France combining in the atrocious act of burning a village, and destroying all the crops of the inhabitants, because a white man was killed by somebody who may have had no connection whatever with that particular village. It is high time that such barbarous proceedings, ordered by a British admiral and carried out under the British flag, should be brought to a summary end. Not content with kidnapping Kanakas to provide slaves for Queensland sugar plantations, we must needs burn down their villages, and destroy their plantations on evidence that would be scouted in the meanest court in the realm.—The Star.

Military Influence in Parliament.—The Herald of Peace says: It appears that the new Parliament contains 53 naval and military officers and 52 officers of the auxiliary forces, making a total of 105 representatives of "the fighting interest."

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 15, 1892.

A letter received from a valued Friend in New England, a member of the larger Body there, queries whether the time has not "nearly come or the way is opening for Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to move with the view of bringing into fellowship and harmonious action the Friends on this continent who are striving to uphold the ancient doctrines and testimonies of the Society. I have many times conversed with dear John G. Whittier on this subject, and found him entertaining a similar view."

The Query thus presented has awakened some serious thought. Perhaps all real Friends will agree that those Friends who do strive to uphold our ancient doctrines and testimonies should be encouraged to persevere faithfully in this effort, wherever they may be scattered and however much they may be isolated. There can be no doubt that these faithful Friends would be animated and strengthened by being brought into outward fellowship and union with those of like mind elsewhere. And that it would be a decided gain to our branch of the Christian Church, if all the barriers could be removed which now exist in a greater or less degree between many who are united in fundamentals.

We apprehend this will be a gradual work, but it may be brought about if the Lord should direct and open the way. He alone is able to effect such a result. Serious indeed will be the responsibility resting on those who fail to move as He directs; and far-reaching may be the results of their unfaithfulness.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has officially borne a noble testimony to the principles of the Gospel as held by the Society of Friends; but we are not blind to the defects which exist within its borders; and which would weaken its hands in making such an effort as our New England Friend refers to. Yet much may be done by individual labor. Let us seek to be clothed with the covering of love, which will recognize the honest efforts of all; and, as opportunity offers, mingle with those who are exposed to peculiar trials, and endeavor to strengthen their hands.

We believe some visits paid of latter time by concerned Friends in sections of the country where there is much to burthen the honest-hearted, have been satisfactory to the visitors and helpful to the visited.

It is a subject which claimed some attention in the late Yearly Meeting of Ohio; and while the way did not seem clear to take any official step, the members were encouraged, when ability was offered, to offer their prayers to the Lord, that He might open the prison doors of those who might be regarded as spiritually bound; and the case of Peter was referred to, who was bound and in prison, and prayer was offered to the Lord for him by the Church without ceasing. And finally the Lord sent his angel, who opened the prison doors, and set the captive free.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Secretary of the Treasury has selected the property on Walnut Street, between Sixth and Seventh, as the site for the new Philadelphia Mint authorized by Congress, and requested the Attorney General to institute the necessary condemnation proceedings. This is the site originally chosen by the special Commission, of which A. J. Drexel was Chairman.

Dr. Augustus G. Seibert, who was commissioned by the New York Health Board to visit Hamburg and Berlin to investigate the cholera, declares that the only way to keep cholera out of the country is to stop immigration. If immigration cannot be stopped he says we may look for cholera next year. He considers France in the list of dangerous countries on account of the prevalence of the disease there last summer.

Murat Halstead, in the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, says: "One thing more it will be useful to remember: The saving of physicians at Hamburg that the drunkard seized by cholera must die. 'We can do nothing with an alcoholic,' is the word of doom to that class of unfortunates."

By way of comment on the above, the New York Voice says: "And yet a tax of $250 a year is the greatest penalty Mr. Halstead can suggest for drunkard factories."

An attempt was made early on the morning of the 7th inst. to blow up with dynamite a large boarding house in Homestead patronized by non-union workmen from the Carnegie mill. The front of the building was wrecked by a dynamite bomb, but no one was seriously injured. The Strikers' Advisory Committee has issued a statement condemning the dastardly act, and offering $100 for the arrest and conviction of the perpetrator.

The annual report of the Governor of Oklahoma shows that the population has more than doubled in two years, the people now numbering 133,100, exclusive of Indians.

Brooklyn now claims a population of over 970,000. Her Women's Clubs have about 10,000 members.

Electric power is coming into general use in Montana mines.

Wolves are doing considerable damage to stock in some parts of Northern Montana.

New and valuable halibut banks have been found to the west of Cape Flattery, Wash.

Moose, it is claimed, will be plenty in Maine this year.

The total amount of grain shipped from New Orleans for the year ending Eighth Month 31st, is put down as 21,921,143 bushels.

Two Japanese girls are among the students enrolled in the University of Michigan. Japanese immigration is stated to be increasing.

An eight-year-old Spokane, Wash., boy has been sent to the reform school because "he had become an inveterate tobacco chewer and general tough."

Plans of the new ten-story station which the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is building at Broad and Market Street are made public. It is claimed this will be "the largest and handsomest railroad terminal in the world."

A telegram from Providence, R. I., announces the death, on the 6th inst., of Thomas Chase, late President of Haverford College, with which he was connected more than thirty years.

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 361, being 53 less than the previous week, and 11 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 175 were males and 186 females; 54 died of consumption; 31 of diphtheria; 30 of marasmus; 27 of diseases of the heart; 21 of pneumonia; 18 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 17 of cancer; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of cholera infantum; 12 of old age and 10 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 114½ a 115½; currency 6's, 107 a 117.

COTTON was firm and ½ ct. per pound higher, the movement from the plantations being light. Middling uplands quoted at 8½ cts.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, spot, $15.00 a $16.00; spring bran, in bulk, spot, $14.00 a 15.00.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.25; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.85; Western winter, clear, $3.40 a $3.75; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.10; winter patent, $4.10 a $4.40; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.25; do., patent, $4.35 a $4.65; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour sold in a small way at $3.65 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 76½ a 77 cts.

No. 1 mixed corn, 50½ a 50¾ cts.

No. 1 white oats, 39½ a 39¾ cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, none here; good, 4½ a 4¾ cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4 cts.; culls, 2½ a 3¼ cts.; fat cows, 2½ a 3¼ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5¾ cts.; good, 4¾ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4 cts.; culls, 2 a 3¼ cts. Lambs, 3½ a 6½ cts.

HOGS.—Good Western, 8½ a 8¾ cts.; other Western, 8 a 8½ cts.

FOREIGN.—It is announced that John Morley is preparing to make a personal visit to the congested districts of Ireland. Meanwhile, the material prospects of the country are darkening. Nothing now can save the crops from falling far below the average, alike in quantity and quality. Nor is there any compensation in connection with live stock. At the great fair at Ballinasloe, just over, sales of horses, cattle and sheep were slow and prices low. This incidence of universal depression adds materially to the difficulties which the Irish Government finds bequeathed to it.

A cablegram dated London, Tenth Month 7th, says:—A sharp and probably salutary shock has been given to the highest social circles by the startling exposures in regard to the prevalence of drunkenness among aristocratic ladies, made by Lady Frederick Cavendish and the Duchess of Bedford at the Church Congress. Hitherto allegations of widespread drinking practices among women of rank and fashion have been deemed prejudiced gossip; but nothing that rumor ever suggested equals the outspoken revelations made by these highly placed leaders of society. Lady Frederick Cavendish said that she had been recently staying at a country mansion where roomy dining-room chairs were still used, the seats of which were deeply curved to save the gentleman from falling out after dinner; that, although heavy drinking has been abandoned by the men, the women were becoming inveterate tipplers; that many ladies have recourse to "pick-me ups" at 11 A. M., brandy and soda during the day, wine at dinner, and something hot at bed-time.

She said she knew a young lady who could not get through the exertions of the London season without taking a "cordial"—a pretty name for a dram—kept handy at tea, and that after a certain morning concert a lady beside her had called for a "white cup"—a deceptive name for a champagne cup.

Lady Cavendish protested especially against the new fashion of young ladies, and old ones, too, accompanying gentlemen to the smoking-room after dinner, and sharing not only the cigars, but also the spirits. She said that a distinguished physician had assured her that many ladies who were living idle lives had consulted him for nervous symptoms, which revealed, in perfect unconsciousness on their part, a condition of alcoholism bordering on delirium tremens; but that alcoholism was not the only fashionable failing, as chloral, chlorodyne and morphia were taken in secrecy in boudoirs, and were adding to the maladies of modern life.

The New York Herald has a despatch from its Berlin correspondent, announcing that by direct orders of the Emperor, Count von Eulenberg and Herr Miquel have ceased their opposition to Caprivi's military bill. The correspondent states that the Emperor went so far as to say to Caprivi, at Potsdam: "This time I shall on to the bitter end. If necessary we will dissolve Reichstag, and if the new majority should also hostile, we will continue dissolving until the bill passed." The Emperor has therefore identified himself with the bill, and he will dismiss every Minister who opposes it, directly or indirectly. Such is present situation.

Three thousand retail traders of Cologne have petitioned the Federal Council and the Emperor abolish the new "Sunday Rest" law. They assure Emperor that this rest tends to make employes more religious, but more pleasure seeking and discontented. The petition adds that statistics show that it is unfavorable morality and bad political economy hamper trade and collect experience from the ruin many poor traders. The Chamber of Commerce Upper Bavaria is preparing to agitate the quest holding the same view as the Cologne petitioners.

It is estimated that since the outbreak of cholera Russia 300,000 persons have died from the disease.

Advices from the interior of Mexico, received at Paso, Texas, state that hundreds of people are dying of typhoid fever in Toluca. The disease has been caused by famine, and the outlook for the winter deplorable, as the corn crop this year was killed early frost.

Selections from the Life of Mary Dudley.

After this she gradually withdrew from the Methodist Society, and became increasingly sensible that it was her religious duty to profess with Friends, which she was strengthened open-ly to acknowledge in language and demeanor, about the middle of the year 1773. This important event, and the deep exercises by which it was preceded, are thus stated in my dear mother's own narrative:

"The active zeal of the people I loved, who had joined, now appeared to me irreconcilable with that self-abasement, and utter inability to move without holy help, which I experienced. I had nothing but poverty and sickness to tell of; and when, from the force of example, I did speak,* my little strength was rather diminished than increased. Indeed, I found little but in quietude and inward attention, and when centered here, I had all things, because I possessed the good itself. Thus was my mind drawn from all creatures, without the help of any, to the Creator and source of light and life, who, to finish his own work, saw meet to deprive me of my health; this happened in the year 1773, about the time of my dear father's death, on whom I closely attended through a lingering illness, wherein he said to me, 'O, Mary! I had rather see you as you are, than on a throne.' I believe he died in peace. My complaints threatened my life, being consumptive, but I felt no way anxious respecting the denunciation. I was weaned from all creatures, I felt, beyond all doubt, that if life was prolonged, were there no Quaker on earth, I must be one in principle and practice; but being determined if the work was of God, He himself should effect it, I read not any book of his writing. Being utterly unable to go from home, I attended no place of worship, and conversed with very few, except my beloved and most intimate friend, Rebecca Scudamore,† and even to her were my lips sealed respecting the path pointed out to me; but after hesitating shrinking many weeks from using the plain language, wherein the cross was too great to be resignedly borne, she told me her fixed belief, that I ought to use it, and that my disobedience caused her great suffering, or to that effect: I then told her, I was convinced of its being required, but, that if giving my natural life would be accepted, I was ready to yield the sacrifice. My health grew worse, and every act of transgression increased my bodily weakness; until feeling all was at stake, in the very anguish of my spirit, I yielded: and addressing my beloved and hitherto affectionate mother, in the language of conviction, my sufferings grew extreme through her opposition; but never may my soul forget the precious influence then extended. The very climate I breathed in was sweet, all was tranquil and serene, and the evidence of heavenly approbation beyond expression clear; so that this temporary suffering from mistaken zeal, seemed light, comparatively; and indeed, all was more than compensated by future kindness, when light shone about that dear parent's dwelling. My health mended, I soon got to meetings, and though ignorant of the way Friends had been led, or some peculiar testimonies they held, the day of vision clearly unfolded them one after another, so that obedience in one matter loosened the seal to another opening, until I found, as face answered face in a glass, so did the experience of enlightened minds answer one to the other. I here remember the strong impression I received of the want of rectitude and spirituality, respecting the payment of tithes or priest's demands; feeling great pain in only handing, at my mother's request, a piece of money, which was her property, to some collectors for this purpose, so delicate and swift is the pure witness against even touching that which defileth."

Her relations left no means untried to dissuade her from a profession which involved so much self denial, and seemed, in their view, to frustrate every prospect of worldly advantage; and her mother considering her change as the effect of temptation, was in hopes the interference of the minister of the parish would prove helpful, and accordingly promoted their having an interview; but this did not produce any alteration, neither was it very satisfactory to either party. The clergyman very strongly censured her for having taken so important a step without first consulting him, to which she replied, that not feeling at liberty to confer with flesh and blood, even by consulting her own inclinations, she dared not seek any human counsel, and was endeavoring to act in simple obedience to the discoveries of Divine light in her own soul. Upon leaving her, he presented a book, which he enjoined her to read, but upon looking at the title, "A Preservative from Quakerism," she pleasantly observed, "It is too late, thou shouldest have brought me a restorative." In the midst of this opposition, she was much encouraged by the sympathy and Christian advice of Elizabeth Johnson, a conspicuous and valuable member of the Methodist society. This friend had frequently visited her during her illness, and once when she was thought near her end, after spending a considerable time in silence by the bedside, solemnly addressed her in the following language: "I do not believe that your Heavenly Father is about to take you out of the world, but I believe you are called to make a different profession; you are not led as the Methodists are, but are designed to become a Quaker." This, though very striking and of an encouraging tendency, did not produce any acknowledgment of what was then passing in the conflicted mind of the invalid, who, however, continued to derive comfort from the visits of this valuable acquaintance; and has often mentioned the sweet and strengthening influence of which she was at times sensible, when no words passed between them, as well as the tender and maternal interest which she afterwards manifested, when the view she had expressed was realized, by her young friend publicly avowing religious sentiments different from her own.

The state of her mind at this important period, will be best set forth by a further extract from the memoir already alluded to:

"I now kept constantly to the meetings of Friends, and began to feel a settlement of mind in real peace, which my tossed state for several years had caused me only transiently to possess; or at least, not in the degree of which I now partook; not that all the work seemed requisite to commence anew, for assuredly Christ had been raised in my heart, though until now the government was not wholly on his shoulders; but by this unreserved surrender to his pure guidance, the mystery of godliness was beginning to open in increasing light and power, and that spirituality which had been discovered was now in a measure possessed. The view I had been affected with on my first conviction, now cleared, and appeared so near being realized, that my mind, almost without interruption, dwelt under so awful a covering, that even all conversation impressed me with fear, and I was held in deep inward attention for, and to, the revealings of life. In religious meetings I was for some time frequently affected even to trembling, when matter would present to my mind, as though I must deliver it, though seldom more than a very little; notwithstanding the love I felt was so universal, that I wanted all to be reached unto, but for this family, the Society of Friends, among whom I had tasted the soul-sustaining bread; Oh! how did I long for them and their good.

"About this season, from a settled conviction of rectitude, I applied to be received into membership; and thought I might, when this privilege was granted, feel more strength should this solemn requiring be continued; but though my way was made so easy, that one visit only was ever paid me on this account, Friends being quite satisfied in their minds respecting the work begun in me; yet while the previous deliveration in the meeting took place, the fire of the Lord so burned in my heart, that I dared not but speak with my tongue. For several

†This friend was a member of the Church of England, and highly esteemed, as a woman of distinguished piety and deep spiritual experience. A short account of her life was printed at Bristol about thirty years meeting days I hesitated, not from wilful disobedience, but awful fear to move in so great a work, and felt consequent poverty, though not severe condemnation; but one day, about the Eleventh Month, I think, in the year 1773, sitting with Friends in their meeting-house in the Friars, Bristol (I had once in a little country meeting moved before, but never here where the cross was great indeed), my spirit bowed in awful reverence before the God of my life, and a few words so settled, that I could not any way shake them from me. I sat and trembled exceedingly, and desired to be excused, till a valuable Friend from America, Robert Willis, then on a religious visit to that city, stood up, and spoke so encouragingly to my state, that when he closed I stood on my feet, and the words impressing my mind, seemed to run through me as a passive vessel; he almost instantly kneeled down, and supplicated for the preservation of the little ones, saying, 'Thou hast brought to the birth, and given strength to bring forth,' &c. I could not stand while he was thus engaged, being as though my whole frame was shaken through the power of Truth. When meeting closed, I got as quickly as I could out of it, and walked a back way home, with such a covering of sweet peace, that I felt the evidence indisputably clear, that if I were then called out of time, an everlasting inheritance was sure: the whole creation wore the aspect of serenity, and the Creator of all things was my friend. Oh! on my return home and retiring to my chamber, how sweetly precious did the language, addressed to the holy patriarch in an instance of obedience, feel to my spirit, and it was indeed sealed by Divine power, 'Because thou hast been faithful in this thing, in blessing I will bless thee,' &c., &c. None of my family knew of this matter, and I strove to appear cheerful, which indeed I could in the sweet feeling of life; but so awful was the consideration of what was thus begun, that solemnity was also my garment, and I wished to be hid from the sight of every one. My body being very weak, the exercise and agitation greatly affected me, and I was that night taken alarmingly ill, but in a few days recovered, and got again to meetings. Friends manifested great tenderness towards me, and though not frequently, I sometimes said a few words in the same simplicity I first moved, and once or twice ventured on my knees; after which exercises, I mean all of this nature, I felt quiet and easy, but never partook in the like degree as before recited of Divine consolation."

Ebenezer Miller, when on his death-bed, in the year 1800, expressed to some who visited him, that his love for Friends, and desire for their prosperity, was as great during his bodily weakness as at any period of his life. In his retired hours, he was frequently in a state of mourning, expressing that the low and declining state of many Friends from that lively exercise of mind arising from sincere devotion to serve the Lord, was cause of deep sorrow to him; and that it was sealed to his understanding, that truth and righteousness would have shined with much greater brightness, had it not been for the captivating influence of the love of this world, and the alluring prospects thereof; from a sense of which he was frequently observed fervently engaged in supplication to the Lord, that he would be pleased more and more to wean the minds of Friends from the things of this world, and gather them to the true fold of rest.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Communism in Iowa.

THE ICARIAN COMMUNITY.

Etienne Cabet, the founder, was born at Dijon, France, 1788. Although the son of a cooper, he obtained an education and became a famous lawyer in Paris, but in those excitable times he became involved in political troubles, and thus lost his practice. In 1830, he threw himself heart and soul into the revolution, and in 1834 was rewarded with a seat in the lower chamber. His radical views cost him his seat, and he was exiled for five years, going to England. Here he spent his time in study, and in 1840 was so imbued with communism that he wrote a book on that subject called "A Voyage to Icaria," which pictured an ideal life on an island where communism was carried out. While living in London, Cabet met Owen, who at that time attracted world-wide attention. America and communism was the subject, and Cabet then made up his mind to formulate his plans and carry them out on this side of the Atlantic. Returning to France, he called all his admirers together and proposed a departure to America, where all they hoped for would be more than realized. In the same year a large number departed, and as they were leaving, put their property into a common fund, and made Cabet director for ten years, he to remain in France for some time and advertise the scheme. They set sail from Havre, and were bound for New Orleans.

Through an agent, one million acres of land had been purchased about thirty miles from Dallas, Texas, but the sale was fraudulent. The locality was unfortunate, and but little communication could be had with the outside world, so they soon returned to New Orleans, sick and discouraged, expecting their leader to come. In 1849 Cabet and a few followers arrived, and the whole number now consisted of five hundred, who were willing to go where the leader dictated, and "to prove to the world that a community based on solidarity, is realizable and possible." It was impossible to live on their land in Texas, and the little money they possessed had been paid on the land they had purchased. Quarrels soon arose. Some stayed in New Orleans, while a great many returned to France. About three hundred still remained faithful to Cabet.

Good fortune favored the pioneers, for just as Brigham Young was leaving Nauvoo, Illinois, for Utah, the Icarians came and took possession of eight hundred acres of land, a mill and a distillery, for a nominal rent. Here they prospered and soon they had a membership of five hundred. Schools were kept up, a newspaper was printed, and a large library was also obtained. This was only a temporary place, so in 1853 more than three thousand acres of land was purchased in Iowa, while at Nauvoo they had property valued at $65,000. Success dawned upon the Icarian band; with prosperity came also difficulties before unknown. In times of failure and disappointment they were willing to submit to the authority of one man, but when good fortune came, the desire to rule became stronger, no one was willing to submit to the authority of any one else.

Finally a charter was obtained, and Cabet was again elected President, although there was already much opposition. It was not until 1856 that the real trouble broke out, when Cabet and one hundred and eighty of his party abandoned the community in order to found a new branch, where he could be able to carry out his own plans without being frustrated by a hostile majority. In St. Louis, whither the party had gone, Cabet died, without having been able to put into practice the theories his imaginative mind had worked out. The followers did not lose courage, but in 1858 bought an estate called Cheltingham, lying six miles west of St. Louis.

Again two parties arose; again the same old trouble—shall it be the rule of one man, or shall the power rest with all the members? In 1859, forty-two of the minority left Cheltingham preferring to struggle with the world instead of opposing a hostile faction in the community. The remainder were compelled to leave, with the inward feeling that the ideal communist life they had struggled to attain had been only a delusion.

The community at Nauvoo had been much weakened by the separation; suits about the property were carried on, as all the land had been deeded to Cabet. It was not until 186 that the Illinois property was disposed of, and the last member crossed the river for Iowa.

By 1863 the number had dwindled down to thirty-five. The civil war brought up the price of farm products, and with financial success came new hope. Sheep, cattle and horses were raised, while farming and manufacturing were also carried on. By 1868 the membership was increased to sixty-eight, and the acreage to 1700. In 1871 the railroad was laid, and now their market place was only four miles away. Once more the outlook was bright—the brightest it had been in Icaria's history.

The old men who had shared their bread with the howling mob of Paris, who had experienced sickness and disappointment in Texas, who had passed through the internal strifes at Nauvoo who had taken part in the early struggles in Iowa, these men had grown thoughtful; they were no longer the bold, daring socialists of revolutionary fame. They had long since given up their trained Utopian ideas of a corner in the world, where temptations, struggles and trials are unknown. But a younger generation had grown up to carry out the plans their fathers were about to lay down. The younger members like so many others, were full of hope, courage and new ideas. They called themselves progressive, and dubbed their fathers with the old epithets, "conservative," "old-fogyish," "behind the times." The old men were not willing to see their life-work fall without a struggle, neither would the younger ones yield without a blow for weal or woe.

Equality is the corner-stone of communism; this, the old members had not carried out to the letter. Each family was given the privilege of owning certain furniture, and also a little garden was set apart for each household. In these gardens they took a great deal of pride here they cultivated fruits of various kinds, especially grapes. This fruit they could sell as they wished, and keep the money. Among communists, as among others, we are not all alike—so while one person had a fine garden and raised much fruit, another who was indolent would have little or nothing. This caused jealousy and envy, and there were those who thought that this introduced too much of "individualism and inequality," two things which must be kept out of a community based on just the opposite. It was proposed that these little gardens filled with grape-vines, apple trees and shrubbery should be destroyed. The owners objected, and the saddest struggle the community had ever witnessed ensued—the sons opposing their fathers. Arbitrators were called in, and it was decided that one party should move a mile east.

and settle, while the land should be divided equally, according to the number of membership in each body. Soon other troubles arose—the trials of leadership, freedom, equality.

In 1879 the two parties organized again. The younger took the old village and incorporated under the old title, “The Icarian Community,” while the older ones moved one mile away and took the name of “The New Icarian Community,” and it is this community we have to-day, numbering at present only twenty-one, with a well-locked farm of 1100 acres. In order to prevent further trouble the New Icarians organized as a partnership.

The community is to last for ninety-nine years, unless sooner dissolved by the consent of the members. The affairs are conducted by five directors chosen by the members every year.

Such is a brief sketch of the Icarians in Iowa. Since 1853 they have toiled, suffered and planned. How far they have realized their dreams an outsider cannot say. At no time were there more than five hundred, and perhaps in Iowa never more than three hundred, and now, forty years after their arrival, there are twenty-one who still cling to their creed with the enthusiasm of worshippers at Mecca. In several parts of the State there reside many Icarians, who, having left the society for various reasons, still their faith in communism is as strong as ever.

NORWAY, IOWA.

Of One Blood.

A year or two ago, a desperate fight took place between the workmen of three coal mines in Pennsylvania. There was no cause for it but the difference of nationality between the Poles and Hungarians were arrayed against the Irish and Germans.

A superintendent who had lived many years among the miners said to a visitor: “There is no hope that they ever will be reconciled. It is a contest of race; the antagonism is in their blood. An Irishman and a Hungarian hate each other by instinct, as a dog does a cat.” In the first week of February in this year, a mine was submerged at Jeansville. Most of the miners at work, some of them Irish, and some Poles and Huns, were killed by the foul air.

All operations were stopped, and a rescue party of sixty men set to work to discover the bodies of the victims. The whole country side was moved with horror and pity.

On the twentieth day, it was found that four of the men were still alive, having been imprisoned for nearly three weeks without food in a “breast” or hole in the mine, four feet square. They were Hungarians and Poles.

The rescuing party, Irishmen, Americans and Germans, in a frenzy of zeal, pushed into the narrow gangway leading to this living tomb, and six times were driven back fainting, by the deadly black damp.

Each man knew that he remained in the gangway at the peril of his life, but not one turned back. At the eighth attempt they reached the breast, and found the men still breathing. They could not walk, and the gangway, two hundred feet long, was too narrow to allow of their being carried out.

The rescuers devised a plan. They lay down on their backs in the long passage. The feet of one man touched the head of another, and so, freed by the fatal damp, and nearly covered by water, they passed the unconscious victims over their own bodies to the mouth of the gangway.

Outside the opening, Roman Catholic priests and Protestant clergymen, physicians, nurses, laborers, and delicate women in great numbers, stood waiting breathless. By and by the line of rescuers appeared. The men were covered with mud and blood, their miners’ lamps burning in their hats. But they carried the rescued men, and were met with sobs and tears of joy. By one impulse the great crowd began to sing the doxology:—

“Praise God from whom all blessings flow.”

Irishmen, Hungarians, Americans, Poles and Germans thanked God in their hearts together that these poor brothers of theirs were still alive. For beneath all race difference, God “hath made of one blood” all the peoples of the earth.—Youth’s Companion.

EDITOR OF “THE FRIEND:”

I read with great satisfaction in THE FRIEND of Eighth Month 27th, the admirable paper by Cyrus W. Harvey on “Inward Revelation the Primary Rule.” The resumé there given of the sentiments of so many thoughtful men—not of our religious Society, on that “characteristic doctrine,” as William Penn calls it, of the early Friends, the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit is an interesting and instructive one.

In keeping with what is there said, perhaps what follows may not be without its value as also showing how strong a hold this doctrine has taken on other Christian professors.

During the past summer I spent some days in Bala, Merionethshire, North Wales. While there, the commencement of the Calvinistic Methodist College took place, which I attended. Among other addresses made was one by Dr. McLaren, an eminent Congregationalist minister of Manchester, England. Many of the young graduates were intending to enter the ministry, and his remarks were addressed especially to them. The address was apparently an extempore one, and was given with much simplicity, but with much earnestness. Speaking of “the power of the pulpit,” and of the conditions of ministerial efficiency, he gave as “the rough draft” of these conditions the words spoken by our Lord, respecting John the Baptist, “What went ye out for to see—a reed shaken by the wind? a man clothed in fine raiment? a prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and more than a prophet.” In the course of his remarks occurred these words:

“Another element of ministerial power is the consciousness of a prophet’s message. * * If a Christian minister is not conscious of a real inspiration, he had better hold his tongue for all time; for God moves upon many spirits as really and gives them their message as really as ever He did to his inspired servants of old. * * We must cultivate, if we are to do anything for the Master, the consciousness that He speaks in us. We are all apt to drop into the fault of taking our words, our thoughts, our leading ideas and the like from our fellows, instead of going unto the Fountain head; and there are a great many of us of whom it is true in another sense than the original—they have forsaken the ‘fountain of living waters,’ and have gone into the puddles of human traditions and other people’s notions. Go to God for yourself—and sit at his feet until you hear Him speak, and then ‘Lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up. Be not afraid.’ * * If a man has no other idea of a sermon than that he made it on Saturday; if it is nothing else than his thinking about Christian truth, it will have but very little influence on the people who listen to it; but if he feels that God has given him the word, there will be a power in his utterances that nothing else can give. That consciousness of a prophet’s message will color his whole manner of utterance. Prophets do not argue. They say, “Thus saith the Lord.” Prophets do not apologize; and prophets do not think about themselves, either. * * The efficiency of the minister is in direct proportion to the prominence of Jesus Christ in him.”

After the exercises were over, I said to the speaker that I wished George Fox had been present—he would have heard much that he would have approved of.

“Had George Fox been here,” said Dr. McLaren, “he should have been the speaker, and not I;” and, he added, “I have loved to read George Fox’s Journal from my early youth.” It was pleasant to hear these words from this good and venerable man, and pleasant, too, when a little later, one of the company said, “the early Quakers were the pioneers of religious liberty in Wales. Their bones rest in our valleys, but their spirit is alive in our midst.”—And it is so.

For “THE FRIEND.”

Letter of William Kennard.

[Since the publication in the FRIEND of the account of some of William Kennard’s journeys in the service of the Gospel, we have received the following letter to a fellow minister, who was engaged in the same line of service. It gives a pleasing illustration of that sympathy and unity which bind together the servants of Christ, and lead them “to bear one another’s burthens.”—Ed.]

SOMERTON, Third Month 17th, 1858.

To R. E. P.:—My much esteemed friend. I may inform thee that it has at times crossed my mind for some weeks past to address a few lines to thee for thy encouragement in the arduous engagement in which thou art called towards the fulfilment of the ministry which thou hast received of the Lord, as a good steward of the manifold grace of God always waiting for Divine ability, which thou also knowest and abidest on the watch tower. If any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ our Lord and the good Shepherd who calls his own sheep by name, and when he puts forth will go before and open the way, unfolding those things which are mysterious and only known as they are opened by the Lion of Judah’s princely tribe, who opens and no man can shut, shuts and no man can open. In these openings and shuttings there is Divine wisdom; and a variety of states and conditions will be manifest from place to place, in the different circles of friends and families; and the states of individuals laid open in the light of the Lord. Words fitly spoken are like apples of gold in pictures of silver. The humble and lowly-hearted ones, who are travelling Zionward seeking an acquaintance with their Divine Master, even these meet with many Sanballats and Tobias to dissuade the work of the Lord going on; the hands of these may be strengthened by instrumental means, and they [may] have cause to thank God and take courage; and some are taking their flight in the airy regions of soaring aloft, decking themselves with flashy and gay attire, and shun the cross of Christ; but even these sometimes, through the power of Gospel authority, have their wings broken, and, contrary to their own wills, are forced to yield unto the power which formerly cast out unclean spirits, and know their strong nature broken and overcome by grace. There are also other conditions of men, some who make a fair outside show of godliness, who are buried in the earth, the whole mind absorbed in earthly things; these are hard to reach.

I think the prophet called three times, "O Earth, Earth, Earth, hear the word of the Lord;" and nothing but his piercing, quickening word of power will reach these in their graves, and bring the dead to life. But even the graves are to give up the dead which are in them. And now in conclusion, dear friend, whatsoever thou finds called for at thy hands, do it with thy might, the might of power which thou mayest be afforded with from on high; and may the Lord bless and prosper his own work in thy hands! From first to last, I have had unity in the prospect of thy visit. Nevertheless, if the way should close before getting through, after waiting and weighing the matter, it would be safe to return.

And I may further add, that my mind seemed to enter inwardly into a travail of spirit, going and moving around with thee, but not in person; and in this way we seem to be able to judge of what is right and will redound to the glory of the Lord in such embassy of service.

From thy sincere, affectionate friend.

WILLIAM KENNARD.

The Early Christian Church.

A late number of the Christian Advocate, of New York, contains an article written by Bishop Vincent, in which he relates a conversation, (probably imaginary) between a Methodist pastor, a Protestant Episcopal rector, and a Roman Catholic priest. He says:—

"The Methodist pastor insisted that 'the New Testament Church, the true Church of the first century, was a brotherhood of believers; that there were no 'priests' in it at all; that ministers and laymen were equals before God, kings and priests alike; that in that early Church everything was simple, non-ritualistic, spontaneous; that the believers met as brothers and sisters in Christ; that in those days there was no peculiar garb for the clergy, no candles or incense used in the worship—that everything, prayer, reading of Scripture, praise, experience, exhortation, preaching, centered in Christ as revealed in his word and by his Spirit.'"

The belief of the Bishop is expressed in the following sentences, which occur near the close of the article:

"The ancient things of the Church are truth and faith and love; and the real presence of Christ is in the individual believer through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit."

"The true unity of the Church is to be found through the real presence of Christ in the individual believer through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit."

THE reason why the philosopher has so long sought God without finding Him, and the pious has found Him without long seeking Him, is this: the philosopher looks for God first in the skies; the pious man looks for Him first in his heart.

THE best way to keep a dead secret is to leave it undone.

FOR "THE FRIEND." OUR POET.

IN MEMORIAM.

A shadow fell upon the land,
By wing of Death the air was fanned,
A star went out whose steady ray
Shone from our opening gates of day;
A silence brooded all around,
As ceased that sweet and silver sound
Whose echo ever throbs and thrills
Among the green New England hills.

O minstrel voice! we've listened long
Unto the music of thy song.
The earliest strains our childhood heard,
The notes our deeper feelings stirred,
The words that soothed in sorrow's hour,
That brought the cheer of bird and flower,
That taught full many a truth Divine,
O Poet loved and gone, were thine.

And we who in accord with thee
Have worn the same phylactery,
And found the simplest faith and creed
To answer to the inmost need,
Have felt an earnest glow of pride
Thy gift and life hath justified;
Though all the world may claim thy powers,
We still have loved to call thee ours.

O, well the dusky brows may bend
Above the ashes of their friend:
And well may bow the sons of toil
Upon the freshly riven soil;
So closely did thy spirit bind
The woes and griefs of humankind
Unto a breast that every groan
Of others' anguish made its own.

A love of right, a scorn of wrong
Grew with thy manhood deep and strong;
A sense of indignation warm
Against oppression's crushing arm,
That with a clearer vision saw
The beauty of a purer law,
In every man howe'er decried
A brother for whom Christ hath died.

And well to thee was understood
The charm of Nature's varying mood;
The rhythm of her tuneful tongue
Thy flowing numbers softly sung;
The meaning of her secret thought
Became with thy conceptions wrought,
And thou within the sanctuary thus
Her sweet interpreter to us.

But most we prize the soul-felt part,
The altar-flame upon thy heart,
The humble trust of depth profound,
The love that knew no mete nor bound,
That proved the gift bestowed on thee
A consecrated one to be,
Thy triumphs sacrificed complete,
An offering at thy Saviour's feet.

And whether in thy tender "Psalm,"
Or down thy "River Path" of calm,
Or in the chastened glow of mirth
That glimmers on thy "Snowbound" hearth,
Or with the light "Our Master" cast,
Or pious hope that breathed "At Last,"
We trace alike a Christian's call,
The faith that underlieth all.

It matters not to thee thy name
Hath won the meed of deathless fame,
That scarcely yet the earth hath seen
The fruitage of thy blossoming:
To thee is now fulfilled desire,
The stringing of the golden lyre;
To us is left, with comfort rife,
The benediction of thy life.

D. S. P.

WERE a man sent out with sealed orders, and told that he must be ready for recall any moment, would it not be folly for him to establish himself like a long resident in a house, with great preparations for the future? And are not we sent into this world liable any moment to be recalled by the Power that sent us here?

FOR "THE FRIEND." CONSECRATION.

BY JESSE EDGERTON.

The sweet, sad story of the Cross
To-night is fresh before me,
Undimmed by all the passing years;
And shimmering through the mist of tears
Its influence hovers o'er me.

The glory of unselfishness
That crowned Christ's life with beauty,
Gleams down the ages, and to-day
Illumines with its gentle ray
Our lines of daily duty.

His perfect manhood stands alone,
Peerless, no humble splendor,
August and dignified, yet mild,
Touching the world, yet undefiled,
Warm, sympathetic, tender.

Lord of the Universe, He stood
In meek and lowly station,
A homeless wanderer in the street;
For us He trod with bleeding feet
The desert of Temptation.

Our sins upon his sinless soul
Too deep for linc and plummet,
He dared the nameless agony,
The blood drops in Gethsemane,
The cross on Calvary's summit.

For us He trod the halls of Death,
The Divine for the human!
And taking with his hand of grace
The veil from the Shekinah's face,
Gave us our soul communion;

That priceless gift, by which we come
In touch with God, where feeling
Our need of his omnipotence,
We grasp his proffered hand from whence
Comes the free touch of healing.

So, holy Father, touch our hearts,
That gratitude upwelling
May bring us to the Saviour's feet,
With humble, chastened hearts made meet
For thy Divine indwelling.

Hold thou our hands and consecrate
Our talents and our all to thee,
In duty's path, unto thy will Obedient, make and keep us still Thy children through the years to be.

COLUMBIANA, O., Ninth Mo. 13th, 1892.

INFLUENCE.—"I am only one, and have influence." Such is the plaintive wail, or self-flattering cant of hundreds of people calling themselves Christians, hence they do little or nothing in the line of Christian work. Reader! Are you one of them? If so, what are you thinking about, or do you think at all, or only dream along the pathway of life? "Only one." It is; but always leave out one, and you will never get a hundred nor a thousand. Leave out the single grains, and there is no sand on the seashore. Leave out the single drops, and there is no rain, and leave out a single member, and the church is not complete. So stop your whimpering and whining; get up, go to work, and do what you can, be it much or little—what you can. That is required of you. Besides, you are either not sincere in what you say, or deceiving yourself. Suppose some brother were to answer you thus: "Yes, brother (or sister), you are indeed a very poor critter, and have no influence!" How would you take it? Why, you'd get as mad as a hornet, and quickly show you had some pride and some temper if you had no influence. But the whole thing is false on its face. Every man and woman who is not a born idiot has more or less influence over their fellow creatures, and they are under solemn obligations to use that influence for the benefit of others, and for this they must give account to God, and there will be no special pleading at his bar in the judgment day.—St. Louis Christian Advocate.

For the "FRIEND."

Gratitude is one of the few positive virtues among the numerous negative ones belonging to the moral code. Six, at least, of the rules of the catalogue are prohibitory of vices rather than inducements to benevolence and self-sacrifice for others. The first enjoins love to God, and hence is characterized by Christ as the greatest of all commandments. It may be said that the human heart is scarcely susceptible of true love or gratitude to the Almighty until in some degree renewed in holiness by the work of the Holy Spirit. It is this which opens the channels of that intercourse between the soul and its Creator which is essential to the true conception of the wealth of love flowing from our Heavenly Father to his children, and incites to a grateful acknowledgment of favors received, and loving service in return for the ineffable gift of salvation. "This is eternal life, that they might know Thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." "I have declared unto thee thy name, and will declare it, that the wherewith thou hast loved me may be in me and I in them." "We love Him because He first loved us." We may well suppose that it was his deep and humble gratitude to the Almighty for benefits received and sins forgiven which caused the royal Psalmist to be spoken of as "a man after God's own heart;" and perhaps no part of the Scriptures so abound with elements of reverent praise and adoration to Jehovah as the Psalms. Do Christians of this age so cultivate and seek for this worshipful spirit as the benign and glorious Gospel of their Lord demands. Paul urged the converts of Thessalonica to "rejoice evermore, pray without ceasing, and in everything give thanks." I fear sometimes that we almost consider it the normal or right state of mind for the Saviour's followers to groan and fret over the trials of this life, and the restraints of the cross, and that thanksgiving and rejoicing occupy very little of our thoughts and time.

Ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full," was the Lord's word to his disciples, even when warning them of the persecutions which should overtake them for his sake. If gratitude to an earthly benefactor is reprehensible, how much more when manifested toward the Divine Author of all good!

Neither murmur ye as some of them (the israelites) also murmured." When depressed by adverse events, or physical infirmities, it is foolish to recount the favors of our past lives, but in notice generally how far they overbalance the sorrows. And the Christian always has a resource in affliction in remembering that "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth;" and that these afflictions, when meekly received, work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, whilst we look not at the things that are visible to human ken, but at those which are unseen and eternal, with the eye of faith.

Mannah Carson, a helpless paralytic, dependent on charity, who had been confined to her bed for years, and who had no power to move her arms or limbs, blessed the Lord that she could see her eyes! She never repined, but seemed full of gratitude to God and her Christian friends for their kindness to her. The pardoned sinner never lacks motive for adoring praise to Him who hath loved him and washed him from sin in his own blood; and the language of the Saviour to the leper, who, on being healed at Jesus' word, turned back, and with a loud voice, glorified God, and fell down at his feet, giving Him thanks, indicates how acceptable such acknowledgments are to the Redeemer.

"Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine? There are not found that returned to give glory to God save this stranger. Arise, go thy way, thy faith hath made thee whole."

The familiar lines of a Christian poet seem appropriate to the design of the writer:

"Made pure by thee, we love thee for that cause,
For which we shunned and hated thee before.
Then we are free. Then liberty, like day
Breaks on the soul, and by a flash from heaven
Fires all the faculties with glorious joy.
A voice is heard that mortal ears hear not Till thou hast touched them; 'tis the voice of song,
A loud hosanna sent from all thy works,
Which he that hears it with a shout repeats,
And adds his rapture to the general praise!
In that blest moment, nature throwing wide
Her veil opaque discloses with a smile
The Author of her beauties: who, retired
Behind his own creation, works unseen
By the impure, and hears his power denied.
Thou art the source and centre of all minds,
Their only point of rest, eternal Word!
From thee departing they are lost, and rove
At random, without honor, hope, or peace.
From thee is all that soothes the life of man,
His high endeavor, and his glad success,
His strength to suffer, and his will to serve.
But Oh, thou bounteous Giver of all good,
Thou art of all thy gifts thyself the crown!
Give what thou canst, without thee we are poor,
And with thee rich, take what thou wilt away."

C. R.

A Noble Life.

John Bost was one of nine sons of a Protestant minister of Bourges, France, and was himself a minister; soon after he had finished his theological education he received a call to the little church of Laforce in Dordogne. A sketch of his life there as told in a private letter, is published in a periodical of 1871, and is as follows:

The church to which he was called was a most disheartening place. Formerly the home of the most devout Huguenot traditions, it was now surrounded by Roman Catholic influences, and the church itself was dead, to all appearance, the pulpit having been long occupied by a rationalist. John Bost commenced a Sunday School with but two scholars. But "God does not despise the day of small things," he wrote touchingly. In five years he had so large a Sunday School, such an overflowing congregation, that they had to build a new house, the people paying every farthing.

John Bost had a heart that could never rest in success. He began to receive at the parsonage the young daughters of scattered Protestants, of Bible colporteurs or evangelists; also young girls exposed to the dangers of vice and corruption. His house would not hold them. So he built a house to hold fifty girls, went long, hard journeys to beg for funds, paid every cent, and on the 24th of Fifth Month, 1848, the "Famille Evangelique," his first asylum was opened; and since that time more than four hundred young girls have been received there.

One day, by some chance, the "Famille Evangelique" received a poor girl, who, they were told, was wanting in intelligence. Her guardians had deceived John Bost, fearing she would not be received. When he discovered the truth that she was an idiot, he said: "What was I to do with this poor creature? Could I send her back to her wicked parents? I kept her, but in my own house. From this circumstance, it occurred that I had continual applications for the admission of the sick, orphan, idiot and blind children from all parts. But it was impossible to make a school and an hospital of the 'Famille' at the same time. However, the lot of these poor children, far sadder than that of those whom we received at the 'Famille,' weighed heavily on my heart. I saw clearly it would be necessary to open another asylum, but my courage failed me. I was not wanting in faith, but I dreaded the prudential difficulties of Christians. 'You are undertaking too much; you will weary your friends; you will sink under your labors.' These and many similar speeches were uttered, which, however, could never destroy those sublime words. 'And they went forth and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the Word with signs following.' My decision was made.

* * * * * One morning the post brought me a letter. After family prayer I begged my servant to remain in my study. The following was our conversation:

'Ton!'

'Sir?'

My heart beat violently; there was a long silence. 'Ton, you know Louison, the idiot?' 'Yes; and I like her very much.'

'Ton, I have just received this letter: 'Dear friend:—A little monster of five years has just been picked up on a dung hill. She is a frightful idiot, her mother is in prison. Please find her an asylum.' I looked at my poor servant but, her countenance fell, and she was already beginning to understand that her master was about to open his little paradise to idiots, while she for her part, felt she would be foolish enough to become the friend of these imbeciles.

'Well, sir!'

'Well, Ton, between us we will save these creatures. Jesus will enable us to do so.'

After a moment's silence my good servant replied, 'With the help of God's grace, I will do what I can.'

John Bost and his good servant had such success with their idiots, in developing their dormant faculties and nursing their affections, that the parsonage became crowded; (he had given up to them his parsonage, built for him by friends in England and Scotland) and he was again obliged to leave home, beg for money, and on the 1st of First Month, 1855, "Bethesda" was dedicated to the Lord.

For years he worked unremittingly, preaching to his large congregation, watching over his asylums, and one would surely have said his hands were full to overflowing. But it seemed as if every asylum he founded necessitated another.

Hitherto the "Famille" and "Bethesda" contained only girls. They had become dear to the churches of France, and so it happened that John Bost was continually receiving applications for boys. Poor, lame, imbecile boys were always turning to Laforce, hoping for entrance there, but going away sad at heart after the invariable answer, "Bethesda receives only girls." John Bost writes, "I placed all the letters of application on my desk with the earnest desire that they should be always before my eyes, as calls from God 'to comfort those who mourn.'"

After many months, one case was presented, the details of which are too painful to relate. No hospital nor asylum in France or Switzerland would receive the boy. John Bost could not receive him without compromising the existence of "Bethesda." When the unfortunate child heard the decision, he squatted on the floor of the unhealthy hole where he met only blows and cruelty in addition to his other sufferings, and exclaimed in accents of despair. "Are not boys worth as much as girls?"

This reply was sent to John Bost in a letter. He was on a circuit of duty through his large parish, when he received it. He tore a leaf from his note book, and wrote these words, "Come, my poor friend; boys are worth as much as girls." Returning to post his letter, his servant, surprised to see him, ran out to meet him. "Has anything happened to you, sir?" she asked. "Yes," he replied, "Siloam is founded." "Ah," she answered, "I thought you would end by doing so, sir." "Tears mingled with her laughter," he adds, "the parsonage received a new baptism: we invited thither the lame, the maimed, the disabled, the blind.

Of course the parsonage would soon not hold its inmates. John Bost bought two hovels on a rising ground not far from "Bethesda," and after cleansing and refitting, dedicated "Siloam" to the new service. Since then "Siloam" has become a large family and he has removed it to a large property, having meadows and gardens.

For a few years only could he permit himself to rest easy in his already overcrowded life. Epilepsy, that worst form of evil, save sin, now appealed to him; and as before, he could not receive the sufferers. He writes, "On my desk lay a packet of letters marked 'Epileptics.' It was right that I should spread before me all those letters that accused me of indifference, and of lack of love towards these sufferers. But no! I was not indifferent to their fate.

The church and the three asylums absorbed my whole time. Resources often failed me, which drove me well nigh to despair."

Soon after this time a young girl was placed in "Bethesda" subject to fearful attacks of epilepsy, her guardians had concealed the fact, lest John Bost should refuse her admission. He was sent for one day in much haste, and found the poor idiots, the lame and the sick, in a state of fearful agitation, the poor girl in the midst in violent convulsions. The superintendent stood by speechless with terror. "At last says John Bost, 'they said to me, 'Oh! sir, what a misfortune,' The language of my heart was, 'Oh! what a good thing. This illness will be for the glory of God.' I resolved to write to these unhappy ones and to say 'Come.'"

At this period John Bost went to Paris to plead the cause for his asylums in the "Eglise de la Redemption." When he approached the subject of proposing a new asylum, he felt his heart fail. At last he exclaimed in a trembling voice, "A new asylum is about to be founded in your midst, oh friends of the afflicted!" Murmurs of disapprobation were heard in all parts of the house. "I leaned upon the desk," wrote John Bost, "and looked to Jesus for help. Then I uttered these words, 'It is for the epileptics, for the epileptics, for the epileptics!' I could say no more, my eyes overflowing with tears. The venerable president drew near me and taking both my hands said with feeling, 'I will give you a thousand francs, and if necessary, I will give you more.' Order being restored, for the audience had been talking loud, I related the scene with the young girl, and read the letters of the applicants. My cause was gained. At the close of the meeting, a widow without children offered herself as superintendent of 'Ebenezer.' She was recommended to me as worthy of all confidence.

"As I was leaving the church a friend clapped me on the back and said, 'You know how to get around us. I declared when you started your last asylum that if you ever opened another I would withdraw my subscription. But I shall continue it, and you may put me down for five hundred francs more.'"

After this John Bost was forced to found "Bethel" for epileptic boys.

Twenty years afterward, John Bost found it quite impossible to make his meeting-house hold the congregation. But he hesitated to build another, saying to his friend: "Though a well filled house elevates the soul, an empty one has a chilling effect." At last, one motive overcame his reluctance. Many of the inmates of his asylums were excluded from the meeting-house, because their infirmities rendered them repulsive. At last he built a new house. The sittings for the epileptics were really little chapels, separated from the body of the room, and with lattice veils before them. The invalids can see, hear and unite in all the services without being seen; and if any one is seized with a fit, a rolled-up mattress is immediately unfolded, and the patient silently conveyed to the open air, through a door communicating with the garden. The delight of these poor creatures in their meeting-house is unspeakable. John Bost says he can never forget their exclamations: "Oh! we shall now form a part of the meeting; we are no longer poor, despised ones!"

Natural History, Science, etc.

Cabbage Worms.—A writer in "Vicks Magazine" recommends sprinkling the worms with fine dust as soon as they appear. This will kill the worms and not injure the cabbage.

Serpents in a Mass.—At some seasons of the year snakes are apt to congregate together in numbers twisting and coiling about each other.

I myself have seen this in a lane in Essex, which was much infested with them. I was too frightened even to try to ascertain how many there were, but it looked a formidable mass. The celebrated Humboldt thus describes such a conglomeration, as he saw it in his travels. "In the savannahs of Essequibo, in Guiana, I saw a most wonderful, most terrible spectacle. We were ten men on horseback, two of whom took the lead, in order to sound the passages, whilst I preferred to skirt the green forests. One of the black men who formed the vanguard returned at full gallop, and said to me, 'Come here, sir, and see serpents in a pile.' He pointed out to me something elevated in the middle of the savannah, which appeared like a pile of arms. One of my companions then said, 'This must be one of those assemblages of serpents which heap themselves on each other after a violent tempest. I have heard of such, but never seen any; let us be cautious, and not go to near.' When we were within twenty paces of it, the terror of our horses prevented our nearer approach; to which, however, none of us were inclined. Suddenly the pyramidal mass became agitated; frightful hissings issued from it, thousands of serpents rolled spirally on each other, shot their hideous heads out of the circle, presenting their fiery eyes to us. I own I was one of the first to draw back, but when I saw this formidable phalanx remain at its post, and appear to be more disposed for defence than offence, I rode around it, in order to view its mode of offering battle. I then sought what could be the design of this numerous assemblage; and I concluded that this species of serpent (boa) dreaded some colossal enemy, which might be a great serpent or caymau, and they unite themselves, after having seen this enemy, in order to attack or resist him in a mass."—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND"

Well might the Royal Psalmist exclaim, "Lord what is man that thou art mindful of him or the son of man that thou visitest him. When we realize that He watches over us by hour, day by day, and year by year; that in tender love to the work of his own hand warns us of evil, condemns for disobedience when we turn aside from following the guidance which speaks unto us: "This is the way, walk thou in it;" and when strengthened to obey how He soothes us with his love, and follows on to know Him, he will lead us on step by step in the high-way of holiness that he hath prepared up for his redeemed ones to walk in. How we turn away from such unutterable mercies, choosing our own path, rebelling against the light and grace that is in adorable condescension dispensed to lead us back into the state of purity from which our first parents by transgression fell. How can we resist the offers of deeming love through Him who came to save the lost? who laid down his precious life for us that He might redeem us from all iniquity, that we should not henceforth live to ourselves but to him who died for us and rose again.

Oh that all the dear youth might in the morning of life dedicate their lives unto Him, whilst thus watching over them, and pleading for them, to come unto Him and live. Oh! enter into covenant with Him who thus raises dead after holiness. A perpetual covenant never to be forgotten, and He who is rich in mercy will forgive your many backslidings, and love you freely, and will enable you to fill the places designed for you, to his glory; and if faithful to the end, will crown you with immortality and eternal life, "reserved for all who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." It is to you dear young people that we look for a succession of standard bearers to support the precious testimonies transmitted to us through much suffering. Shall they be permitted to fall to the ground? Nay; if you will suffer the great Master Builder to fashion you with his own hand for his service, others will be called from the highways and hedges of the world to show forth his praise, that are not afraid or ashamed of their testimonies. The Lord is as able now as in the age of the world to raise up, qualify and anoint sons and daughters for his work.

In the rise of this Society children held their rights in places when their parents had been taken by cruel hands to prison. The Lord's power is the same, and those who yield up all to his leading will know a refuge—a safe hiding place from all that would harm the precious life, and nothing can wrest out of his hands whilst he lives chaste in his fear. To Him I commend you who is able to build you up and give you an inheritance among those who are sanctified.

PHILAD'A, Tenth Month 6th, 1892.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 22, 1892.

Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends commenced its business sittings on Second-day, Ninth Month 26th, at Stillwater, near Barnesville, in Belmont County, Ohio. The Yearly Meeting of Missions and Elders convened on the preceding Seventh-day. In order that Friends from a distance might have a day longer in order to reach their homes, after the close of the business meeting, and before the arrival of the First-day of week, it was decided by the Yearly Meeting to commence its sittings in future on the Seventh-day preceding the last First-day in the Ninth month—the Select Meeting to be held on Sixth-day.

There were in attendance, with certificates, Margaret E. Boone and companion from Canada, Eli H. Harvey from the Western Yearly Meeting; Henry T. Outland of North Carolina also there, but as the Yearly Meeting to which he belongs is not in unity with that of Ohio, it was not thought to be in order to read his certificate or to take official notice of his presence, although there were many manifestations in a private way of the unity felt with him in his services. A number of other Friends were present from Canada, Philadelphia, North Carolina and Western Yearly Meetings.

The mingling together in religious exercise in social intercourse at such times, of Friends of different sections, has a tendency to bind together as members of the same household of faith those who are separated by outward location and who belong to different organizations. On First-day, meetings for worship were held in the fore and after-noon. As usual they were largely attended, many besides Friends being present. The First-day preceding the Yearly Meeting has gradually grown (as in other places in the South and West), to be a day for the gathering together of great multitudes of people from a circuit of many miles; not only to attend the meetings for worship, but to meet with their acquaintances, and to enjoy the social enjoyment of a well-ordered and respectable picnic. This, of course, brings some exercise and care to those who have charge of serving order in and about the meeting-house. It was an interesting sight to see the multitude of riding vehicles, and the numerous groups of people seated on the grass in the shade of the trees. All seemed orderly and quiet—but the closing meeting was long in becoming settled, and newcomers were continually entering the room.

The slight annoyance this occasioned may be patiently borne, when these religious opportunities are so conducted as to give reason and ground for hope that serious impressions are made on the minds of those assembled, and as they are made to understand more fully the vital nature of true religion.

These large gatherings on the grounds of the meeting give an opportunity for the extensive distribution of tracts and religious books, which to some extent have been made use of; but probably much more might be profitably done in that direction. It would be well, before the time for the next annual gathering comes around, for the Friends, particularly the members of the Executive Committee, to provide themselves with an abundant supply of suitable material, and make arrangements for its distribution.

When the morning meeting had become pretty well settled, a brief explanation was made (for the benefit of those not acquainted with our way of worship) of the belief of the Society of Friends of the right performance of Divine worship, of the need that each individual should seek to draw near to God in spirit, and to feel his animating presence, for worship was an individual act, which no one could perform for another, &c. After a time of silence several Friends appeared briefly in testimony and two in prayer. On the whole it was a pretty comfortable meeting, but there was not that depth of feeling and degree of solemnity that we are sometimes favored with.

In the afternoon, there were several short appearances, and a loving Friend expressed the concern he felt that all malice and ill-will might be eradicated from our hearts, for God is love, and we could not be fitted for Heaven, while we indulged in such feelings.

After a considerable time had elapsed a Friend delivered a discourse, showing that a mere profession of religion was not sufficient to save the soul. The religion of Christ includes an experience of the transforming power of grace on the heart. We might join any religious denomination, and carefully observe the ordinances it prescribes, but nothing would bring peace except the Lord's power. Christ is the resurrection and the life; He alone holds the key, and is able to unlock the mysteries of the kingdom, &c.

Great stillness reigned over the large audience. A Friend soon afterwards arose, who had been strongly impressed with the declaration—"If the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received its just recompense and reward, how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation." From this followed a very earnest appeal to those present, not to neglect the Divine mercy, but to open the doors of their hearts to the heavenly visitant who was knocking for admission there.

This was felt to be a very favored meeting.

On Second-day (Ninth Mo. 26th), the business meeting commenced. The former Clerk, Barclay Stratton, having deceased, Barclay Smith was appointed for the day, and subsequently, on the report of the Representatives, continued at the table.

The certificates for ministers in attendance, and epistles from New England, Canada, Western, Iowa, and Kansas Yearly Meetings were read, and a committee appointed to essay replies to these epistles.

Reference was made to the condition of those Friends who were endeavoring to maintain a testimony to our original principles, amid great discouragements, owing to many of their fellow-members having adopted views and practices inconsistent with the doctrines of Friends. It was felt that these had a claim on the sympathies and help of those more favorably situated. No official action was contemplated.

In the meeting on Third-day, at one time there seemed a danger of Friends branching off into matters unconnected with the business before the meeting; but this tendency was checked by one of the elders, who forcibly reminded the members of the need there was to adhere to the business they had met to transact—which at this sitting was the consideration of the Queries and answers.

In connection with our testimony against war, the evil effects of "Decoration Day" were spoken of, as tending to keep alive a military spirit; and a caution was expressed by a Friend against visiting the proposed "World's Fair" at Chicago, which was to be opened by a grand military display.

On Fourth-day, a public meeting for worship was held, which was a time of Divine favor. Among the points brought to view by those who spoke, one was the discipline through which the Christian is led. By yielding to early Divine visitations, the soul may be bowed in reverence and enabled to intercede for mercy, and favored to feel the assurance that its sins are forgiven. But after that, there are many trials and baptisms to be passed through, so that the vessel may be prepared to hold the holy oil.

One Friend revived the prediction of Moses—"A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren like unto me; Him shall ye hear in all things, whatsoever He shall say unto you. And it shall come to pass, that every soul that will not hear that Prophet shall be destroyed from among the people." This Prophet was Christ, and we were earnestly exhorted to hearken to and obey Him.

On Fifth-day, the list of ministers and elders deceased during the previous year, was read. The Minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings contained a memorial addressed to the Congress of the United States, requesting them to ratify the treaty to keep liquor and firearms out of the Congo territory. It also approved of the publication of a Memoir of Ann Branson, a minister who had been greatly beloved and valued. A copy of this was directed to be furnished gratuitously to every family in the Yearly Meeting; and the remainder to be sold at cost price, fifty cents per copy.

An addition of five members was made to the Meeting for Sufferings, to fill vacancies in the Yearly Meeting's representation.

Reports on education gave the number of school children at 589, of whom about one-half were being educated under the care of Friends. An appropriation of $250 was made to aid in this work for the ensuing year.

The report of the Boarding School gives the average number of pupils in the winter session as about fifty-three, and in the summer session, as about eleven. An expenditure of nearly $1,000 for repairs and improvements had caused the expenses to exceed the income by about $500. This institution is very economically conducted; and it seems very desirable that an addition should be made to its endowment fund, so that it may educate an increased number of those who are unable to pay the cost of board and tuition.

Sixth-day was the final sitting of the Yearly Meeting. Early in the morning a visit was paid to the Men's Meeting by a woman Friend, who spoke of the necessity of keeping to moderation in business and in the manner of living, and cautioned us against joining secret societies.

The report of the committee to look after the welfare of the Fox Indians in Iowa was interesting. They had paid them two visits during the year, in the last one of which Louisa Smith (formerly of Tunesassah) had joined. These Indians have a United States Agent who seems sincerely desirous of promoting their welfare. He had decreased the amount of intemperance among them, by arresting and subjecting to a short imprisonment every Indian found drunk. He had to a large extent kept out a class of low whites, who had been in the way of intruding on the Indian lands, by going there himself every day of the week except one. The lands they hold have been purchased by their own money, and they have added to them during the past year 1,650 acres, out of the funds received from the United States for the sale of their Oklahoma lands. They have now about 2,900 acres, mostly fertile soil. There has been much improvement in the character of their dwellings, and in the number of wagons, teams, and other agricultural appliances; and their prospects seem hopeful.

Six women Friends were added to the committee, heretofore consisting exclusively of men.

Epistles were produced for the Yearly Meetings with which Ohio corresponds, the concluding Minute read, and after a time of solemn silence, the meeting separated.

A visitor to Ohio Yearly Meeting notices the absence of loved Friends, who in former years took an active part in its proceedings, but who have been removed from the church militant on earth to the church triumphant in Heaven. But the same Divine power which qualified them for the work of their day has been extended to others, so that the religious weight and dignity of this Body of Friends has been well preserved; and there are encouraging evidences that the Head of the Church is bestowing precious gifts upon sons and daughters. In divers parts of the Yearly Meeting there is an increase in the number of those who are constrained to open their mouths in testimony, to the comfort of their friends. The differences which formerly existed in some places seem largely to have passed away; and there is ground for hope, that if the members are preserved humble and faithful, a period of increased prosperity and usefulness will open before this branch of our Church.

We have received from one of our correspondents a strongly written article, entitled "Who is responsible?" We decline to publish it in full, because it would be considered as too strongly political. Yet we have sympathy with its general purpose, which is to press upon its readers the measure of responsibility which rests upon every voter in our land for the manner in which he exercises the right of franchise, especially in connection with the evils resulting from the drinking of intoxicating liquors, and the legal sanction given to them by licensing their sale.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The United States Supreme Court has affirmed the judgment of the Michigan Supreme Court upholding the constitutionality of the Miner law, providing for the election of Presidential electors by Congressional districts, instead of by the State as a whole. The Court holds that the fourteenth amendment did not limit the right of a State to fix a mode of choosing electors. The conceded effect of the decision is to give a part at least of the Michigan electoral vote to Cleveland. The decision of the Court was unanimous.

The Census Bureau has issued a bulletin on the cotton industry of the United States. It says that "one of the most gratifying features of the situation is the extension of this industry in the South, where a marked addition is shown in the number of cotton mills established and successfully operated. The magnitude of this movement is demonstrated by the fact that the consumption of raw cotton in the Southern States in 1890 exceeded that of 1880 by 166,808,889 pounds, while in New England, the chief seat of this manufacture, the excess of consumption of 1890 over that of 1880 was only 173,317,834 pounds."

According to an exchange, the total annual issue of copies of papers in the United States is estimated to be 3,481,610,000.

The 400th anniversary of the landing of Columbus in America, was celebrated with an unprecedented display in New York last week. The parades commenced on Second-day the 10th instant. The feature of the 11th was a naval review, and the culmination on the 12th—the actual anniversary—was a military parade, in which 35,000 troops were in line. It is supposed that a million spectators were on Broadway and Fifth Avenue on the 12th.

It is announced from Chicago that Charles T. Yerkes, the street railway magnate, has authorized the Chicago University to contract for the largest telescope on earth. The object glass of the new instrument will be 45 inches in diameter, or 11 inches larger than the great Lick instrument. To build and equip the observatory will cost $500,000.

Chicago is to erect an aluminum building.

The mountainous counties of western Texas are overrun with wolves this year, the animals having committed great depredations among the sheep.

Susannah Watkins has been awarded a verdict of $1625 by the Luzerne County Court against John Schumacker, a saloon keeper, who sold liquor to the plaintiff's husband until he was intoxicated. While in that condition Watkins was run over on the railroad and killed.

A storm which raged over Colorado on the 12th and 13th instants, is reported to have been the severest ever known there, and extended into Utah and Wyoming. In the latter State snow was five feet deep on the level, while in the mountain cuts it was eighteen feet deep in some places. Travel was blocked, telegraph wires down and the rotary snow plows put to work endeavoring to clear the roads. Thousands of cattle perished on the plains, and it is reported that several persons lost their lives.

On the 11th instant, the Grand Jury in Pittsburgh, sitting in the treason cases against the Homestead strikers, and the murder and conspiracy charges against H. C. Frick and other officials of the Carnegie Steel Company and the Pinkerton detectives, brought in true bills in all the cases.

There were 390 deaths reported in this city last week, being 29 more than the previous week, and 8 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing 184 were males and 206 females; 42 died of consumption; 37 of diphtheria; 34 of heart diseases; 31 of pneumonia; 22 of marasmus; 16 of old age; 13 of Bright's disease; 13 of convulsions; 11 of cholera infantum; 10 of cancer and 10 of inanition.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 4¾ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¾ a 4¾ cts.; common, 3¾ a 4 cts.; culls, 2 a 3½ cts. Lambs, 4 a 6½ cts.

HOGS.—Good Western, 8½ a 8¾ cts.; other Western, 8 a 8½ cts.

FOREIGN.—The political incident of the week in Great Britain was the first bye-election since the general election. As was foreshadowed, the Liberals lost a seat, but by the narrow majority of three. Nevertheless the loss is felt by the Liberals, who had originally only a majority of forty, which is now reduced to thirty-eight. The result of the Lichfield election contest has been the confirmation of the Conservative member's election by an increased majority over that originally announced. These events have thrown a gloom over the Liberals.

Heavy rains occurred in different parts of England and Ireland last week.

At Castleford, in Yorkshire, the sewers burst under the strain of the great volume of water rushing through them, and as a result the streets were flooded and became impassable. Business was, of course, suspended, and all the public buildings were closed.

The Manchester and Sheffield Railway line near Rotherham was covered with three feet of water.

The floods in Yorkshire are the most serious that have ever occurred in that country in the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Railway traffic has been completely diverted from the usual channels. The damage to property is enormous. A bridge at Selby, on the York and Doncaster Railway, has been destroyed by the floods. Thousands of acres of land are submerged in the Barnsley District, and many people moved their effects from their homes.

Public attention in Berlin is chiefly directed to the Military bill, which not a single journal, except the Government organs, supports. The recent pretty general belief that a crisis was impending in the Prussian Cabinet, arising from the divergence of views in regard to the bill, has become greatly modified. Even the opposition now admit that there is little ground for any such belief. At a meeting of the Prussian Cabinet no active opposition was offered to the measure. The Ministry accepted the bill on condition that the extra expenditure involved be borne by the Empire, and not by Prussia alone. The assurance of Chancellor von Caprivi on the point appeared to be satisfactory to them. Miquel, Prussian Minister of Finance, from whom the strongest opposition to the measure was expected, contented himself with explaining the financial results of the bill. Radical journals sarcastically comment upon what they term the submission of the Ministry. Centre party still maintains a show of opposition, there is no lack of evidence that a large section of party will support the bill if slight modifications be made.

A dispatch of the 17th, from Berlin, says: "Emperor has signed Count Von Caprivi's Military bill, and has empowered the Chancellor to dissolve the Reichstag in case it refuses to approve the measure. This step he took on Saturday, after having made a long report on the bill from the Chancellor. An additional annual expenditure required will be 500,000 marks."

The Standard's Odessa correspondent says that cholera is spreading throughout the whole of South-western Russia. In other parts of Europe the disease is subsiding.

The Brussels Board of Health reports that from the Seventh Month 25th, 1135 cases of cholera and 33 deaths from the disease occurred in Belgium.

The Shanghai correspondent of the Standard says: "The crews of ten British sealing vessels which had been seized by Russian cruisers and brought to a divostock complain bitterly of the barbarous treatment to which they allege they were subjected at the hands of their captors."

It is reported that a valuable discovery of niter has been found near Mount Darwin, in the direction of the Hanyani River, South Africa. The deposit, which consists of pure nitrate of potassium, lies in beds varying in thickness from three feet to twenty feet, and extending over an area of some twenty miles. A rich bed of plumbago has also been found in the same neighborhood. This latter lies in the alluvium, but is very pure, and it is stated that there is a sufficient quantity to be worked for fifty years.

A bloody and decisive battle was fought outside of Caracas, Venezuela, week before last, the revolutionists under General Crespo utterly routing the Government forces, and triumphantly entering Caracas. This is the culmination of the trouble that has long been brewing in the little Republic on account of the dictatorship of President Palacios, who was driven out of the country, but was succeeded in office and in arbitrary disregard of popular will by the Vice-President, Villegas. The Constitutional Government will be re-established, doubtless with General Crespo as President.

On the 12th inst. United States Secretary of State Foster instructed Minister Scruggs, by cable, that in the new Government of Venezuela was fully established in possession of the power of the nation, and accepted by the people, he should make formal recognition of

Here it may not be unseasonable to remark, at her dedication was made the means of reconciling her offended mother, to the change which had so exceedingly tried her. This dear parent being accidentally at a meeting where her daughter spoke, was greatly affected by the circumstance, and calling upon an intimate acquaintance afterwards, expressed her regret having ever opposed her, adding, that she was then convinced it must be the work of God, from the knowledge she had of her daughter's disposition, she was well aware it must have cost her close suffering to undergo the exposure she had witnessed that evening. The fruit of this conviction became immediately apparent, that although no direct allusion was ever made to the subject, the return of maternal tenderness and love was a sufficient, and very grateful evidence to one, who had deeply lamented the necessity of giving pain to a parent, by knowing the superior duty she owed to her heavenly Father.

In her own memoranda she then writes:

"My acquaintance now increased amongst friends, and I had frequent opportunities of making the observations of some very wise and experienced persons, respecting ministry. Though great was the encouragement given me by many, as well residents in the same place, as strangers, a disposition always prevalent in me, especially on religious subjects, now took the lead, and I fell into great reasoning respecting my call to, and preparation for, so great a work. I imagined if I had longer abode in the place of refinement it had been better, and sometimes thought I was wholly mistaken; that perhaps the first, or all the little offerings, were acceptable as proofs of the surrender of my will; that the ministry I was not designed for, though I had not been sufficiently felt, &c., &c. (that it would be difficult for me to mention, nor might it be safe, what my spirit was by these reasonings plunged into, inasmuch that at last it itself was bitter, and a coincidence of outward circumstances added to my inward pressures, so that I fainted in my sighing, and found little or no rest. Meeting after meeting I refused to move at the word of holy command, which thereby became less intelligible, and my understanding gradually darkened through rebellion, so that I said with Jonah, 'It is better for me to die than to live.' Frequently, before going to meeting, has my spirit felt the interceding language, Leave me not altogether, but, if this thing be required of me, again reveal thy power, and I will yield obedience; and such has been the condescension of the Lord that I have been repeatedly so favored; but presuming to say, this is not a motion strong or clear enough, I cannot move in doubt or uncertainty, my covenant was not kept, and I again incurred Divine displeasure, and in a manner only comprehended by experience, knew the poverty of withholding more than was meet. I at last became almost insensible to any clear call or manifestation of duty; yet when deprived of my health, and not expected by others to recover, I was favored with inward quiet, and perhaps might have obtained mercy, had I then been taken; but He, whose goodness and ways are unfathomable, saw meet to raise from the bed of languishing; and soon after, in the year 1777, I entered into the married state, and removed to settle in Ireland.

"It was now about four years since I had first opened my month in the ministry, and perhaps three years since the reasoning of my mind had kept me from a state of obedience, in which time I had removed from Bristol to Frenchay, where I was married, at which place of residence I never recollect appearing in any meeting, and seldom in any private sitting; often concluding, that, if any gift had ever been entrusted, it was now quite removed, and I must endeavor in some other form to be a vessel, if that could be, of use. I well remember, as I had nearly centred in this state, and in more than distress, even wretchedness at times, a language saluted the ear of my soul, which I then knew not was in Scripture, but on searching found it. 'The gifts and callings of God are without repentance;' then my strong hold of settling in that state was broken up, and I was humbled in grateful acknowledgment that I might still be restored. Being in the situation above described, I was recommended to the meeting which I had now removed to, only as a member of Society, which was done in a very affectionate manner; though in the certificate from Bristol to Frenchay, my appearances in the ministry had been mentioned. Soon after settling in Clonmel, I was, however, introduced into the Meeting of Ministers and Elders, and also made an overseer, in which station I sometimes made remarks in private sittings and meetings for discipline; hoping thereby to obtain relief; but alas! every effort in this line failed to procure me ease of spirit, and instead of becoming more weaned from visible things, these attractions revived feelings which I had before known to be in subjection, and every act of disobedience strengthened the enemy of my soul's happiness in his efforts to keep me in bondage. When sitting in religious meetings, I was often sensible of the revival of exercise; and undoubtedly felt a sufficient degree of strength to have gone forth, had I been willing to use it; but the old plea, more clearness, more power, prevented my accepting the often-offered deliverance; and at last the intimation became so low, the command so doubtful, that it seemed as though I might either move, or be still, as I liked, and I even have rejoiced after meeting, in an ungodly sort, that I had been kept from the temptation of speaking in the Lord's name.

"The concern of sensible minds on my account now became frequent, and several were led into near and tender sympathy with me, and travailed for my deliverance; but I now had no hope of ever again experiencing this; and often was I brought apparently to the borders of the grave, by trying attacks of illness; so that I may describe my situation as being often miserable, though the sackcloth was worn more within than without; and I appeared to men not to fast, when my soul lacked even a crumb of sustaining bread. Thus I went on, as nearly as my recollection serves, for about seven years, after my first yielding to the reasonings before described; and indeed just before being brought out of this 'horrible pit,' I think the extremity never was so great, inasmuch that I fainted in my spirit, and all hope was cut off, my language being, 'I shall die in the pit.' In this state I attended a Province or Quarterly Meeting, in Cork, and after sitting two meetings for worship on First-day, in, I fear, wilful rebellion to the gentle intimations of duty, I went to Samuel Neale's, in a trying situation of mind and body, and his conduct towards me was like a tender father, saying, 'The gift in thee must be stirred up.' I got little rest that night, and next morning went in extreme distress to meeting, where I had not sat long before a serenity long withheld covered my mind, and I thought I intelligibly heard a language uttered, which exactly suited my own state; but it so hung about me, as at my first appearance, though not any thing like the same clear command to express it, that being lifted above all reasonings, before I was aware I stood on my feet with it, and oh! the rest I again felt, the precious holy quiet! unequal in degree to what was first my portion; but as though I was altogether a changed creature, so that to me there was no condemnation. Here was indeed a recompense even for years of suffering, but with this alloy, that I had long deprived myself of the precious privilege, by yielding to those reasonings which held me in a state of painful captivity. One might naturally suppose, that after obtaining so great mercy, and feeling the precious effects of deliverance, great care would be taken, lest the fetters should again be felt; but though in some sort this was the case, my dedication seemed only partial, and frequent relapses into want of faith again involved in distress and uncertainty, so that the relief at seasons obtained, was broken in upon. And sometimes as delivering only a part of the commission obstructed the return of peace, it might have been easy for me to conclude all wrong; so at other times great serenity was my covering, and the honest discharge of duty was rewarded with the incomes of life.

"Having a disposition naturally prone to affectionate attachment, I now began, in the addition of children, to feel my heart in danger of so centering in these gifts, as to fall short of occupying in the manner designed, with the gift received; and though at seasons I was brought in the secret of my heart to make an entire surrender to the work I saw that I was called to, yet when any little opening presented, how did I shrink from the demanded sacrifice, and crave to be excused in this thing; so that an enlargement was not witnessed for some years, though I several times took journeys, and experienced holy help to be extended."

Reproof.

In that threefold injunction of the Apostle to his son in the faith, the casual reader may probably fail to discriminate justly, even if he should happen to think any strict discrimination needed, between all its three component members.

A closer and deeper examination must, however, make it appear that the distinction is more radical in the first case than in the second, so that the seeming crevice which separates the first from its associated terms or members shall widen and deepen as it were into a cavern, beside which the second and the third shall appear but as a crevice. For it must be observed that the only consideration which lends to the verb "reprove" the air of a milder discipline than that which attaches to the verb "rebuke" lies in the etymological fact, that while "rebuke" is a term of strictly personal application, the "reproving" is as strictly a merely intellectual process, conveyed in a wholly impersonal term, or one involving no personal judgment, and implying at the most a proving over again, or a fresh presentation, of unchangeable principle in a timely adaptation to changing circumstances. It is social service, contributed from that lofty missionary stand-point of "Bearing witness unto the truth," which our Saviour announced as the one comprehensive ground or pretext of his coming as a human being into the world. If individuals to whom it is offered neglect to make the due personal application, they subject themselves to the liability of personal appeal, either in the way of rebuke, or in that of exhortation. For in a religion of progress which is also a religion of the Cross, every such fresh presentation of Divine truth must contain some suggestion either of correction in wrong thinking and doing, or of stimulus to right thinking and doing, which the professor of that religion can neglect only at his own peril.

"The reproofs of instruction are the way of life;" and these reproofs are nothing more nor less than the fresh flowings of that Divine mediatorial word, which is ever increasingly to have free course and be glorified," and by the faithful application of which the Christian warrior, young or old, will effectually (Ps. cxix: 9) "cleanse his way," and with an ever increasing illumination of his own human intelligence, press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.— R. El-Leja, or the Land of Argob.

BY WILLIAM EWING.

From Zor'a, our course lay north-east by east, and we hoped on the way to pass more than one ruin which would tell of the ancient glory of el-Leja. What a wild solitude it is! Far on every hand stretched a veritable land of stone. The first hour or two of our march no living thing was seen. Even the little ground-lark, which hitherto we had seen everywhere, seemed now to have deserted us. Wherever we looked, before us or behind, lay wide fields of volcanic rock, black and repulsive, swirled and broken into the most fantastic shapes; with here and there a deep circular depression, through which in the dim past red destruction belched forth, now carefully walled round the lip to prevent wandering sheep or goat from falling in by night. The general impression conveyed was as if the dark waters of a great sea, lashed to fury by a storm, had been suddenly petrified; as if the fierce lineaments of the tempest, and all its horror, had been caught and preserved forever in imperishable rock by the hand of a mighty sculptor.

At times we passed over vast sheets of lava, which, in cooling, had cracked in nearly regular lines, and which, broken through in parts, appeared to rest on a stratum of different character, like pieces of cyclopean pavement. Curious rounded rocks were occasionally seen by the wayside, like gigantic black soap-bubbles, blown up by the subterranean steam and gases of the active volcanic age, often with the side broken out, as if burst by escaping vapor; the mass, having cooled too far to collapse, remained an enduring monument of the force that formed it. Scanty vegetation peeped from the fissures in the rocks, or preserved a precarious existence in the scanty soil—sometimes seen in a hollow between opposing slopes. In a dreary, waterless land, where the cloudless sun, beating down on fiery stones, creates heat like that of an oven, it were indeed a wonder if anything less hardy than the ubiquitous thistle could long hold up its head.

We passed several deserted cities, built of the unvarying black stone, and surrounded by strong walls. Many of the houses are still perfect, and seem only waiting the return of their inhabitants. In one of these towns we found a church, built of yellow limestone, now weather-blackened, so as to be indistinguishable from the dolerite around. It may be about fifty feet in length by about thirty feet in breadth, and is built in two stories, the roof of the first being composed of lava slabs, many of which are still in position. A Greek inscription containing the name of Julios Maximos probably fixes its date about the time of Philip the Arabian. These walled towns were doubtless places of considerable strength in ancient days, and their stone gates may once have been secured by bolts and bars of brass. But, in the largest of them, not more than about four thousand inhabitants could ever have been comfortably housed. If this is remembered, it may aid towards correct impressions of the land taken by the Israelites, and of the exploits of the warrior Jair.

There is not a stream nor a perennial spring in all el-Leja. The water-supply of its ancient and even of its present sparse population has therefore long been a subject of wonder. Near one of these towns by the wayside, we saw what probably suggests the solution of the mystery. This was a large natural cave, the roof partly broken through, and underneath a deep hollow in the rock, now brimming over with water from the winter's rains. It would have been next to impossible to pierce that hard rock with cisterns numerous and large enough to afford refreshment and water for other necessary purposes to man and beast. The work was not required. Nature had provided liberally herself. This cave may be taken as a type of the natural reservoirs in which this formation abounds. Josephus tells of the caves in Trachonitis, inhabited by robber bands and wild outlaw bands, whose inaccessible retreats secured immunity from punishment. No modern traveller has seen these; but this is not strange, for the few who have ventured within the borders of el-Leja have not been too curious in examining the wilder and more remote parts. The natives, however, know them well, and would resort thither in times of stress or danger. Indeed some say that under the rough surface rocks is nearly all hollow; so that one acquainted with the labyrinth could go from one end to the other of el-Leja, and never once show his head above ground. From all this it is evident there is no lack of accommodation for storage of water; and, considering the quantity of rain which falls in its season, it would be a long drought indeed which would exhaust the supplies.

From this point onward the little openings among the rocks grow larger and occur more frequently. Our little friend, the lark, appeared again; and the voice of the partridge and the whirr of his wings, to right and left, relieve the dull monotony. When the traveller has fairly penetrated the rough barriers that surround el-Leja, he finds not a little pleasant land with—fertile soil, which, if only freed a little more from overlying stones, might support a moderate population. In ancient times it was partly cleared, and the work of these old-world agriculturists remains in gigantic banks of stone carefully built along the edges of the patch they cultivated.

The hands that laid these courses have been cold for ages; the lichens have crept slowly over all, adorning the home of multitudinous snakes and lizards, now long held by its reptile tenants in undisturbed possession. These wise old husbandmen have had no worthy successors. The neighboring rocks that echoed to the sower's eager tread and the reaper's merry song under brooding age-long silence, broken only by the voice of the wild game, the cry of the solitary shepherd, or the bleat of the browsed herds. But here, as so often, generous nature comes with a fold of her loveliest garment to hide the neglect of men. These patches were everywhere blushing with fair anemones, a great ranunculi, which, seen in the distance, often appeared like a soft crimson haze, showing beautifully against the black of surrounding lava. The cyclamen, already past on the old side of Jordan, still clung to the clefts in the rocks, and the most delicate little irises were blooming in the interspaces, as if to soften with their sweet beauty the harsher aspect of the savage wilderness.

From every higher eminence we could trace, near and far away, the outlines of numerous ancient towns and villages. Nearly all are utterly deserted and desolate, haunts of wild beasts and birds of night. Here, and in other places, we were deeply impressed with the fact that we were travelling through a land of ruins. How eloquent are these solitudes with lessons of warning for the great world of to-day!

ould have been as difficult for the dwellers in these towns, and in the magnificent cities of the neighboring country, to conceive of the "stranger" one day coming from a "far land" to walk through their desolate homes, and over the wreck of their architectural splendors, as it could be for the legislators who sit in Westminster to realize Macaulay's famous vision of the New Zealander sitting on the ruins of London Bridge, musing, like the noble Roman, amid the ruins of Carthage, on the desolation around; or for the rulers in the White House in Washington to imagine the results of civilization swept out of their great country by returning tides of barbarism. But what has happened once may happen on a much grander scale again; for is it not the doing of the Almighty himself, before whom all earthly splendor is but as the passing reflection of his own sun's light on the broken surface of the water? It is the fulfilment of the wrath denounced by the prophet upon the rebellious and disobedient: "In all your dwelling-places the cities shall be laid waste and the high places shall be desolate; at * * * your works may be blotted out."

Coming near the centre of el-Leja, fresh signs of the husbandman's presence were seen. Fields of waving wheat and barley alternated with rough knolls, dotted with furze and thorn, while scattered oaks and terebinths lent variety to the scene. Once, not long ago, large tracts were covered by a forest of terebinth; this has now almost entirely disappeared, the natives finding ready market for the timber beyond their rocky confines, and the branches serving well for charcoal. This depletion of the forest is greatly to be deplored in a land where trees are such a blessing.

When we came within sight of Dama,—so Damat el-'Alia" is contracted,—crowning a little eminence in front, our guide slowed his pace, hesitated, and finally halted. "There," he said, "is Dama; you can now reach it alone. I must return. And nothing could induce me to move one step nearer the village. Receiving his money, he vanished with marvellous celerity. A horseman, fully armed and well mounted, swept down from the gate of the town, and, halting at some little distance, surveyed our party. His soldierly eye was soon satisfied that we were bound on no military exploit, and he came forward frankly to bid us welcome. For the entertainment of his guests he careered around, affording a fine exhibition of horsemanship. He proved to be the son of the sheikhyr of Dama; so we were already under the protecting influence of the Druze inhabitants, the sheikh's guests being the guests of all, among the dwellings of all his people. Stalwart, white-bellied Druze warriors came down from the hills, whence they had watched our approach, to second the welcome of their chief's son, and to accompany us to the sheikh's house. Thus we entered Dama, early in this century the reputed capital of el-Leja. It is still the chief of inhabited towns, not situated on the borders, but with the proud title of capital would be a misnomer. It is the most central of all towns in el-Leja. From its high position it commands a wide view, extending almost to the borders in every direction,—a prospect not the less interesting because seen so seldom by European eyes. Surprising travellers, one or two, may have been here in past years; but probably now for the first time ladies from the civilized West penetrated thus far into the famous land of el-Leja.

We found a baitar, or farrier, deftly plying his hammer at the sheikh's threshold, making the nails which should hold the shoes of the village horses in place until another wanderer should come to make a new supply. These men, and occasionally the makers of the red shoes and the flimsy long boots worn by the Arab, are often met in the remotest parts, making long journeys even into the unkindly desert in search of livelihood for wife and little ones, left far behind, in the shelter of their native towns.

Every man, from the sheikh downwards, was a walking armory. Rifle and sword might be laid aside on entering the house, but the girdle contained pistols and daggers enough to render each man formidable still. The town is an outpost of the Druzes, taken by the strong hand, and to be maintained against the Arabs only by constant watchfulness and readiness to fight. This accounts for the scrutiny we underwent on our approach. We had soon further evidence that these instruments of death are not carried for mere ornament. Two villagers accompanied some of us who went to shoot partridges. We were strictly warned to be home by sunset, but we were yet far off when the shadows began to thicken. Passing over a little hill in the dim twilight, we saw a solitary figure gliding swiftly along the bottom of the little valley below. Our two companions unslung their rifles, and, with far-echoing alarm, dashed down the hill in full career upon the stranger. There was no mistaking their purpose. We stood with strange forebodings of evil to follow which we were powerless to prevent. The dark figure halted on hearing the shouts of his pursuers, turned, and approached them. To our infinite relief, they parted peacefully. Our guards, returning, said he belonged to a friendly tribe. Asked what would have happened, had it been otherwise, they replied at once, "He should have died as a spy."

When, after supper, the sheikh and his followers gathered for conversation, it was inevitable that with such warlike spirits martial subjects should be discussed. We were interested in the sheikh's narration of some of the recent history of el-Leja. The Druzes and the main Arab tribes in el-Leja are hereditary foes. The memory of suffering and loss incurred in old strife, rankles in their bosoms, ever urging them to seek revenge. There is chronic blood-feud between them. Some time ago the Druzes held only positions near the south-east borders, but, waxing bolder, they advanced and took Dama, then a town utterly deserted. The position being strong, and the neighboring land fruitful, they thought it worth defending. The Arabs, unwilling to lose so valuable a prize, assembled in force, and, coming down upon the isolated occupants of Dama, were, after a tough fight, victorious. But the Druzes, while they retired, did not relinquish their claim. Securing themselves in the fastnesses of the south-east, they sent messengers through Jebel ed-Druze, to rouse their friends, as the Scottish Highlands were roused of old by the fiery cross. These doughty warriors, as much at home in the turmoil of battle as in the peaceful work of field or vineyard, rushed forward in wild joy to redress their brother's wrongs. Before the chosen men of the Druze nation the Arab irregulars could make no serious stand. They were defeated, and driven away into the inhospitable, stony land to the north-west. In the morning light, straining our eyes in that direction, we thought we could dimly descry their black tents among the hardly less black surroundings. And since that time, six years ago, they have never mustered courage to renew the attack. They might, by a supreme effort, dislodge again the little colony in Dama; but they know the terrible vengeance that would be taken by the bold mountain men.

One took a jar, and went to fetch water for us to drink. Wishing us to have the best and coolest, the sheikh called after him, "Bring it from the well of the priest." The name struck me as curious at the moment, but knowing how persistently ancient names cling to particular spots, and not thinking it at all likely that a "priest" should be found in a Druze village, I thought no more of the matter. Recently, however, I heard a story of disinterested self-sacrifice for the sake of Christ, which, told of a Syrian, was peculiarly refreshing to a missionary's ear; and quite unexpectedly, the sheikh's words afforded valuable confirmation of its truth. The average Syrian character is the despair of the missionary. Those calling themselves Christians are most disappointing. What time one hopes to see a spirit of self-forgetfulness developing, and a disposition to give the best of life and ability to Christ's service, among the strangely varied peoples of Syria, he will probably be surprised by a request for some personal favor or advancement. There are noble exceptions, of course, and I have known some, acquaintance with whom forms a permanent enrichment of life. It is well to remember, too, conditions in Syria are peculiar. Cut up, as the population is, into so many little communities, it is the very home of religious fanaticism. The mutual repulsions existing in these sections are terribly strong, each believing itself to be the true and only conservator of God's truth, and all others, in slightly varying degrees of blackness, simply children of the devil. In such surroundings the feeling grows slowly that those who possess the light are debtors to all who sit in darkness. They must be patiently dealt with; and the story of the priest is a help to patience, as showing of what self-devotion the Syrian character is really capable.

I received the story in fragmentary form, but so much is clear:—A young priest of the Greek Church, a native of Mt. Lebanon—the district which has contributed most of the native workers in the country had laid on his heart the necessities of the great dark land east of Jordan, and in a spirit of true Christian heroism, he resolved to go forth, single-handed, to the work of evangelization. He left the comparative comforts of his mountain home for the rude life of these wild regions, with no protection but that of his Divine Master, counting the salvation of Moslem and Druze equally precious with that of his own people. He made his way into el-Leja, staying in villages where he could find a home for a little, and, when his position grew dangerous, passing to others, carrying some little of the light of civilization, as well as the evangel. Thus, arriving at Dama, he took possession of an empty wooden house, put wooden frames with glass in the windows, swung a wooden door on hinges in the doorway, and arranged his scanty furniture within. The village lacked good water, so he had an old well cleaned out and repaired, and soon it was filled with wholesome rain-water. For about a year he went out and in among the war-like inhabitants, seeking to teach them the way of the Prince of Peace. A belief got abroad that he had found treasure among the ruins, and had it concealed in the house. A conspiracy was formed to kill and plunder him. He got news of the fact, and, seeing that his life was no longer safe, he was fain to move to another village, leaving a well of clear, cold water to preserve his memory, and, let us hope, also in some hearts a light that will lead to the Fountain of living waters. Exactly where he is now, I do not know, but I believe he is still in the district. "Persecuted in one city, he flees unto another."

After some hours' riding from Dama to the south-east, we approached the border of el-Leja. The path before us darkened again, and we entered the most forbidding tract of country we had yet seen. Scorched and blackened by the elemental fires, the volcanic rocks towered high in great, irregular masses, or stretched out in stone-strewn levels, rent and torn in every direction into wide chasms, whose horrid, jagged lips seemed yawning to devour us, while black mounds rose around, like the remains of long-extinguished, huge bonfires. This was the scene of Ibrahim Pasha's signal defeat. It is a natural fortress, which a few resolute spirits might easily defend. Indeed, until one has seen this part, he cannot realize how fully the district justifies its name—el-Leja ("retreat" or "refuge.")

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Plain Dress of a Friend.

Those who are using their positions and influence to remove the restraint which the plain garb of a Friend has until recently exercised on both younger and older, are opening more widely the avenues which lead away from comparative innocence and safety, and incurring a fearful responsibility of being instrumental in betraying them into a refusal to wear the yoke of Christ.

Where the plain dress of a Friend is rejected by members holding influential stations in the Society, supposing that they themselves do not change with every fashion, which they are likely to do, it is vain to expect moderation in dress among those who look up to them for examples. To believe that the change from the plain dress is sanctioned by the Head of the Church, is to discredit the experience or the truthfulness of the faithful members of the Society, from its rise to the present day; for we venture to say that of all such, of whose lives and conversation records have been preserved, not one can be cited who did not show by his garb that he was not ashamed to be recognized as a Friend. On the contrary, those records teem with expressions of religious exercise such were brought under, that the members should not depart from the dress which marked to what Society they belonged. How many who had been accustomed to wear the form of the world, whether educated in the Society or not, found they could make little or no progress in religious life, nor obtain peace of mind, until they were made willing, by the convictions and teaching of Divine Grace, to put on the apparel of a Friend. Can we then believe that this same Grace should instruct any among us to go back to that which so many succeeding generations before us have been obliged by it to come out of?—Selected.

In an editorial letter in The Dawn Josephine E. Butler says:—"There is a temptation in these days to become too busy, and submit to be overburdened with work. Half-an-hour in the presence of God, sitting silent and receptive, is often more fruitful for the promotion of public justice than a whole day of ceaseless activity!"

TO OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

Among the thousands who with hail and cheer
Will welcome thy new year,
How few of all have passed, as thou and I,
So many milestones by!

We have grown old together; we have seen,
Our youth and age between,
Two generations leave us, and to-day
We with the third hold way.

Loving and loved. If thought must backward run
To those who, one by one,
In the great silence and the dark beyond
Vanished with farewells fond,

Unseen, not lost, our grateful memories still
Their vacant places fill,
And with the full-voiced greeting of new friends
A tenderer whisper blends.

Linked close in a pathetic brotherhood
Of mingled ill and good,
Of joy and grief, of grandeur and of shame,
For pity more than blame,—

The gift is thine the weary world to make
More cheerful for thy sake,
Soothing the ears its Miserere pains,
With the old Hellenic strains.

Lighting the sullen face of discontent
With smiles for blessings sent.
Enough of selfish wailing has been had,
Thank God! for notes more glad,

Life indeed is no holiday: therein
Are want and woe and sin,
Death and its nameless fears, and over all
Our pitying tears must fall.

Thy hand, old friend! the services of our days,
In differing moods and ways,
May prove to those who follow in our train
Not valueless nor vain.

Far off, and faint as echoes of a dream,
The songs of boyhood seem;
Yet on our autumn boughs, unflown with spring,
The evening thrushes sing.

The hour draws near, how'er delayed and late,
When at the Eternal Gate
We leave the words and works we call our own,
And lift void hands alone,

For love to fill. Our nakedness of soul
Brings to that Gate no toll:
Giftless we come to Him, who all things gives,
And live because He lives.

HOLD THE TRAIN.

"Madam, we miss the train at B——."

"But can't you make it, sir?" she gasped,

"Impossible, it leaves at three,

And we are due, a quarter past."

"Is there no way? Oh, tell me, then,

Are you a Christian?" "I am not."

"And are there none among the men

Who run the train?" "No—I forgot—

I think the fellow over here,

Oiling the engine, claims to be."

She threw upon the engineer

A fair face, white with agony.

"Are you a Christian?" "Yes, I am."

"Then, O sir won't you pray with me,

All the long way, that God will stay,

That God will hold the train at B——?"

"'Twill do no good; it's due at three,

And"—"Yes, but God can hold the train;

My dying child is calling me,

And I must see her face again;

Oh, won't you pray?" "I will," a nod

Emphatic, as he takes his place.

When Christians grasp the arm of God,

They grasp the power that rules the rod.

Out from the station swept the train

On time, swept past wood and lea;

The engineer, with cheeks aflame,

Prayed, "O Lord, hold the train at B——."

Then flung the throttles wide, and like

Some giant monster of the plain,

With panting side and mighty strides,

Past hill and valley swept the train.

A half, a minute, two are gained;

Along those burnished lines of steel

His glances leap, each nerve is strained,

And still he prays with fervent zeal.

Heart, hand, and brain, with one accord,

Work while his prayer ascends to heaven—

"Just hold the train eight minutes, Lord,

And I'll make up the other seven."

With rush and roar through meadow lands,

Past cottage home and green hillsides,

The panting thing obeys his hands,

And speeds along with giant strides.

* * * * *

They say an accident delayed

The train a little while; but He

Who listened while his children prayed,

In answer, held the train at B——.

[A Friend suggests that it would be a suitable time to publish in THE FRIEND, the following letter, written one hundred and one year ago by Richard Shackleton, on the occasion of a revision of the Queries, by London Yearly Meeting.—Ed.]

FROM R. SHACKLETON TO HIS WIFE.

"LONDON, 12th of Fifth Month, 1791."

* * * "Last afternoon I attended another sitting of the Committee on the Queries. It is a very difficult job to get on with; there is so much critical accuracy about choice of words. I had to rub up my old Greek, and to give my interpretation of a word, in the original language of the New Testament. However I felt the power, which gathered us to be a people, near, as they were framing and fashioning patterns for the discipline of the church; and I bowed in humility and thankfulness to the Power, and travailed for a blessing, on the endeavors used for the preservation and strengthening of that which yet remains of glory and excellence amongst us. My cry also was, and is, for wisdom, that I may be instructed to be have myself aright in the house of God; and if I meddle at all, that it may be with clean hands and a wise heart. There is too much of the mere natural and superficial amongst us; there is want of going deeper down than man do. These things, the propagation and promotion of vital Christianity, are solemn, awful and ponderous. Who is sufficient for them? Not the wise and learned in the wisdom of the world; not the rich and great in earthly possessions and rank; not the prudent and craft in human policy; but those whose sufficiency is of and from the Lord Almighty, who have no confidence in that part of themselves which appertains to the flesh; who are as willing to be nothing as anything, and who seek not themselves nor their own honor, but the honor which cometh from God only. And such, I am persuaded, are still mercifully preserved. * * * It is not in the power of our nature to acquire the knowledge of the truth; it is not in us to retain it in our experience; but we may receive it easily and readily, as in a moment, dissipate and squander it away, and lose it forever. Yet while we preach to others, while we handle the law and support the testimony, we may, without watchfulness and religious fear, become away from Divine favor, and die to any sensations of good, or capacity to do good. So let us fear as well as love, and be sure to take heed to ourselves first, then to the flock, the sheep and lambs of Christ, if indeed we feel that we are appointed by the Chief Shepherd to take any oversight thereof.

Iowa Yearly Meeting.

Iowa Yearly Meeting, conservative, held this year at Earlham, Madison Co., Iowa, has just closed, its sittings extending from the 5th to the 10th, inclusive.

The company was smaller than on some former occasions, but it was clearly marked as one having great interest and concern that the simple Christianity professed by Friends might be maintained and spread.

There was quite a large representation from the Yearly Meetings—Kansas and Western especially.

The condition of the body as exhibited by the answers to the Queries gave occasion for much exercise of spirit, with fervent desires that more faithfulness might be the lot of its members, while thankfulness was felt for what was apparent in that direction.

The testimonies all pointed to the matter of personal religion as indispensable to the possession of true Quakerism, taking up the cross and following Jesus being fundamental to the life hid with Christ in God.

All were impressively reminded that that which distinguished the Society of Friends from the world and from many who profess Christianity is our full acceptance of the doctrine of immediate revelation, and belief in the reality of the guidance of the Holy Spirit, the result being spiritual worship and simplification of life, the testimonies against war and the worldly spirit, worldliness and formality in religion are merely incidents of fellowship with Christ, who is the prince of peace, whose kingdom is not of this world, and whose lips declared that God is a spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth.

Hirelingism in connection with the Christian ministry was forcibly pointed to as in conflict with the very nature of that service, and the prevailing cause of much error obtaining under the name of religion. Early Friends had this conviction, suffering bitterly in connection therewith, and while touching reference was made to that much tenderness of spirit covered the assembly, and loving counsel was extended, with the reminder that faithfulness in this regard must be paramount in the body to-day, if existence itself is to be continued. Hirelingism and Quakerism have no communion, a professional ministry and a free gospel have no fellowship. Correspondence with the six conservative Yearly Meetings on this continent is still kept up under a sense of true brotherly love and Christian regard. Epistles from each were read, proving a means of encouragement and strength to all concerned.

Much anxiety was felt touching the effort now being made by this Yearly Meeting for the proper education of the youth in membership, and at others. Comfort was taken from the fact that the first year's results of the Boarding School showed genuine success. During the winter term the capacity of the institution was fully taxed, while the progress of the students was in keeping with their deportment, highly satisfactory.

The widely separated location of many of our members and the peculiar needs of the smaller meetings became the subject of weighty consideration, occupying much of the time of the session, when liberty seemed to come from the Head of the Church to appoint some Friends to have care in these matters, and as Divine aid is imparted to open correspondence and make such visits as would be honoring to God and profitable to men. They are expected to report next year.

A donation from a Friend in England to the care of a member of the meeting for sufferings, for the purpose of placing our approved writings where the public might become better informed regarding the religious profession of Friends, brought the subject of usefulness in that direction under serious consideration of that body, which resulted in the appointment of a committee, to have copies of George Fox's Journal, Barclay's Apology, etc., placed in some public libraries, and as way opens, in those of advanced schools and colleges. Recommendation was made that this effort should not be limited to the donation referred to, but that contributions be given by members of the Yearly Meeting for extensive labor in what appears to be an important sphere of Christian influence.

It can truly be said that devotion, living spiritual concern and harmony characterized the assembly throughout.

Clarkson T. Penrose and Milton Mills were continued as clerk and assistant clerk.

The Meeting takes place at West Branch, Cedar Co., Iowa, next year. A. C.

John G. Whittier.

[The London and British Friend both contain articles which show the affectionate esteem felt for our deceased friend, J. G. Whittier. From the former we copy the following letter, written by him in reply to one addressed to him by fifty of his admirers.]

AMESBURY, Tenth Month 30th, 1882.

My Dear Friends:—Your letter has reached me, and I have read it with a feeling of gratitude to our Heavenly Father for its words of tender sympathy and encouragement.

Especially am I glad that so many dear Friends, whose names recall the worthies of past generations, are able to partake with me of the great hope that He whose will it is that all should turn to Him and live, and whose tender mercy endureth forever and is over all the works of his hands, will do the best that is possible for all his creatures. What that may be we know not, but we can trust Him to the uttermost.

This hope and this trust in the mercy of the All Merciful I have felt impelled to express, yet with a solemn recognition of the awful consequences of alienation from Him; and a full realization of the truth that sin and suffering are inseparable. There is a passage in the prayer of John Woolman on his death-bed, which has often occurred to me when the burden of the sin and sorrow of the world has rested heavily upon me: "I felt the misery of my fellow-creatures separated from the Divine harmony, and it was greater than I could bear, and I was crushed down under it. In the depth of misery I remembered that Thou art omnipotent and that I had called Thee Father; and I felt that I loved Thee, and I was made quiet in my will, and waited for deliverance from Thee."

Let me say that the hope which I tremblingly cherish for myself and my fellow-creatures rests, not upon any work or merit of our own, but upon the Infinite Love manifested in the life and death of the Divine Master, and the measure of light and grace afforded to all. In the communion of fellowship of that faith in the teaching and guidance of the Spirit of Truth which is the vital principle of our religious Society.

I am affectionately and gratefully,

Your friend, JOHN G. WHITTIER.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Trip to Ohio.

On the 21st of Ninth Month I left home to pay a short visit in the State of Ohio, going by way of Baltimore and Washington. The object of my visit was neither botanical nor geological, yet a traveller who keeps his eyes open, can scarcely pass over so much ground without seeing something to attract his attention and interest.

One of the first things I noticed was a flock of small white butterflies hovering over a field of cabbage. I suppose it was the Cabbage butterfly, called by Harris Pontia oleracea, in which the hind wings are not scalloped nor tailed, but are rounded and entire on the edges. They are first noticed about the beginning of the Sixth Mo., about cabbage, radish, turnip and other plants belonging to the natural order of Cruciferae, which have a pungent taste. On these they lay their eggs, which are fastened to the under side of the leaves. The caterpillars are of a pale green color, and not easily distinguished from the ribs of the leaves on which they feed. It is not unusual to see the outer leaves of the cabbage plants completely riddled and almost destroyed by these voracious insects. In about a month from the laying of the egg, the worm has attained its full size, and retires beneath poles, the edge of stones or into other places of safety, and changes into a chrysalis, of a green or white color, dotted with black, and of an angular shape. In eleven days it comes forth as a butterfly, and about the beginning of the Eighth Month lays its eggs for a second brood of caterpillars. The chrysalis produced from these remains unchanged during the winter in the climate of Massachusetts, and the butterflies come forth in the Fifth or Sixth Month of the following year.

The vacant lots and waste grounds near Philadelphia, by the side of which our railroad had been located, were largely covered with plants of the Goosefoot family (Chenopodium), such as the common Lamb's Quarters. They are mostly free from poisonous qualities, though unattractive in appearance, and despised as weeds, yet the family furnishes two plants of culinary value—the spinach and the beet. Why the family should show such a preference for waste lots as to be almost confined to them, except those species which grow on the sands of the sea coast, is a question more easily asked than answered.

Although it was late in the season for flowering plants, yet we passed many fields rich with Golden Rods, Asters and Sun-flowers (Helianthus), and the bright maroon leaves of some of the bushes, added to the variety of coloring displayed.

In some places cuts of considerable depth had been made in ground composed of clay and sand, gravel and similar material, and the banks furnished us with an instructive illustration of the power of running water to remove these materials, and by its irregular action to produce ravines, and leave ridges and isolated hills. In time of heavy rains, the water from the country back of the railroad cuttings naturally followed the slope of the ground, and when it found a slight depression flowed down, thus washing away the soil and making a deeper and deeper channel. Thus, in places, the banks had become deeply and irregularly furrowed. Here we saw on a small scale, what was exhibited some hours after on a much grander field of nature's operations, when we had crossed the Allegheny Mountains and were among the high and steep hills that border the Ohio River. The character of these hills and of the valleys that lie between them show that anciently the country west of the Allegheny Mountains, and reaching far into the State of Ohio, was an extensive plain underlaid with a series of rocks lying in nearly horizontal layers, and that in the lapse of ages the Ohio River had cut through these a channel for its waters several hundred feet in depth, and formed the valley in which it flows; and that into this valley the surplus waters of the adjacent districts had found their way, washing out numerous channels which now intersect the country, and make the borders of the Ohio a succession of steep hills; hills formed out of the plain by removing the earth and rocks which at one time filled the valleys—hills of denudation, as geologists term them.

A day or so before leaving home, two serious railroad collisions, accompanied with loss of life had occurred, which naturally led one who was cooped up in the berth of a sleeping car to reflect on his helpless condition, if an accident should occur. Through the kindness of Him who watches over all his works, our journey was made safely, although through the length of the trains our progress was slow. The late meeting of the Grand Army of the Republic at Washington had caused so much travel to and from that point, that the railroads leading to it were greatly taxed. The officers on our train said that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad alone, had put on 150 extra trains, and had moved 150,000 persons on that occasion. We cannot wonder that those who had been fellow soldiers in the war should feel much interest in such a reunion, but when we consider the enormous expense involved in this celebration, and still more its tendency to blind the mental eyesight to the evils and wickedness, necessarily connected with military operations, its effect should be to produce feelings of sadness rather than of rejoicing in the minds of thoughtful Christians.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad follows up the valley of the Potomac River to the foot of the Allegheny Mountains, the top of which it reaches near Altamont station. Then it passes for many miles over the gently undulating surface of the summit, mostly free from timber and richly clothed with grass. Here the Railroad Company have built extensive boarding houses for the accommodation of summer guests. One soon notices that the streams of water which form on this plateau are flowing westward, and that he has passed the dividing line which separates the waters that enter the Atlantic Ocean through Chesapeake Bay, from those which descend the Ohio and Mississippi into the Gulf of Mexico. As parts of the plateau are quite level and swampy, it is very possible that there may be spots in it where a single step may change the tourist from one water shed to the other! How typical does this seem of human life. Two persons may stand as it were on the same plane, and start together in life. But one may incline in one direction, and yielding to the temptations of the Evil One, may go on from bad to worse, until they become far separated, physically, morally and spiritually. J. W.

What alcohol is to the physical man, that ritualism is to the spiritual nature, a delusive power that begins by unhealthy though fascinating and bewildering excitement, and ends in fatal stupor, more or less intense in proportion to the degree in which it is indulged.

Progress.

While advanced steps in practical Christianity fail to be discovered, arts and sciences seem to be making rapid strides toward perfection. Is it not strange that attachments to earth should gain pre-eminence beyond the proportionate value of things? And yet so it is, and why is it so? Is it not because "strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leads to Life"—while in the broad way there is room enough for every kind of merchandise that earth's pilgrims may choose to take along with them? The difference is between narrow and broad. That which is sensual finds no place in the narrow way, while the true seekers after truth find no delights when entering the wide gate. But as they repent and turn about and enter the strait gate, it is found there is room enough for rational gratifications.

There are many enticements to the broad way, but they are all of a deceiving character, promising to give enjoyment to the rational mind—but never, never fulfil a promise. Is the matter duly considered when bartering with eternal life on the same level as though of equal worth with the things of time and sense?

Why shun the cross? Without it none can be the disciples of the blessed Jesus. Who can ascend the Ladder of Faith and know of the companionship of angels without first making choice of the good, the just, the right and the true? Whoever makes this wise choice is found ascending the Hill of Zion that leads to the Paradise of God. Every step is seen to mount the rugged path upward and onward until the final song of triumph is perfected. Glory to God and the Lamb.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE LAST SICKNESS OF DR. BENNETT WING, LATE OF SANDWICH, MASS.

A few expressions of Bennett Wing, dropped from his lips a few days previous to his departure. His decease was on the 9th of Eighth Month, 1842.

A friend having called to see him, he expressed as follows: "I am glad thou hast called to see me. I am very low and weak. I am fast passing away. I think death has already seized the extremities. I feel the cold chill. When I was first attacked I apprehended this would be my last illness, and had I been taken away suddenly three weeks ago, where should I have been? I should have had no ground of hope. Some time before my illness, I clearly saw that my course of life was inconsistent with the Truth, and especially my deviation in dress and address. I sometimes thought that I should take up the cross, but it was not attended to. My deviations in regard to dress and address and disregard to those testimonies that our ancient Friends found themselves called to bear, have caused me much sorrow and anguish of heart in the forepart of my illness.

I should have been willing to have given my life in sacrifice if I could have felt easy on account of my deviations. I have had a great work to do in a little time, a short time to prepare for death, but I have labored night and day; I have cried unto the Lord, and in his loving kindness and tender mercy He has been pleased to hear my cry. On seeing the unprepared state I was in to leave the world, I cast myself into the arms of a merciful God, and He was pleased to have mercy upon me, and now feel peace of mind, and believe I shall find resting place." He said to the friend who he called to see him, "We shall soon separate, but I hope that we may meet again in the kingdom of heaven." Then directing his attention to young woman who was a member of the Society of Friends, said, "I have said much to my beloved wife in regard to her putting on a plain dress and using the plain simple language, and those testimonies that Friends feel concerned to bear, and as she has a talent to improve, I have now thought that she now might become useful in society, and my desire is that thee may so follow her example as she follows Christ. I not be ashamed to put on a plain dress and use the plain language at all times and to all persons. Do be wiser than I have been, for I have trampled on those things." Then turning to young Friend who was a physician, said, "I am very sorry thou hast learned to be a doctor, will be likely to draw away thy mind from better things; studying physic has been a hurt to me. But seek first the kingdom of heaven and the righteousness thereof, and all other things will be added unto thee." Put on a plain dress and use the plain language of Scripture to all persons and no mister. Be frequent in the attendance of Friends' Meetings, and thy reputation will be none the less, and thy purse will never weigh a grain the lighter.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Fifth Satellite of Jupiter.—It had long been known that the planet Jupiter was attended with four small satellites or moons, which revolve around the larger planet. Their sizes, distances from the planet and time of revolution had been calculated from the observations made by astronomers. Quite recently, as E. E. Barnard was watching the heavens with the great telescope of the Lick Observatory from the summit of Mt. Hamilton, he detected a tiny point of light closely following the planet Jupiter, and near its third satellite. He at once began measuring its distance from the third satellite and angular positions with respect to it. But it soon disappeared in the glare of Jupiter. From the fact that it was not left behind by the planet, in its motion through the heavens, as would have been the case if it had been a fixed star, he was convinced that it was one of Jupiter's attendants. The following night, shortly before midnight, the satellite was discovered coming out from behind the planet. It receded to a distance of about 36", when it became stationary, then approached the planet and was lost in its glow.

Prof. Barnard estimates the size of this newly discovered member of our system as not more than one hundred miles in diameter—and that it revolves around Jupiter about twice in twenty-four hours. From its small size and nearness to the large planet, only the most powerful telescopes will show it.

A Remarkable Banquet.—"I have eaten apples that ripened more than 1800 years ago, bread made from wheat grown before the children of Israel passed through the Red Sea, spread with butter that was made when Elizabeth, Queen of England, and washed down the banquet with wine that was old when Columbus was playing barefoot with the boys of Genoa" is the remarkable statement made by a writer in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. "The remarkable 'spread' was given by an antiquarian named Geobel, in the city of Brussels, in 1871." The ples were from an earthen jar taken from the ruins of Pompeii, that buried city to whose people we owe our knowledge of canning fruit. The wheat was taken from a chamber in one of the smaller pyramids, the butter from a stone cell in an old well in Scotland, where for centuries it had lain in an earthen crock in icy water, and the wine was recovered from an old cask in the city of Corinth. There were six plates at the table, and each had a mouthful of bread and a teaspoonful of the wine, but was permitted to help himself liberally to the butter, there being several pounds of it. The earthen jar held about two-thirds of a gallon, and the fruit was as sweet and the flavor as fine as though put up yesterday."—Selected.

A Cat and Wrens.—In the mountain districts of Pennsylvania two wrens had built their nest under the eaves of an old farm house, and there they reared a small and interesting family. Among the attachés of the farmer's household was a white cat, and when the wrens became so tame that they used to hop around the piazza in search of bread crumbs the cat would lie in wait for them, and several times came within arms' length of catching the adult birds. When the farmer noticed this he kicked the cat, and she finally learned that it was dangerous to fool with wrens.

When the baby wrens grew larger, one of them one day fell out of the nest, and being too weak to run and unable to fly, lay helpless on the grass. The cat saw the accident and ran rapidly to seize the bird, but, seeming to remember the lesson taught her, when she reached the helpless little thing, she only touched it daintily with her paw and then lay down and watched.

Presently there came a black and yellow den snake toward the fluttering birdling. The snake was dozing and was awakened by the fluttering of the bird. Instantly she rose and struck the reptile with her paw. This was an enemy the snake did not appreciate, but it was hungry, and darted forward and attempted to seize the bird under the very shelter of the cat's head.

Like a flash the cat seized the snake just back of the head and killed it with one bite. When the farmer happened along in the afternoon he found the cat crouching in the grass sheltering the bird, and ten feet away was the dead snake. This made it clear that the cat had carried the bird away from the snake, and the young adventurer was soon restored to its anxious parents. —Brandon Bucksaw.

Can Horses Talk.—That cattle and horses can communicate intelligence to each other, and are endowed with a certain amount of reasoning faculty, the following facts are pretty conclusive proof of: I once purchased a station in Australia in which a large number of cattle and horses had gone wild. To get the cattle in I fenced a permanent water (a distance of twenty miles) and set traps at intervals. At first this answered all right, but soon the cattle became exceedingly cautious about entering the trap, waiting outside for two or three nights before going in, and, if they could smell a man or his tracks, not going in at all. A mob would come to the trap gate, and one would go in and drink and come out, and then another would come out and do the same, and so on till all had watered. They had finally arrived at the conclusion that I would catch one and frighten all the others away. To get in the wild horses, 600 of which were ranging on a large plain (about 20,000 acres, I fenced a stock yard with a gradually widening opening in a hollow where it could not easily be seen, and by stationing horsemen at intervals on the plain, galloped the wild horses in. My first hunt (which lasted for some days) was successful, the wild horses heading toward the mouth of the lane without much difficulty, but of course some escaped by charging back at the stock yard gate and in other ways. My second hunt, about a month later, was a failure; every mob of horses on the plain seemed to know where the yard was, and would not head that way. This seems to show that the horses that escaped from the first hunt told all the others where the stock-yard was.

Sac and Fox Indians.—From the Report to Government of the United States Agent and other sources, we glean that considerable improvement is to be observed in the condition of the Iowa Indians. Although classed together for its own convenience by the United States authorities, yet the Sac Indians live exclusively in the Indian Territory, and the Fox Indians on the lands they own in Iowa. Their number is reported to be 392, of whom 102 are between the ages of six and sixteen. Although a school is kept up among them, and the improvement of the scholars is good yet comparatively few of the children attend it. Hopes are entertained that the visits of the women members of the committee of Ohio Yearly Meeting will much promote the attention to education among them; for they can influence the Indians of their own sex—and the Indian women practically control the action of the tribe.

Formerly these Indians had winter-houses made of the cat-tail reeds and plastered so as to be tight—and summer-houses more open to the air—but the number of houses built of lumber has largely increased. The yards about them are kept scrupulously clean. One curious fact was stated by Thomas C. Battey, author of A Quaker among the Indians, and confirmed by another Friend, who had been much among them, that many of the Indians who had never been to school were able to write in the Indian language, using the English script—and that they did write many letters. How they acquired this art they could never find out, as the Indians would reply to no questions respecting it.

Seventh-day Adventists.—Several men of this persuasion were imprisoned and fined in Tennessee during the past summer, for the violation of a statute prohibiting the exercise of the ordinary avocations of life on the First-day of the week. These people observe the Seventh-day of the week as a day of rest, instead of the First-day. It is not probable that the law was meant to cover such cases—and if the sufferers are faithful to their convictions, and patiently suffer the unjust penalties fastened upon them, it is probable that the sympathies of their fellow-citizens will compel such a change in the wording of the law, as will relieve them of the hard usage to which they have been exposed.

An American Friend on the New Quaker Methods.—"I do not think that the difficulty in reference to pastors arises so much from assisting a minister who feels a concern about settling in a small meeting, as that may be adjusted within apostolic limitations; but in this country, especially in Iowa Yearly Meeting (and to a very considerable extent elsewhere), the attempt to put, in some instances without the wish of many of the members,—a pastor over old settled meetings, has resulted in totally changing the organization of the church; and creates a headship in each meeting, which I esteem quite contrary to the apostolic ideal, and certainly very contrary to the views of our early Friends. It has transformed the whole church in Iowa into a body simply like the other protestant churches around, and to a great extent done away with many of our distinguishing views. Very little silence, if any, is allowed in the meetings, and it is looked upon as burdensome.

"The whole system of the creation of ministers is also undergoing a change, and instead of growing up by the exercise of their gift, the young men and women now feel called to be educated and trained for the work. How far this can be done within Quaker limits, is, of course, undeveloped; but to me it looks as if the Society is undergoing so great a change as to make it an entirely different body from what it has been heretofore."—British Friend.

We are made more unhappy by the ills we fear than by those we suffer.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 29, 1892.

We have been favored with the perusal of two letters written to a mutual friend by one who is a minister in the Larger Body, Kansas Yearly Meeting, but who does not unite with some of the doctrines and practices which have spread within its borders of latter time. We take from them the following extracts, both because they throw some light on the practical workings of the system of paid pastorates in discouraging the practice of ministers (which has prevailed among us from our first existence as a Society) of visiting from meeting to meeting as they were led by the Spirit of Christ; and also because of the remarks they contain in harmony with the sentiments of a Friend in another part of the land, as published in our editorial column of week before last. After speaking in terms of commendation of the article in THE FRIEND of Eighth Month 27th, entitled "Inward Revelation the Primary Rule," the letters say:

"It is very evident that the teaching we have had is not going to stand the test. The ministry has largely ceased to travel abroad. The home ministry is much discouraged. That part of the ministry that wants pay wont come without it, and the meetings do not seem disposed to raise a sufficient amount to bring them. Frivolous excuses keep members at home from meetings, especially monthly and week-day meetings; and many take less interest when there than in the past. Has not the time come (predicted years ago) when a true Friends' minister would be in demand? J. E. Rhoads' experience on the Pacific coast will be, I believe, the experience of many, if the ministers would take up their cross and go out in the work at their Lord's call. It is true they would, as he did, meet with many trying meetings, but would it not be a good chance to reprove, rebuke, exhort, &c.?"

"To me the saddest thing in our condition is that the conservative Friends make so little effort to keep together, and work hand to hand to build up the cause for which our fathers suffered. I believe there is but one way to save the Society, and that is by teaching sound truth and exposing the unsound; and when the sound ministry will give themselves wholly to the Lord for this work He will lead them to victory. May the Lord hasten the day when the ministers shall put on their whole armor and bare their breasts to the storm!"

The larger and wealthier congregations, which can afford to pay large salaries, naturally draw to themselves those pastors who have the most reputation for eloquence and ability—while the smaller and poorer meetings are forced to content themselves with an inferior class of preachers. But it may be doubted whether the rich meetings gain anything, in a spiritual sense, by this working of the system. The very essence of priestcraft is the interposition of some mortal between the soul and its Creator; and the more the preacher is looked up to and admired, the more danger there is of the people coming to depend on him for spiritual light and help.

When we consider these effects of the system of paid pastorates (the hiring ministry of old-time Friends) and further its tendency to prevent the development of spiritual gifts in the congregations, and remember the declaration of our Saviour, "By their fruits ye shall know them," may we not reasonably conclude that the whole thing comes from an evil root—that it is one of the devices of the Enemy of man to lead away from the Truth and to bring our members back into practices which George Fox and his fellow-laborers unqualifiedly rejected and testified against?

We have received some comments on the proceedings of the new Yearly Meeting held at Wilmington, Ohio, but as we have not been furnished with a narrative of its proceedings we do not think best to publish them.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Caroline Scott Harrison, wife of President Harrison, died in Washington, on the morning of the 25th inst., at 1.40 o'clock.

A decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals at St. Paul, upon a case involving the Inter-State Commerce law, declares that through lines are not local lines, nor through tariffs local tariffs, within the provisions of the Inter-State Commerce law.

The Cherokee Commission has reached an agreement with the Comanche Kiowas and Apache tribes, by which the Indians will accept allotments in severalty and relinquish the rest of the reservation for settlement. For this surrender the Government is to pay $2,000,000. The land lies between the Washita and Red rivers, in the southwestern corner of the Indian Territory, and embraces nearly 3,000,000 acres.

It was estimated that 75,000 persons took part in the civic parade in Chicago, on the 20th inst., and that the spectators numbered over a million. The procession was reviewed by Vice-President Morton.

The World's Fair Buildings in Chicago were dedicated on the 21st inst. Preceding the ceremonies in the Manufacturers Building was a military parade. The notable guests were escorted to the Park by United States troops. In the building they were greeted by an audience of over one hundred thousand persons. Only those in the immediate vicinity of the platform could hear the speakers. The buildings were dedicated by Vice-President Morton. The dedicatory oration was delivered by Henry Watterson, and the Columbian oration by Chauncey M. Depew. Addresses were made by Exposition officials and prayers were made by Bishop Fowler and Cardinal Gibbons.

The introduction of reindeer into Alaska has been successfully accomplished, the Captain of the revenue cutter reports. He secured 177 animals in Northeastern Siberia, and safely transported them to port Clarence, where quarters were provided, and the animals were thriving. They are to be used as a means of communication with the stations and missions along the Yukon River during the winter.

The Lutheran Synod of Kansas, now in session at Kansas City, has adopted an address urging the people of the State to oppose, at the coming election, candidates who favor the resubmission to a vote of the people of the prohibitory amendment.

Valuable deposits of talcose silica carrying a large percentage of corundum are said to have been discovered in Colorado.

In the Lebanon and Schuylkill Valleys in this State general alarm is felt owing to drought, water scarcity and mountain fires. In the country districts hundreds of wells are dry in every township, and farmers have to go great distances for the water. The fields which were plowed and sown a month ago are baked hard and dry. The once productive fields seem to be covered with nothing but barren dust, and in many instances the seed sown early has refused to develop, while farmers are plowing them over again. The low condition of the Schuylkill is explained by the fact that all the streams which empty into it have dwindled away mere into rivulets.

Extensive forest fires are doing great damage in the mountainous parts of the State, and the drouth is general.

A despatch from Indianapolis of the 20th inst., states that on that day the Conference of the Yearly Meetings of Friends devoted its time to the discussion of the pastoral system, which, although practically in vogue in the Society almost everywhere, had never been formally recognized or authorized. After a full discussion the following declaration was adopted, and will be sent out to all the Yearly Meetings represented as the sense of this General Conference:

"This Conference desires to urge upon Friends everywhere the importance of the diligent exercise of the various spiritual gifts bestowed by the Master, especially those of the ministry of the word and of the pastoral care of the flocks of God. In connection with these services the Church is reminded of its duty in making such provisions as may be necessary for the support of those who give their time to the work, so that the Gospel may not be hindered or the shepherding of the flock impaired by the want of pecuniary means.

"At the time that we strongly commend a proper pastoral system, we desire that Friends will be careful to see that it is not abused by the assumption of undue authority on the part of the Pastors, by their standing in the way of any service the Lord may lay upon others, or by leading the members of the flock to look to and depend upon human agency instead of the Divine Shepherd and Bishop of our souls himself. We believe that the faithful exercise of pastoral care is an important agency in the Master's hand in establishing and building up the membership of the Church."

The adoption of this declaration was almost unanimous, the delegates from Baltimore and a few from North Carolina dissenting.

There were 403 deaths in this city last week, being 13 more than the previous week, and 4 less than the corresponding week last year. Of the whole number, 221 were males and 182 were females; 52 died of consumption; 38 of diphtheria; 36 of diseases of the heart; 22 of marasmus; 21 of pneumonia; 14 of apoplexy; 14 of Bright's disease; 14 of casualties; 14 of cancer; 13 of inanition; 11 of typhoid fever and 11 of inflammation of the brain.

MARKETS, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 114½ a 115½; currency, 6's, 107 a 117.

COTTON advanced ½c. in sympathy with the recent rise in New York, but the market was quiet on a basis of 8½c. for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, $15.00 a $16.00 per ton.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.25; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.85; Western winter, clear, $3.40 a $3.75; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.10; winter patent, $4.10 a $4.40; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.25; do., patent $4.35 a $4.60; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour is quiet and steady at $3.65 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania. Buckwheat flour is dull and barely steady. We quote new at $1.30 a $2 per 100 pounds.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 74 a 74½ cts.

No. 2 mixed corn, 48½ a 49½ cts.

No. 2 white oats, 38 a 39 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 cts.; good, 4½ a 4¾ cts.; medium, 4 a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4 cts.; culls, 3½ cts.; fat cows, 2½ a 3 cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5 a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 4¾ cts.; medium, 4 a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 3¾ cts.; culls, 2 a 3 cts. Lambs, 4 a 5½ cts.

HOGS.—Good Western, 8½ a 8¾ cts.; other Western, 8 a 8½ cts.

FOREIGN.—The Secretary of the Sealers' Association of British Columbia estimates that the total seal catch of British Columbia sealers will be about 35,000 skins, which, as compared with the catch of last year, shows a falling off of 15 per cent.

The official cholera figures for the 19th inst., in Hamburg, show a most gratifying condition of affairs. Only one new case of the disease was reported, while for the first time in months not a single cholera death occurred.

Official details of the new German Army bill were published on the 24th inst. The peace effective from Tenth Month 1st to 1893, to Third Month 31st, 1899, is fixed at 492,068. The service of the infantry is generally reduced to two years. The adoption of this measure is necessary, because the former military preponderance of Germany is gone. The war strength of France is placed at 1,053,000, and of Russia 4,556,000. When the reorganization under the bill is completed the German army will have attained a strength of 4,400,000, whereas France will not be able to exceed her present strength. The bill retains the power of the military authorities to keep men in the rank until they have completed their third year of service. This will be done as a punishment for offences and the military code.

The report is confirmed that the outlay necessitated by the new military bill will be 57,000,000 marks the first year, and 65,000,000 marks yearly afterward. Later advices from Cagliari give an account of a terrible storm and flood in Sardinia, a calamity which hundreds of lives were lost and hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of property were destroyed.

An appalling calamity, caused by the heavy storm, has befallen the village of San Sperate, a short distance from the city of Cagliari. It is estimated that not less than 200 of the villagers have been drowned. The flood swept through the village with sudden fury, and in a moment the streets became rivers. Houses were lifted from their foundations and carried whirling down by the flood. Their occupants did not have an opportunity to attempt to save themselves. Many of them were asleep when the torrent carried off their house, and were awakened only to find themselves struggling in the water. Men, women and children were drowned, and not a single effort could be made to save them, so sudden was the disaster. Half the houses in the village were swept away. The place is isolated by the flood, and access to it is difficult.

The platinum beds of the Ural Mountains, according to the Journal de la Chambre de Commerce de Constantinople, are the only ones in the world in which this metal is found in grains. Platinum is found in Brazil and in the Cordilleras in the hard serpentine rocks, but never in the form of grains. The platinum beds of the Ural Mountains are found in various districts. In the north, at Besserski, in the Governorate of Perm, in the District of Knotourski, and in the State properties of Goroblagodatski, where 66 mining concessions have been granted. All the beds of the northern region are situated in the basin of the R. Tourni, in that of the tributary stream of Taghil, and in other tributaries higher up. On the western declivity of the Ural Mountains there is another platinum bed near the River Outka, a tributary of Tchoussova, and the basins of the higher tributaries of the Outka, near the Ural River. The platinum in these places is in the form of grains, in sand frequently containing gold. The weight of these grains is from 17 to 21 grams to every 1640 kilograms of sand.

It is estimated that the export of wool from the Argentine Republic will this year reach 360,000,000 pounds—a heavy increase over last year, when half the wool was sent to France.

A despatch from Buenos Ayres, dated the 21st inst., says:—The revolt in Santiago del Estero, capital of the province of that name, is assuming formidable proportions. The rebels are in full possession of the capital and have placed the provincial ministers under arrest. The Governor of the Province has asked the National Government to intervene and restore the status quo. The Provincial Guards are arming to oppose the rebels.

Selections from the Life of Mary Dudley.

Her first religious engagement was to Leinster province, Ireland. Which service she entered on in the Third Month, 1787. This visit, as appears from the records, was one that introduced Mary Dudley into much exercise of wit and deep baptisms, on account of the lowliness of things in the different places where her service was cast. Omitting herein, several places visited, as not, at this day, of so much interest, thus writes of being at Mount Mellick:

First-day, 1st of Fourth Month. Sat twice exercising meetings; the sense weightily pressed my mind, that there would be no rest in this place, till individuals come under the washing, sanctifying power of Truth; to which, I think, in the renewed love of the Gospel, they were entreated to attend.

After tea we had a solemn sitting in the family where we were staying, which was a profitable season; liberty was felt to invite the brethren to abide much in stillness, to learn there, and also attend to the language, 'The Master come and calleth for thee;' and, indeed, He seemed calling for that family to support his loved testimonies. I have much hope of the dear children, if the chilling air that surrounds them does not blast their tender shootings.

We had, Second-day, the 9th, a solemn celebrating season at J. G.'s, after which we parted with some dear friends, under a renewed hope of each, in their different portions of labor, would be shielded by Divine power; we had afterwards two family sittings, and dining at —'s, a solemnity ensued; 'The Master hath called of him,' struck my mind, with the remembrance that 'the colt was tied;' caution was fully administered, that neither the world, nor any hindering thing, might tie and confine from going forward, into usefulness. I have great love to this young couple, and wish they may not be hurt by anything in this life. My mind was rather peculiarly attracted towards a young woman who had come to the Quarterly Meeting, and getting her alone, a season following worthy of being held in thankful remembrance, as one wherein the flowing of the Father's love was evident. I felt deep travail that she might obey the call to come thoroughly out from every wrong thing, by submitting to the power of Truth; her mind was much tendered, her words seeming to have entrance, as into softened ground; may no presumptuous hand close the eye and ear which I do believe have been opened in this dear child, though in her appearance gay and trifling; I fear for her, lest some fowls of the air hovering about her may pick up some of the precious seed.

"Thus ended our exercising labor in this place, which is indeed a favored one, though too many seem like the ground which has been often watered, and bringeth forth briars and thorns; few comparatively, concerned for themselves, but depending on the labor of the poor oppressed servants; and I often thought while here, the day was advancing, when the people must be scattered every one to his own; a wrestling seed, however, seems preserved; a little Goshen as in Egypt.

Of Knockballymaher Meeting, she writes:

"This is a poor spot; the members of the meeting far scattered one from another as to places of residence, and I think such situations unfavorable to the right growth; though if all were careful to dwell near the life in themselves, no doubt the animating virtue would diffuse in their assemblies: instead of which, in many places it seems so oppressed that there is scarcely liberty to labor for its arising; it feels as though the hardness in many minds would stone those who are sent unto them.

"Several Friends kindly asked me home with them, but I felt an inclination to go to a family who did not urge it, that of a widow Friend, so went on with them to dinner. After tea we got into stillness, which proved a season of profit to my mind—much instruction was afforded therein, and I thought not only for my own advantage, but that something flowed to the younger part of the company, of which number there were I think nine or ten; some of these felt to me evidently under the cultivating hand, and such as would become fruitful boughs, and their branches run over the wall, if they, like Joseph, abode by the well, whose waters nourish and make green. Some caution was administered not to get out of the valley, where the dew lies long, but to abide in humility and holy fear, that so sound and acceptable fruit might be brought forth. This family manifests that much religious care has been exercised in their education, they are plain, exemplary, and solid—a fine sight in this degenerate day.

"After this visit I saw no way further, and, though the feeling of love was strong to other quarters, I was most satisfied to return home, believing the suspension for a while, might work increasing liberty at some other period if the weight continued; so on Second-day the 16th I set off for Clonmel, and was favored to find my dear husband and children in health; for which blessing, with that of merciful preservation through this journey, I desire humble gratitude may fill my heart to Him, who is indeed the Alpha and Omega of all that is good."

The next religious engagement upon which my dear mother entered, was one of an extensive and deeply important nature; the prospect of this, and her preparation for entering upon the service, will be best described in her own words. Alluding to the year 1787, she says:

"About the fall of that year I was seized with an alarming illness, out of which few expected I should recover, nor did I myself when judging from bodily feelings. As to my mind, it was kept in such a state of deep poverty that I could form no settled judgment respecting anything, save that at some seasons, the evidence of having passed from death unto life, by the feeling of near unity with the brethren, consoled me.

"During this probation, though apparently I was near the closing scene, there were moments when the love of the gospel so prevailed, that a willingness, and even desire to live was felt, so that I might by any means be thought worthy to suffer or do anything for the promotion of truth, and the good of others. These impressions were accompanied with a belief, that if I were raised up again, it would be for this purpose; and my heart was called, at a period when those about me expected my dissolution, to such a deep attention to the discoveries of light, that, as in a vision, though perfectly awake and sensible, I was carried to some distant parts, even to a people of a strange language; where gospel liberty was felt in a remarkable manner: then the vision was again sealed, being for an appointed time, nor did I ever fully understand it, though from that period a solemn covering spread over my mind, till my ever dear and valuable sister S. R. Grubb laid before our Monthly Meeting her concern to visit some parts of France and Germany. The nearness of spirit I had with her, in her watchful attendance on me during the first of my illness, was surprising; and often, when no words passed, we mingled our sighs and tears, though she never gave me any hint of the exercise she was under, nor had I then any perception of being under preparation for any service in conjunction with her.

"After she had obtained her certificates, we united in a little visit to a branch of our Monthly Meeting; and on returning I wished to hasten her departure, but found she felt no liberty to proceed, and said all concern was taken from her; but so closely queried of me respecting my feelings, that without saying much I wept, and thereby discovered what I was struggling against, or at least wished to conceal, believing it was impossible I ever could be resigned to such a movement.

"From this time, the weight grew almost insupportable, so that sleep, appetite and strength, nearly departed from me, and my dear husband queried, after watching unperceived by me, what can this be? He once mentioned France, but I requested him no more to do it, being affected to trembling, and I believe I could as readily have given up my natural life as made this surrender. Oh! great indeed was the struggle, until at length the precious grain of all-conquering faith proved victorious, and believing Him faithful who had promised, I ventured to move in this awful matter, and when the needful steps had been taken, left all and endeavored resignedly to follow my Great Master.

"She had seven children at this time, the youngest only ten weeks old, and her health was very delicate, so that the sacrifice was indeed great, but the merciful extension of proportionate assistance is thus acknowledged by herself:

"In the course of the embassy, many and sore were my provings, and of a closely trying nature my conflicts, but the arm of all sustaining help was near, and I feel thankful that this cup hath been drunk; for though mingled with deep and exercising sufferings, it has, I trust, tended to the further reduction of the creaturely will and choosing, and brought measurably into willingness to submit to the humiliating leadings of the holy hand."

The following is extracted from her own account of this journey:

Second Month 27th, 1788.

"I parted with my beloved husband, and many dear friends, in Waterford, and in company with R. and S. Grubb, went on board a vessel bound for Minehead, setting sail with a tolerably fair wind, but after being out all day, and getting several leagues out to sea, the wind changed, and the captain found it best to put back into harbor. Being very sick we concluded to go on shore about noon, landed at Passage, and spent a comfortable night at Brooklodge; embarked about ten next morning, were favored with a safe, though rather rough passage, to our destined port, and met a kind reception at our friend Hannah Davis's, where, after the inconvenience of sea-sickness, we were consoled by friendly attention.

"We left Minehead on Third-day, and arrived in London on fifth; I was affectionately received by my dear friends J. and M. Eliot, and retired to rest, under, I hope, a thankful sense of many unmerited mercies, with the additional one of hearing from my family that all were well.

"Sixth-day, attended meeting at Grace-church Street—a low time to my poor mind, which seems oppressed, and as it were in prison. Some prospect of moving forward opened this evening, in a conference with G. Dillwyn, who seems bound to the awful service on the continent. It is pleasant to have the prospect of so strong a link to this chain. I am very low and poor, emphatically 'going forth weeping'—may the right seed be kept in dominion! Amidst such qualified servants in this mission how little do I feel myself? Yet I hope I have not entered presumptuously on the list—the cause, I know, is in the best hands, and if my venturing brings no dishonor to it, I hope to be thankful—further seems not now in my view.

REVERENCE.—The Editor of the Australian Friend, after deploring the want of reverence often manifested, mentions as one of the probable causes of it, "The bustle of sensational religion leading to the irreverent handling of sacred things, and to the familiar use of the Holy Name. The speaking of our Saviour as 'dear Jesus' receives no warrant from the sacred writings; and the giving other fondling appellatives to Him is still less in harmony with Scripture reverence. 'God is in Heaven, and thou upon earth, therefore let thy words be few' indicates what should be man's attitude in his approach to his Maker; and seeing that deep reverence caused one under an earlier dispensation to feel unworthy to take the name upon his lips, and that the disciple whom our Saviour loved was unable to look upon Him in his glorified presence, but fell at his feet as one dead, should not we also feel a sense of that presence when we speak of Him—should there not be in us also a manifestation of the feeling that Holy and Reverent is his name?

S. Morris and J. E. Rhoads' Visits.

[Knowing the warm interest felt by many of our readers in the movements of these dear Friends, we give the following extracts from the notes of their voyage from San Francisco to Japan.]

PACIFIC OCEAN, Eighth Month 4th, 1892.

We left the wharf soon after 3 P. M., where a great crowd had gathered to see the new steamer off. Rousing cheers were given as we got under way, and salutes were blown as one steam craft after another was passed as we sailed out the bay. The pilot remained aboard until nearly five o'clock, when the engines were stopped, the ladders let down, and he embarked in a boat to return.

5th.—There is little of interest to be seen on the ocean after one has watched it for a few hours. Its dark waters exhibit scarce any animal life, and only one sail in the offing has been observed since we left sight of land. The gulls, that followed us at first, having white bodies, have disappeared, and their place is taken by larger birds, all dark in color unless a small part near the tail. They seem never to tire; sailing across our course or following close at the stern of the ship. Another sail was seen in the afternoon, far away in the offing.

6th.—Sailing on the line of a great circle of the earth, our course has been much north of west, and should have been continued until 48 degrees north latitude was attained; but for some reason it was changed in the night and is now at 8.30 A. M. S. W. Again at 10.30 it is N. W. one point W. So we may yet reach 48 degrees N. The weather has been somewhat cloudy most of the time, but no rain. The temperature seems warmer this morning than the first day out, the air feeling soft and comfortable.

This morning the Chinese passengers have all been summoned on deck to have their tickets examined. They are a well behaved company so far as we have seen.

Yesterday read aloud for awhile in "How We Got Our Bible" as we sat on deck, which, mingled with interesting conversation on parts of the good book and its writers, passed the time pleasantly, and I trust, profitably.

We had noticed in the printed instructions posted in our cabins, that at certain times the crew would be drilled in the use of the fire apparatus. Accordingly, this afternoon, the bell was hurriedly rung and the whistle blown. A bustle at once took place among the hands, and an officer came running aft with a squad of men, and shortly four streams of water were playing. A number of sailors stood to one of the boats, ready to lower it.

The performance showed us what might take place, provided the men were under good control, in case of an emergency.

7th.—I was somewhat startled toward morning, by the whistle blowing. Looking out in the passages, everything appeared quiet, and I concluded it was on account of fog, which proved correct. It has been repeated several times during the day, as we would come into a low-lying cloud.

Feeling it would be right to ask the people the ship, passengers and officers, to come together (First-day), the Captain had notice posted, and a number of each collected in Social Hall.

Having made some selections in the Bible they were read—being chiefly in the Sermon on the Mount, prefaced by sixteen verses of xxxiii chapter of Ezekiel.

The company was quiet and respectful, though we had been unable to see much evidence of seriousness amongst them. After reading [one of the Friends] addressed the much in correspondence with what had been read, endeavoring to inculcate the need of holy life.

8th.—I remember that to-day is the date the Quarterly Meeting at Media to begin; a desire is felt that much grace may be pressed to build up and establish our Friends in a most holy faith, and that sons and daughters may come to the brightness of Christ's arising, and a going forward in his name be known among us. Then would the Lord rejoice of us once more, and there would be much light on the future of our people, where obscurity now prevails.

11th.—A flock—perhaps it is a family—gulls are following us again. They generally number twelve to fourteen, and, the season think, go from one vessel to another.

It is a week to-day since we left San Francisco, and we have now nearly made our monthly northerly latitude. Our Chinese chamberlain remarked, on coming into my room, "We are near the Aleutians." They are probably the nearest land, though many miles away.

The seven days have gone almost like a dream, so little has there been to mark the time. As many more of fair sailing will bring us near the coast of Japan, near which we may sail for some distance before entering the Bay of Yeddo.

Latitude to-day 47 degrees 3 minutes; longitude, 166 degrees, 20 minutes, W.; distance, 299 miles; course, S., 88½ degrees W.

12th.—It is reported we have passed the halfway point. Distance to-day, 305 miles. Weather being fair, more sails are spread than any day before.

Evening.—Weather thick and drizzling. The wind keeps blowing, and the sea is becoming rougher. This is Sixth-day, and the Captain informs us to-morrow will be First-day, a day being dropped as we enter the eastern hemisphere.

14th, First-day.—The Captain having invited us to have religious services, notice was early posted in the companion-way, and at the sound of the gong, nearly all of our cabin passengers and the ship's officers collected in Social Hall.

Samuel Morris' mind had evidently been exercised about this opportunity, and he selected parts of the Old and New Testaments, several chapters which, after a time of stillness were read. [One of our Friends] then took occasion to speak of the free grace that is common to all, and to press the acceptance of the full redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Afterwards [the other Friend] laid before us the claims of the blessings of the Gospel; inviting some who were undecided, now to receive the message. He spoke at some length, and alluded to the voyage and its risks; that if some sudden catastrophe should happen, how ready all would be then to pray for mercy; that such obligations should not be forgotten when things were going smoothly. Also to its object and end; as every day was bringing us nearer to our desired haven, each period of our lives should be an advance toward a heavenly inheritance.

A good degree of solemnity was manifest, and we felt rewarded for whatever it had cost us. It is ordained that they that preach the Gospel, should live of the Gospel.

Evening.—Have been on deck for some time enjoying the sunshine, of which we have not had much since putting to sea. The waves or swell of many of them large enough to lift the vessel one of them, while this morning there would be three or four in the length of the ship.

Besides the large gulls, I have been watching much smaller bird that flits over the waves, sometimes flying much like a bat. They do not follow the ship, but fly before or at one side for a time and then disappear.

16th.—Bulletin to-day reports distance, 281 miles.

Going up and down hill over the huge waves yesterday made the horizontal distance traversed less than the day before. The miles counted are nautical miles (knots) and not statute. So that when we sail 300 knots, we have gone about 18 English miles.

18th.—This afternoon I had the gratification of seeing a whale spout. He was probably two miles away, and only raised his head above water when he swam. I watched him several minutes until he changed his course and disappeared.

19th.—Our passengers are looking forward with pleasure to seeing land to-morrow. If we have no drawback, we hope to be in Yokohama by evening.

20th.—Awakening early this morning, I was on deck some time before breakfast. Going forward, a company of Chinese were eagerly looking over the sea; joining them, a small vessel was soon descried, and ere long two others, said to be fishing junks. Now, two or three others are in the offing. This indicates we are not far from land, probably about 20 miles. At 9.15 A. M. the coast is plainly in view.

Many fishing craft dot the sea. As we came among them, I noticed many of the men wore clothes with a reddish-brown color, rather bright, which, on closer inspection, proved to be their bare skins shining in the sun. As we came nearer land the fields are beautifully green, and villages dot the shore. At noon theighthouse at the entrance to the bay is plainly in sight. After rounding the point on which stands, there are 42 miles to sail up the bay. The shore has been very much broken up into hills, the sides steep, and pitching in various directions. Much of their surface is wooded; when cleared, they are generally terraced.

Yokohama, evening.—We reached our anchorage about 3.45. The scenes with the boatmen, described by others who have written of them, are re-enacted in all their vigorous vivacity. One of the most marvellous things connected with them was that no one in the melee was knocked into the water.

We concluded to go ashore on a yacht belonging to the Club Hotel, and put up there. The man in charge of us helped to pass our baggage through the Custom House. A short walk brought us to the hotel, which faces the bay, a broad street, the Bund, being in front.

Jinrikishas came into use to convey us to the telegraph office, where our one word despatch is prepared, and after getting our gold exchanged, was paid for in local money. We received 40 per cent. premium for gold.

The weather, though not very hot (84 degrees) is close and oppressive. Light clothing, at once, comes into requisition. We have been visited by Chinese tailors, who wish to fit us out with light pongees, etc.

21st, First-day.—This is only partially observed; the natives keeping on with many occupations. We have kept quietly in the house so far (4 P. M.) but expect to go with George Braithwaite this evening to his meeting at 8 o'clock after taking tea with him. Their morning meeting is at 8, which we thought too early to attend. G. B. called at our hotel last evening bringing your welcome letters. They had been promptly delivered at his house.

The news he had to communicate concerning I. and M. Nitobe having sailed for the United States naturally was a damper to our feelings, upsetting the plans we had laid as a beginning of our labors here. These must now be laid aside, and our minds turned to other sources of information in regard to the opportunities for engaging in the object of our visit. This may require some patience and much watchfulness rightly to undertake and carry out. I hope we may discern the right line to enter upon.

Dr. Whitney and wife are at Kamakura, on the bay, south of here, and we will probably go there one of the first places.

The ride to G. B.'s took us through several streets lined with shops, and full of people. It seems scarcely necessary to describe such scenes, as they are not exaggerated in the books we have at home, so far as I am aware.

The people in the great crowds are peaceable and well behaved, so that one can feel at ease under the novel circumstances.

G. B. lives on the Bluff, a steep ridge forming the backbone of a promontory, on the north side of which Yokohama is built. The street slants up the side of a hill, arrived at the foot of which, we dismounted and soon began to climb steps up its precipitous sides.

Much interesting conversation has filled the time spent with our friend, who has acquired a large amount of knowledge of the people and their language. His account of the latter would be appalling to an ordinary learner, so totally unlike our own is it in structure and forms of expression. No pronoun, nor possessive case. If a servant is to bring his master's hat, the word for hat only is spoken. If it is a guest's hat, the word for honorable is added. Should oranges be wanted, instead of "Go, buy some oranges," the order would be, "Oranges buy, come." The most prominent word is spoken first.

Much circumlocution is used in conversing, and "two friends can talk together for two hours without saying anything."

The written language is that of 400 years ago. The printed language is different from that, and both from the spoken language.

A sheet a yard long will be filled to say, "I have received your letter and will answer it."

The Interpreter used more than twice as many words or sounds to express what was said at the meeting, as [the preacher] did.

Another ride of a mile or more brought us to the meeting place. A room open in front and seated with benches, and a smaller communicating room back, in which the speaker stood, formed the house, which is used for this purpose only. Shoes were removed on entering, and deposited by a woman in attendance in a place under the floor.

The meeting was composed of about eight men and six women, and nearly as many children, besides ourselves. A good many stood outside and listened at the door and window. They sang, prayed and preached in Japanese with much earnestness, and were serious and devout in their manner. Near the conclusion, a fine looking woman prayed in a way that carried some weight with it, as I thought. The Interpreter repeated a prayer that it seemed right to offer.

Another pretty long ride took us to the hotel by about 10 o'clock. Some of the principal streets were still busy, but many of the shops had closed, and in one, with front still open, a row of people were stretched on the floor as if to sleep.

22nd.—In consultation with G. B. we find the Missionaries are mostly gathered in a few places this month, when they have their vacation. Dr. Whitney called this evening, and proposed a course for us to pursue in order to meet them; going first to Kamakura for a day or two. A Friend student from Tokyo will probably accompany us as guide and interpreter. Our baggage is to be taken to George Braithwaite's.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

Quakerism, Unadulterated Christianity.

It is certainly desirable that every member of our Society should have some knowledge of the truths we hold; and although a research must lead to a perusal of writings lacking the polish and style and harmony of numbers that characterize modern productions, still, I cannot but think, the unadorned page, and simple phraseology, pointing to much good sense, sound reasoning, and genuine Gospel faith and practice, must convince every unbiased reader that the principles that they contended for were pure. And now, when those principles are assailed on every hand, and denied as being obligatory in these days of advanced Christian experience, those among us who value them according to their worth, and advocate them as worthy the assent of the successors of the wise and good, cannot but feel interested in their promulgation, and desire that more may be willing to see and learn for themselves, that Quakerism, such as it was at the first, is unadulterated Christianity.

In perusing the Memoirs of Ruth Follows, the following passages occur, (Friends' Library, vol. 4, page 39:) "On the 22nd of Ninth Mo., 1769, I was at our Quarterly Meeting at Leicester. On First-day at Wigston; and in the evening had a large and satisfactory meeting at Oadby, with the people of that village, who behaved very well. Thence by Wigston and Nuneaton to Coventry, and attended their Meeting on Fourth-day, which was a very trying one to me; I was given to understand that I had caused uneasiness by making some sort of preamble and needless apology, which I was not sensible of until after being told; then by a deep consideration and thorough self-examination, I found myself guilty, and much exercise and many a painful hour it cost me. Oh! how was I covered with shame; but true repentance I was favored with, and again received into favor. I leave this as a caution to such as may see these lines; desiring that none may slight advice which is intended for good, although it may seem to be given sharply."

It seems to me these hints might be of use to some in the present day. I have feared the "preamble and needless apology" spoken of, might sometimes prove a hindrance rather than help to honest inquirers. P.

AT LAST.

J. G. WHITTIER.

When on my day of life the night is falling,
And, in the winds from unsunned spaces blown,
I hear far voices out of darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown,

Thou who hast made my home of life so pleasant,
Leave not its tenant when its walls decay;
O love divine, O Helper ever present,
Be thou my strength and stay!

Be near me when all else is from me drifting—
Earth, sky, home's picture, days of shade and shine,
And kindly faces to my own uplifting,
The love which answers mine.

I have but thee, O Father! Let thy Spirit
Be with me then to comfort and uphold;
No gate of pearl, no branch of palm I merit,
No street of shining gold.

Suffice it if, my good and ill unreckoned,
And both forgiven through thy abounding grace,
I find myself by hands familiar beckoned
Unto my fitting place.

Some humble door among thy many mansions,
Some sheltering shade where sin and striving cease,
And flows forever through heaven's green expansions
The river of thy peace.

There, from the music round about me stealing
I fain would learn the new and holy song,
And find at last beneath the trees of healing,
The life for which I long.

A FRIENDS' MEETING.

There were only two or three of us
Who came to that place of prayer;
Came in the teeth of a driving storm,
But for that we did not care;
Since as we waited upon the Lord,
Though never a word was said,
We felt the Master present there,
And He gave us Living Bread.

His Spirit stirred our longing hearts,
And prayer and praise set free!
We felt his touch as our souls were howed;
We heard his "Come to Me!"
Nobody saw Him lift the latch,
And none unbarred the door;
But "Peace" was his token to each of us,
And why should we ask for more?

Each of us felt the load of sin
From the weary shoulders fall;
Each of us dropped the load of care,
And the grief that was like a pall;
And over our spirits a blessed calm
Swept in from the Jasper Sea,
And strength was ours for toil and strife,
In the days that were thence to be.

We were only a handful gathered in
To that little place of prayer;
No word was said, no hymns were sung,
But the Lord himself was there;
He came to redeem the pledge He gave,
Wherever his loved ones be;
To stand himself in the midst of them,
Though they count but "two or three."

Then forth we went in the pouring rain,
But our hearts had grown so warm,
It seemed like the pelting of summer flowers
And not the crash of a storm.
"What a time renewing of strength we have had
From the Lord's right hand!" we said;
As we thought how Jesus himself had come
To feed us with Living Bread.

A LOST OPPORTUNITY.

BY L. ADDA NICHOLS.

It came and went so quickly,
My sluggish soul saw not
The Master stand and beckoning
Toward one of humble lot.

And I rose not up to follow,
So slow was I to see,
Till the help I might have given
Forever fled from me.

And often I am grieving,
And longing all in vain,
For a blessed opportunity
That will not come again.

Dear Lord, give thine anointing,
And make mine eyes to see;
And make me swift in doing
The work thou givest me.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Trip to Ohio.

Sometimes, after passing through wild scenes among the mountains, where rocks and trees covered the steep slopes, and, except the railroad and its appointments, it might seem as if the country was left to the bears and deer, its original inhabitants, we would come to a small clearing with a little house on it, around whose doors were a group of little children and men, by a small patch of corn and perhaps some garden produce. Of course the manner of living of these isolated settlers must be very different from that of those who live in the larger communities; and this difference of surroundings must produce its effect on the character of those who are raised under such influences. They are unacquainted with many of the refinements and luxuries of more highly cultivated and richer families, but they do not miss the absence of these; and they have enjoyments of their own. Our merciful Heavenly Father, who watches over the welfare of his numerous family, wherever situated, does not forget them; and they, as well as others, are visited by his Grace, which points out to them the way to life everlasting.

Among the mountains, especially on the western slopes, it is a source of great interest to notice the veins of coal exposed by the railroad cuttings, and the openings into the hillsides made by the miners—each with its bank of refuse coal on the outside. This western coal lies in layers which are nearly horizontal, and can be traced for very many miles. The coal is bituminous—that is, contains a considerable proportion of hydrogen—combined with the carbon, of which it mainly consists. It is believed to have been formed from the abundant vegetation of marshes or shallow lakes, lying at or near the sea-level, in a former age of the world; and to have been thus stored up for the use of man, long before He was created, by Him whose wisdom and beneficence are so largely displayed in the wonders of creation. The anthracite coal beds of eastern Pennsylvania, and the bituminous beds of western Pennsylvania and Ohio are believed to be parts of one immense deposit, which at one time spread uniformly over the whole intermediate area—much of which has been swept away in the erosions and other changes to which that region has been exposed.

Professor Leslie, of the Geological Survey, of Pennsylvania, remarks: "In the undisturbed or slightly disturbed country west of the Allegheny Mountains, the soft shale covering rocks have prevented the escape of the volatile hydrocarbons from the coal, which therefore retains its original bituminous character. In the more disturbed, semi-bituminous middle belt of country, the volatile matters have escaped to some extent, through the crevices of the enclosing rocks. In the upturned and overturned anthracite country, the whole mass has been thoroughly dried and consolidated, the shales intensely hardened, and the coal reduced to its most compact and semi-crystalline condition, with scarcely any hydrogen left in combination with the carbon.

"On the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers, the beds are spread out in their original and horizontal position over hundreds of square miles, with inclinations to the horizon of from ten to a few hundred feet to the mile. In the anthracite country, the beds are contorted, broken, jammed together, turned over on their faces, and squeezed by enormous pressure, so as to disappear at one place, to swell out to three times their proper thickness at another. They plunge to depths of 2000 feet beneath the water level, and suddenly rise again to heights more than 1000 feet above it, in a series of long and narrow basins lying side by side."

Throughout our travels in southeastern Ohio, we continually met with these coal layers. As we descended a hill into a valley, we would pass at a certain elevation the coal layer cropping out in the roadside; and after crossing the low ground, as we ascended the opposite rise, we would meet with the same layer, at a corresponding elevation. Many of the farmers in that section supply themselves with fuel, by digging coal on their own lands.

Soon after entering the coal regions we noticed a long row of ovens in which the coal was being converted into coke for manufacturing purposes. This process, which is substantially the same as the conversion of wood into charcoal, consists in burning off the volatile parts of the coal—the compounds of hydrogen and carbon which it contains—so as to leave nothing but carbon behind. The secret of the process is to so regulate the burning as to stop it before too much of the fuel has been wasted. The resulting coke is a gray color, and harder than the coal of which it was formed. It burns with an intense heat and without smoke. Its hardness enables it to bear the weight of the iron ore and limestone, in the great furnaces in which iron is produced—so that it is largely used in the manufacture of iron.

As we approached the Ohio River, a group of high derricks showed us where the people had been boring for petroleum deep into the bowels of the earth; and the large flames issuing from some gas pipes projecting above the earth, gave proof that we were in the regions of the natural gas, which of late years has proved so important an addition to the comfort and business resources of the West.

At the village of Moundsville, a short distance below Wheeling, there is a famous Indian mound from which the place takes its name. It was discovered in 1772, and is about seventy feet in height and nine hundred feet in circumference. Mounds and enclosures of various forms and sizes are numerous among the antiquities of our Western States. E. G. Squire says that the number of tumuli in Ohio may safely be estimated at 10,000. Lewis and Clarke saw them on the Missouri River, 1000 miles above its junction with the Mississippi. They are found all over the intermediate country, and spread over the valley of the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico.

From the position and construction of many of the enclosures, Squire thinks it is evident that they were designed as places of defence from hostile attacks—in short, were primitive forts.

The mounds proper he believes are of several classes—some contain altars of burned clay or stone, and these were places of sacrifice; others were burial mounds; and a third class were temple mounds, "High Places" for the performance of religious rites and ceremonies.

Although my attention was not much directed plants during this trip, yet I noticed with interest a few. Some of the dark violet-colored asters on the roadside near Barnesville, Ohio, were beautiful. One day I encountered a young man of botanical tastes, who had gathered a handful of wild plants during a ramble in the woods. Among them was an interesting fern, which was new to me. It was the Asplenium angustifolium. The under side of the narrow leaflets of the frond were closely covered with numerous oblong fruit dots obliquely ranged in two parallel rows.

In riding over the country of southeastern Ohio, a botanical friend called attention to a weed, which in its decay had assumed a reddish color, and covered large patches in the grass fields. On procuring a specimen, it proved to be a homely weed, quite common to the Eastward, although I have never there seen it so abundant as it appeared to be in the rich western soil. It was the Three-seeded Mercury (Leulophia virginica) a plant belonging to the large family (Euphorbiaceae) a group which forms a vast family in the warmer parts of the world, but not so abundant in our northern climes.

Learning by Practice.

BY J. R. MILLER.

We learn by doing. We never get to understand the Bible, merely by studying it. It will never reveal itself to us until we begin to do what it teaches. He that seeks to obey it shall know it.

Duties seem hard. We think we cannot do them at all. The door appears shut before us, eventuating our progress. But when we quietly and in child-like faith move forward, the way opens. The Israelites lay in their camps on the eastern side of the river. The command came to cross over. They struck their tents and formed their columns, ready to march. But still the river flowed on, with full floods, with no sign of abatement. They began to move, the advance of the host is now only a few steps from the brink. Still the water rushes on. Shall they turn back? or shall they stand there on the edge of the river, and wait for it to pause as it flows to let them pass through? That is what many people do on the margin of life's waters. But no; they willed to do God's will, and the advance guard of priests, bearing the sacred symbol of God's presence, paused not, but moved bravely on as though there was no river before them. The moment their feet touched the water's edge the flood was cut off above, and the channel was emptied. This old fragment of history has its living lesson. If we will to do God's will, we shall find the way open for our feet. The path of duty is never an obstructed path.

Daily life is full of points where this lesson may find application. One bright morning you give yourself anew to Christ. You resolve to do his will all the day. You will find this divine will not in your Bible only, as you read its words, but in many circumstances and experiences of your life; for, remember, you are learning by practice, not merely by theory.

Something goes wrong at breakfast. Some one says a quick word, needless, of course, thoughtless perhaps, even rude, it may be. It hurts, and the color flies to your face, the flash of anger to your eye, and the unadvised word from the very door of your lips. But there is a still, small voice, which reminds you that you have willed to do God's will to-day. It is his will that you should keep your heart loving and sweet, and not be provoked. Do it, and you will learn the sweet meaning throughout all the day.

Most of us find our plans broken into continually by what we are apt to call the accidents of life. The mothers in the home are interrupted all day and kept back in their work by their children, who clamor for attention, for nursing, for care. Busy men meet constant hindrances which break into their hours and interfere with their plans. Who of us does not, many a time, have his day's beautiful schedule disarranged by little things that come in, without announcement, and claim his thought, his time, his strength? Sometimes we may be disposed to chafe a little at what seem interferences with the program we had mapped out in the morning. But we should remember that we are learning by practice. We promised to do God's will all the day, and these things are God's will for us. We had left no place for things for God, and He had to force them into our well-ordered schedule.

"Where was the moment in your plan
For work for him which might not wait;
The need, the wish of fellow-man,
The little thread of mutual fate,
Which touch and tangle soon or late?"

"These hindrances which made you fret,
These interruptions one by one,
They were but sudden tasks I set,
My errands for your feet to run;
Will you disdain them child, or shun?"

We crowd our hours so full of things for ourselves that we have not a moment left for ministries for Christ. The way He gets us to do these things is to press them right into the midst of our occupied hours.

Here is the lesson: These things that we call "interruptions" are little bits of God's will breaking into the midst of the plans we had willed for ourselves. We have set ourselves for the day to do all God's will, and we must not turn any of these interruptions away. He knows what He wants us to do. Suppose we are tired, or our own work is waiting, or we are thwarted of our goal, dare we turn away from the services which God is asking of us,—some sweet ministry to a child, some tender comfort to a sorrowing one, some gentle touch to a life that will carry the benediction for days, some showing of the way to a bewildered soul that knocks at our door, asking the way, some lightening of the burden for one bowed down? dare we, would we for worlds, turn away what God has sent us,—these heavenly ministries, these tasks angels would leap to do,—that we may keep on with our own poor little earth-tasks?

We must never forget, at least, that we are learning by doing God's will, and that God's will does not all come to us out of a written Bible. Some of it comes fresh from God's own lips in our life's circumstances. In whatever way it may come, we are to do it; and in doing it we will find a blessing. Hard tasks and duties are like certain nuts. They are rough and unsightly, and the hull is not easy to break; but when it is broken we find it full of rich meat.

Once Jesus, tired and hungry, sat down by an old well to rest, while his disciples went to the village to buy food. He was too weary to go with them. But while He sat there exhausted, resting, a woman came to draw water. Weary as He was, He treated her with compassionate interest, saving her from her old sinful life. That fragment of ministry was his Father's will. To be sure, it broke into his rest; but He forgot his weariness in blessing a sad, lost life. Then, when the disciples came with the food, He was no longer hungry. They thought some one must have brought Him bread in their absence; but He said: "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." * * My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me." Taking up the duty that came to Him, He found it real food for his life. It is always so. Do the duty God sends; do it sweetly, lovingly, and you will find a blessing wrapped up in it. We get the goodness of Divine love by doing the Divine will.

Many people complain that they cannot be sure of the right path in life. They are continually coming to points where duty is uncertain. The way before them is dark, even close up to their feet. The horizon seems to shut down like a heavy curtain, or a thick wall right before them. But here again this principle applies. "If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know." We can learn the path of duty only by walking in it. There is no promise of anything more than this. The word of God is a lamp unto our feet,—not a sun to light a hemisphere, but a lamp or lantern, to carry in our hand, to give light unto our feet, to show us just one little step at a time. If we move on, taking the step that lies in the light, we carry the light forward too, and it then shows us another step; that is, we learn the road by walking it. If we will not take the one step that is made clear, we cannot know the part of the way that lies in the shadow. But doing the duty that lies nearest, will ever bring us to the next duty. Doing, we shall know.

These are but little fragments of a great lesson, which has very wide-reaching applications. We may get at least the heart of it, which is, that doing our duty we shall learn. Do the little of God's will that you now perceive, and He will reveal more of it to you. Instead of wondering what mystery the long future holds for you, take the task or the ministry of the moment now in sight, and do that. God's will is an angel, bearing in his hand a little lamp to light you, step by step, home. If there are perplexities before you, simply begin to do your duty, the little of it that is clear, and the perplexities will vanish. If the task set before you seems impossible, still begin the doing of it. In due time the mountain will yield to your faithful strokes. You will learn by doing. Life will brighten as you go on.—S. S. Times.

A True Hero.—The daily papers have recently been lauding as a hero a young Covenant minister, John Ramsey, who was a delegate to the Pan-Presbyterian Convention at Toronto. He with a large body of delegates, came with an excursion from Toronto to Niagara Falls. That afternoon, as Bro. Ramsey and a few other delegates were walking across the new suspension bridge, a woman of the party lost her balance and fell over, her feet catching between the gas-pipe and lower girder, where, as if by a miracle, she remained hanging, head downward, over the foaming river that flowed nearly two hundred feet below. While the bystanders seemed paralyzed with terror, Bro. Ramsey, who is a powerful athlete, jumped over the railing and, seizing a cable, let himself down to the lower girder and grasped the woman, holding her safely until the bridge officials lowered ropes and pulled them both up.—Christian Cynosure.

Natural History, Science, etc.

A Brave Battle.—In the southern part of Nevada, especially in Nye County, there are many bands of wild mustangs. For steady running nothing of the equine breed can equal the wild horse, and as a mountain climber he is scarcely excelled by the goat. Three hunters in the mountains recently fell afoul of a band of forty of these mustangs under peculiar circumstances. The three men were in camp, and just about to turn in, when they heard a roar like the tread of an advancing army. In the dim light they could see nothing, but as the noise approached the three men stood on guard. In another minute a band of mustangs emerged from a stretch of pines, running at a fearful rate, their nostrils dilated and their long manes and tails flying in the wind. On they came straight for the camp. "We saw we were to be ground under their heels unless we did something," says the narrator, "and we began to shout and halloo like mad. Our horses were meantime dashing and charging, and it looked as if every instant they would break away. We grasped our guns and fired over the heads of the horses, for they were so handsome that we didn't want to kill them. Finally, just at the last second of time, when we thought we were to be borne down by the wild throng, they turned and dashed down the hill into the darkness. By this time we began to hear weird howls and neighing and stamping. Every once in a while we heard a whack, as though something was hitting something else with terrific force, combined with louder howls. The noise was just behind the spur of pine trees, a quarter of a mile away. It continued louder than ever, and two of us concluded to push on out and see what the rumpus was. Judge of our surprise when we saw three old stallions surrounded by a pack of big mountain wolves and kicking and biting at a furious rate. Three or four of the wolves had been sent to grass, their ribs broken and disabled in other ways. Around the stallions were the wolves, snapping and growling and showing their long white teeth. The horses stood almost head to head and planted terrific blows on the heads and bodies of the wolves. Every once in a while a wolf described a parabola in the air. It was a scene long to be remembered. Out there in the keen, crisp night air of the mountains the three wild horses were fighting not only for their lives but for the lives of the younger and weaker members of the band, who were being defended from the wolves. The hunters at once sided with the horses, and with several well-directed volleys put the wolves to flight. Then with a neigh of joy, and perhaps of gratitude, the horses galloped away in the darkness, and the hunters returned to their camp-fire.—Golden Days.

Poison in Ice Cream.—Dr. George S. Hull, in a recent number of the Medical News, advances a very plausible suggestion as to the cause of poisoning in some ice creams, when he states that a modern ice cream freezer, with its contents, is in reality a galvanic cell or battery, in which the cream, especially if it is mixed with fruits, becomes the fluid, and the zinc and tin, or zinc and copper, of the freezer becomes the positive and negative elements of the battery. Dr. Hull has proved that electrical action does take place in an ice cream freezer, and, taking place, of course corrodes the metal in which the cream is contained, producing poisonous salts that vary in amount according to the activity of the corrosive action, and the length of time the cream remains in the freezer. This explanation, from a scientific standpoint, is certainly plausible and suggestive, if found to be correct, of an easy method of avoiding the chances of being poisoned by eating ices.

Preserving Wood.—The Pfister process for preserving wood, which is used in Austria, is meeting with considerable success. The novelty consists in treating the timber as soon as possible after felling. A solution of zinc chloride of a specific gravity of 1.01 is forced into the thick end of the log by a force pump, an iron disk of suitable diameter and provided with a cutting limb being forced into the end of the log and clamped. Three or four minutes suffices for the preliminary work on each log. After maintaining a pressure of two to three atmospheres at the thick end of the log for several minutes the exuding of the sap at the opposite end begins, and finally a weak solution of zinc chloride passes through, indicating the completion of the operation.

Tanning with Electricity.—The recent application of electricity to tanning in France has resulted in reducing the time of tanning a large oxhide from sixteen to eighteen months in pit tanning, and from five to six months in liquor tanning, to ninety-six hours in both cases and also does away with continuous hand labor and the disagreeable odor so characteristic of tanneries. Electricity seems in some unaccountable way to accelerate the absorption of the tannin by the hide. The invention without doubt marks one of the most important advances in technology made in many years.

A Cure for Rheumatism.—A Christian friend was ploughing, and turned up a nest of yellow-jackets, which stung his horses until they ran away and tore everything to pieces. He was also stung so badly that he had to be carried home. It would be hard for an ordinary saint to see any blessing in that; but he did. Often did he bless God for yellow-jackets. He had been for a long time afflicted with rheumatism, and badly crippled, but he never had it afterwards. He did not know why, but the doctor told him that the poison in the stings was an antidote for his disease.

Foxes in Australia.—European foxes, introduced by some mishap into Australia, are now spreading, and are destructive to lambs and poultry. It is to be noted that they are said to attain greater size and strength in Australia than in England, and the mild climate is highly favorable to their increase in numbers.

Size of Rain Drops.—How large is a drop of rain? Probably most people think that rain drops are nearly all of one size, although in what is called a misty rain, the individual drops are very small. The question of rain drops is not so unimportant as might be supposed, and E. J. Lowe has collected many facts bearing upon it, and presented them to the Royal Meteorological Society. He employed in his experiment sheets of slate, made in book form, so as to be readily closed, and ruled in inch squares. The impressions of the drops were caught on the slate, and afterwards carefully copied on paper. He discovered that the size of rain-drops varies from a speck so small as to be almost invisible up to a diameter of two inches. Every reader has probably noticed that the rain-drops preceding a thunder-storm frequently assume gigantic proportions, though he may not have suspected that they could ever attain so great a size as two inches. Other interesting facts about rain-drops which have been brought out by Lowe's experiments are that drops of the same size do not always contain the same amount of water, and that some of the largest drops are hollow. The importance of these observations, from a scientific point of view, lies in the bearing of the facts thus ascertained upon the question of the manner of precipitation of the aqueous vapor of the atmosphere. From another point of view they are important as illustrating nature's power to introduce variety into her work, even when her hand is busied merely in forming drops of rain.

Fogs.—Aitken's experiments in 1880 showed that a change of state, from a gas to a liquid, or from a liquid to a solid, always requires contact with some surface. This we see in freezing water; the ice first forms on the side of a vessel or at the edge of a pond, and thence the crystals shoot out over the surface. Hence water vapor in pure air cannot form fogs, having no such surface. But a very small portion of dust is sufficient to enable the vapor to pass from an invisible form to the form of fog or cloud.

Fog, tends to retain impurities in the air by condensing around them. Thus, even in London, there are, as a rule, only 4 parts of carbon dioxide in 10,000 of air, as the result of all the burning and breathing in that great city. But, during a dense fog, more than 14 parts have been found present. All the myriad poison germs and equally dangerous organic effluvia must be increased in proportion, though living bacteria, it is found, are greatly reduced. Even in moderately foggy weather these noxious germs are doubled, in comparison with dull weather. At Kew, a fortnight's filth-deposit upon the glass roof was equivalent to six tons to the square mile. Of this 42 per cent. was carbon, and another 42 per cent. mineral matter. It would not wash off, but had to be scraped off like paint.

THE VALUE OF MEDITATION.—The altered conditions of life in our day only emphasize the need for, and value of meditation. The tyranny of the world is felt keenly by every thoughtful mind. The exacting demands of professional activity, the exhausting rush of business claims, and the weary routine of domestic cares, make all of us prisoners.

Meditation takes us by the hand out of the pestiferous atmosphere and hard ways of the world in which most of us have to live, into quiet pastures, where a healing benediction falls on the weary spirit, and a new strength comes to the endeavor to live a nobler life.

The value of meditation is endorsed by the habitual custom of the Lord Jesus Christ. It was his practice to rise early in the morning and to retire to some solitary place, in which he gathered strength for the work of the day. Such seasons of solitude were highly prized by Him.

As it was with the Master, so it has ever been with his most distinguished disciples. In the moods and places of silence, where man was far away but God was very near, they won the serenity of spirit and power of endurance that enabled them to fulfil their mission in life.

It may be that much of the shallowness of the thinking of our day on the problems of experimental religion is due to the neglect of meditation. Meditation, like the eye, views our mercies, and prayer, like the hand, reacheth in those mercies. The truth of this utterance will be cheerfully corroborated by every reader who has tasted the fruits of devotional meditation—fruits which are a foretaste of the joys of heaven.

A sharp distinction must be drawn between ditation and revery. Too many Christians ask they are meditating when they are only raming.

Meditation's supreme value is the door it ens into communion with God. George Mac-hald says beautifully and truly in one of his books: "Every door leading to God is a propene outward—out of self, out of world-ness, out of sinfulness." He who keeps the or of meditation shut bars himself out of the etest experiences of life, for he refuses to et that inner chamber where our Father in ven is waiting to talk with his children. God always speaking to us, in the voices of his rev- tion, of his providence, and of his spirit; but most of us the voices of the world are so loud t they silence the voice of God. In the hush- stillness of the sanctuary of meditation it is y different. There the voice of love sounds e music in our ears, the restfulness of God ns the fever of life, and the peace which pass- understanding rests like a benediction upon r spirits.

However busy the day may be, we must reso- ely strive to sweeten and strengthen it with den minutes of meditation. Even ten min- of solitary communion in the morning will ke the day what otherwise it cannot be. It l bring us into fellowship with God, and carry o our work a transforming influence which ghtens with the glory of heaven the prosaie s of earth.

The Lost Hours.

The limited express on the Pennsylvania rail- ed was speeding into the city of Philadelphia h its precious freight of human lives, when dently the great engine slackened its force, and train ceased to move.

"What is the matter?" cried a portly man in rear of the car.

"There is an obstruction in the way, and we ll be detained two hours," was the reply.

"What, sir?" cried the portly man. "Why, I e you I have an important business engage- nt in which my life's interests are at stake! I e you, man, I must reach the city on time." "We cannot do it, sir," said the official; "we ll be detained here at least two hours."

"Oh," cried a gentleman with flushed cheeks, is more than I can bear. My mother is ying and I shall be too late to receive her bless- . I could bear it, he bitterly added, while sobs shook his frame, "but I have been a ward child, and was not thoughtful of her o fort."

"And I," said a gentleman in evening suit, us to have addressed an audience at the acade- to-night. I shall reach the hall just one er too late."

Two girls on the opposite side of the car dis- ued the mishap with indignation.

"I cannot see to match that silk by gas-light," d one; while the other, with tears of vexation vered, "I shall miss that musical social now! hink that the first chance I ever had to listen o brilliant star should be lost through this uless mishap."

In a seat by the window sat a sweet-faced lady, i, silver hair, and hands folded peacefully be- o her. A bustling man, passing her, said, "Idam, you at least are not inconvenienced, I e."

Her patient face lighted up with a sad smile. "S," she answered, "he that believeth shall not e haste." Seeing the puzzled look on his countenance, she continued, "I am a widow, sir, and childless. There is one family tie left me still, a little grandson, who attends the grammar school in Philadelphia. Yesterday, upon return- ing from school, a runaway horse broke his leg, and he is now lying in the Children's Hospital. I, sir, am on my way to be with him while they amputate his limb. But," she continued as she brushed the tears from her eyes, "there is a heavenly Father whose child I am, and He bids me run with patience the race that is set before me. I cannot doubt his promises, for they are yea and amen to his children, sir. I am waiting for his commands, and trusting peacefully in his Word."

A hush fell over the car. An angry man who but a moment before uttered an audible oath, with a shamed face slipped out of the car door. The pale man brushed away his tears, and the two girls who had complained so bitterly resumed their talk in an undertone, with tell-tale blushes on their faces.

The two hours struck, the engine whistled, the train moved slowly at first, and then once more the Pennsylvania express, with its mighty iron horse, was speeding over the line to the city of Philadelphia.—Sallie V. DuBois.

To be a good neighbor requires a degree of grace to which Christians do not always attain. It never can be achieved on the legal level of rendering to every man according to his deeds. If we try it on that footing, we shall find our- selves watching for an occasion for offence, and the baser self in us "rejoicing in iniquity." A true neighbor is a gospel neighbor, who gives "good measure, pressed down and running over," in his dealings with others, and thus gets the same from them in return, and yet never con- templates that return as a reason for his act. On this footing we can live in Christ-like, un- selfish fashion with the least amiable people, and make this commonest of relations a source of grace to both. As Herbert says:

"Be useful where thou livest, that they may Loth want and wish thy pleasing presence still.
Kindness, good parts, great places are the way
To compass this. Find out men's wants and will,
And meet them there. All worldly joys go less,
To the one joy of doing kindnesses."

Fox-hunting.—Lord Yarborough, the owner of the North Lancashire pack of fox hounds, in fur- nishing some statistics with respect to fox hunting, states that there are 330 packs of hounds in the United Kingdom, and he estimates that the cost of keeping these hounds, independently of the ex- penses of carriage horses, cover hacks, travelling expenses, &c., is altogether £4,500,000 sterling. Is it not a curious comment on the absurd idea that this is a Christian country, that our wealthy classes should spend more than five times as much upon a dangerous and fantastic amusement than all the churches put together spend upon the evangeliza- tion of the heathen? It is, further, a matter for much meditation that in a country where so many millions are spent upon such amusements there are thousands of persons who are suffering for want of bread.—Selected.

Indian Schools and Catholics.—The Independent, of New York, says: "The Catholic Review, in a bitter attack upon the Indian administration, asks: 'Why should Protestants consider themselves aggrieved because we ask for justice?' Because it is not justice that you are asking for. You are not satisfied with justice. Out of $525,881 Government appropriations for 1893 you get $369,535, and yet you are not sat- isfied; you want more. The Indian Commissioner treats you as he treats all other denominations, and you are not satisfied. It is not your share that you want, but all; not fair treatment, but exclusive favors. The public is getting heartily tired of your unfounded complaints, and will not long endure them."

Women Preachers among the Free Methodists.—The West Kansas Conference of the Free Methodist Church has recently had the "woman question" prominently under discussion. The quarterly conference of the Macksville district refused to renew the license of Maggie Cook, on the ground of its being illegal to grant a local preacher's license to a woman. An appeal was made to the annual conference, when General Superintendent B. T. Roberts ruled that "sex in itself is not, according to our Discipline and usage, a sufficient reason for with- holding a local preacher's license. From an early period of our denomination, women, from time to time and in different conferences, have been licensed as local preachers. No change in the Discipline unfavorable to such a license being granted has been made since then. Therefore, it was a viola- tion of our Discipline and usages to refuse to renew the license of the sister in question solely because she is a woman."

Boys' Brigades.—An effort has been made at Wil- limantic (Conn.) to establish a military organization among the boys belonging to a Congregational Church. A writer in the Cynosure, in commenting on this proposition, says:—"The spirit and practice of war are the curse of the world. When boys are taken into the church to be drilled in the use of murderous instruments, then such a church be- comes a corrupter of youth and an enemy of Christ."

Report on Reforms of the Committee of the Free Methodist Church, New York Annual Conference.—"Organized secrecy is a great evil which stands directly in the way of the progress of the Christian Church.—It is one of the greatest exhibitions of intense selfishness that exists in the world. With its humiliating and degrading initiations, blasphemous oaths, horrid penalties, un-Christian and anti-Christian principles, it is a menace to good government, a destructor of the home, and a blight upon the church. Its tendency is to cause men to violate conscience, to disregard the law of the land, and to trample upon the rights of others. It often shields crime, thwarts justice, and punishes the innocent. It substitutes so-called good works for real faith, the decrees of the conclave for the law of the land, the rules of the order for the precepts of the Word, and the god of the lodge for the Christ of the Bible.

The Mafia in New Orleans.—An exchange says that the committee appointed by the mayor of New Orleans to investigate the Mafia and similar or- ganizations have brought to light some startling facts. Before Chief of Police Hennessey was murdered, evidence was traced to ninety-four assassina- tions by Sicilians or Italians, which went unpun- ished because of the secrecy which accompanied each act. They found the Mafia had gained a strong foothold, and terrorized the Italian popula- tion of the city, levying tribute at pleasure under the threat of death. They had even attempted to poison the Italian consul. Several remedies were proposed by the committee, the most radical of which was the absolute exclusion in future of Si- cilians and Southern Italians—classifying them with Chinese an undesirable and prohibited class.

BE SURE YOU ARE RIGHT.—The first thing is to be right, and then you are to know it, and stick to it; but do not be sure of too many things, for some of them may not prove true. Take pains to study and know things, and then let no one beat you out of them.

Henry Ward Beecher tells of a lesson he once learned:—

I was sent to the blackboard, and went, un- certain, soft, and full of whimpering.

"That lesson must be learned," said the teacher, in a very quiet tone, but with a terrible intensity. All explanations and excuses he trampled under foot in utter scornfulness. "I want that problem; I don't want any reasons why I don't get it," he would say.

"I did study it two hours."

"That's nothing to me; I want the lesson. You need not study it at all, or you may study it ten hours, just to suit yourself. I want the lesson."

It was tough for a green boy, but it seasoned him. In less than a month I had the most intense sense of intellectual independence and courage to defend my recitations. His cold and calm voice would fall upon me in the midst of a demonstration, "No!"

I hesitated, and went back to the beginning, but on reaching the same spot again, "No!" uttered with a tone of conviction, barred my progress.

"The next," and I sat down in red confusion.

He, too, was stopped with "No!" but went right on, finished, and as he sat down was rewarded with a "Very well."

"Why," whispered I, "I recited it just as he did, and you said 'No!'"

"Why didn't you say 'Yes,' and stick to it? It is not enough to know your lesson. You have learned nothing until you are sure. If all the world says 'No,' your business is to say 'Yes,' and prove it."

This is a lesson that many a boy should learn, and many a man might be profited by it.—Little Christian.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 5, 1892.

In one of our exchanges we find the following paragraph:

"Many a minister may date his decline in pulpit power and acceptability to a neglect of his study. Of all professional men he can least afford to degenerate in intellectual vigor. He must keep up the stimulation which comes from contact with the best thinking of the past and present. He must study thoroughly the problems with which he has to deal. His sermon must not be dashed off at hurried intervals, but be the result of careful writing and deliberate preparation. He must be constantly the man who reads, observes, reflects, writes, absorbs and digests."

This paragraph has evidently been written by one who regards the efforts of a preacher as the fruit of his own intellectual abilities, aided by study and preparation. If we regard him simply as a "professional" man, the advice it contains is in a large measure correct. But if we take the Quaker view of ministry, as a delivering to the people of messages from the Head of the Church, it must be rejected as unsound and hurtful. The Lord who searches all hearts, alone knows their secrets, and what each one needs; and He alone is able to accompany the messages delivered under his command, with such a measure of his life-giving power and authority, as will enable them to accomplish the purposes which He designs.

In contrast with the advice above quoted, we extract from the Journal of that valued minister, Ann Branson, her account of the call to vocal service, which she felt when a young woman.

"Whilst sitting in our meeting under religious exercise, a solemn feeling covered my mind, attended with an impression that it was required of me to appear in vocal supplication, and I felt as if I could scarcely resist the gentle, powerful and persuasive influence of that holy, life-giving power and spirit, by which my heart was solemnized and my spirit tendered."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The State Department on the 25th of Tenth Month, received a cablegram from Minister Scruggs reporting that arrangements for the recognition of the new Government of Venezuela, under Gen. Crespo, by the United States, were concluded by the 18th of this month, and that the formal ceremonies of recognition took place on First-day, the 23rd inst. Recognition by other foreign powers will follow.

The President has issued a proclamation extending to Italy the privilege of the Copyright act.

Arizona has produced $3,000,000 in gold, $2,200,000 in silver and $4,500,000 in copper during the year.

The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company and the Boston and Maine Railroad Company have formed an alliance. A. A. McLeod, President of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, has been elected President of the Boston and Maine. It was announced that the New York and New England Railroad, already controlled by President McLeod and the Reading interests, would be used as a connection between the Boston and Maine and Philadelphia and Reading systems.

The growth of Augusta, Georgia, in manufactures from 1880 to 1890 is said to have been phenomenal. The capital invested increased 240.1 per cent.; number of hands employed, 230.71 per cent.; in wages paid, 302.8 per cent., and in value of materials used, 105.1 per cent.

The National Commission having decided not to interfere with the contracts made by the local directors for the sale of liquors at the World's Fair, there will be no bar, during the Exposition, to their purchase in Jackson Park, Chicago.

The Wine and Spirit Gazette of New York city, in an editorial, says: "The truth in the controversy which of the two great political parties is the better liquor party, is to be found on neutral middle ground. The opposition to the liquor traffic and the tendency to restrict the traffic as much as possible are as clearly defined in certain sections of the Democratic party as in certain sections of the Republican party. There are faotics and liberal minded men in both political parties. It must be admitted, however, that the new attitude on the liquor question taken by the Republicans in this State in their Rochester platform—which is a departure from their former policy—offers a more equitable and practical solution of the liquor problem than anything the Democratic party has ever attempted in this State."

The celebration in Charleston, South Carolina, intended as a memorial of the gratitude of the city for the assistance received in the time of distress, from the earthquakes, was begun on the 31st ultimo.

Work is suspended at all of the Reading Coal and Iron Company's Collieries. The cause assigned is, the great scarcity of water and the unparalleled freight blockade.

The local forecast official in this city, reports the month just closed to be the dryest Tenth Month on record.

A conflagration in Milwaukee on the night of the 28th ultimo, was started by the explosion of an oil barrel. Thirteen blocks of business structures and dwellings, nearly five hundred buildings in all, were destroyed. Four lives were lost. The value of the property destroyed is placed at $6,000,000. About 2500 people were rendered homeless.

The number of deaths in this city last week, was 417, which is 14 more than the previous week, and 17 less than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing 226 were males and 191 females; 43 died of consumption; 41 of diphtheria; 37 of diseases of the heart; 32 of pneumonia; 19 of marasmus; 17 of apoplexy; 16 of casualties; 15 of bronchitis; 14 of cancer; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 11 of inanition; 10 of cholera infantum; 10 of paratyphoid and 10 of convulsions.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 114½ a 115½; currency, 6's, 107 a 117.

COTTON continued quiet and steady on a basis of 8½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk spot, $15 a 16; spring bran, in bulk, spot, $14 a 15.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.15; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.75; Western winter, clear, $3.50 a $3.65; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.00; winter patent, $4.10 a $4.40; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.15; do., patent, $4.25 a $4.60; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour was sparingly offered and ruled firm at $3.65 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania. Buckwheat flour moved slowly at $1.90 a $2 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 71 a 71½ cts.

No. 2 mixed corn, 47½ a 48½ cts.

No. 2 white oats, 38½ a 39 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3¾ a 4 cts.; culls, 3 a 3½ cts.; fat cows, 2½ a 3½ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5¾ cts.; good, 4¾ a 5 cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3¾ a 4 cts.; culls, 2½ a 3½ cts. Lambs, 4 a 6½ cts.

HOGS.—Good Western, 8¼ a 8½ cts.; other Western, 8 a 8½ cts.

FOREIGN.—A. J. Balfour, who was First Lord of the Treasury in the latter part of the late Conservative régime, addressed a meeting in Manchester on the 27th ult., in favor of bi-metalism. In the course of his remarks he said:

"Our existing currency is neither a convenient medium of exchange nor a fair permanent record of obligations over long periods. If I were given the choice between a standard which has depreciated and a standard which has appreciated, I should choose the latter. The Government ought to interfere in the question."

A North of England paper announces the discovery of a new process of producing caustic soda, chlorine and other chemicals direct from brine by electricity. The new process, it is asserted, effects a saving of 50 per cent. compared with the cost of the old method. Eminent chemists have pronounced the new process a great and pronounced success.

The Morning Advertiser of Tenth Month 27th, announces that it is enabled to state upon unimpeachable authority that the English War Office has in its possession accurate designs of a new French melin gun of terrific power, which French gunners calculate will be able to bombard Dover from Calais, and designs for a light railway to shift the gun along the coast.

A dispatch from Lisbon, dated Tenth Month 25, reports the wreck of the British steamship Roumania at the mouth of the Arellio River, near Peniche.

A later dispatch says that 113 persons were drowned and only nine were saved.

Without opening a single additional seam, there is probably enough coal in view in New South Wales to enable 10,000,000 tons to be put out annually for several years to come. This amount is more than double the present production.

Sir John Lubbock, President of the London Chamber of Commerce, having stated at a meeting of the Chamber that Canadian exporters were in a condition of commercial paralysis, the Canadian Government has forwarded a statement to England in rebuttal, which shows that the total value of the export trade of Canada during the fiscal year ending 30th of September last increased from $95,500,000 to $110,400,000, or 15½ per cent. as compared with 1891.

Telegraphic advices from Puebla, Mexico, say that fully $300,000 damage to the coffee and cane crops alone was done by the recent overflow of the San River, in Oaxaca. Fifty persons lost their lives, a thousand cattle were swept away from one hacienda, and hundreds of families were made homeless.

A company has been organized at Newfoundland to gather ice from icebergs.

"The kindness of dear J and M. E. is mixed with a feeling of friendly sympathy better felt than described, and I have not been without some apprehension that J. E. feels deeper on the occasion than mere unity with the concern of others; and if it so prove, it will, to be sure, be pleasant.

"First-day, the 9th, was a day of peace and liberty to me, though one wherein there was rather a descending to the deeps than ascending to the heights. The morning meeting at Gracechurch Street, was large, gay and oppressive, but it is a favor to be allowed to visit the seed in prison, and a great one to feel a willingness so to do. My beloved S. G. was afresh anointed in both meetings, and I thought my small vessel contained a little more than what was properly my own; and, we read, the debt was first to be paid, before the residue of the oil was set apart to live on. The day closed comfortably in a little season of retirement at Richard Chester's.

"Second-day the 10th, attended the morning meeting, and produced our certificates. Friends seemed disposed to enter thoroughly into the matter; near sympathy and unity were expressed, and a committee was appointed to draw up certificates for us, and one for G. D., who laid his concern before them. We had a conference this day with Adey Bellamy respecting our proposed journey.

"Third-day, 11th, sat a quiet solid meeting at the Peel, held in silence, wherein a little renewal of faith was afforded, and cause for confidence in holy help. Last night confirmed me in a feeling sense of my short-sightedness. The southern parts of France being all along the first object in my view, the way to get there the soonest, appeared desirable, and the passage from Dover to Calais that which effected this desire most speedily; but our beloved companion, G. D., feeling the passage to Holland most clear to his mind, I felt mine greatly tried, wishing if I had but ever so small a bit of ground to move on, it might be my own. I went to bed thus exercised, and endeavored to think only of Dover, but after a season of very close conflict, and I think honest travail for right direction, a serene sky seemed over this prospect of G. D.'s, and every other passage to France utterly closed, so I simply communicated my feelings this evening to my companions, and thus far peace attends.

"Our dear friend, J. Eliot, is, I believe, bound to the south, but has as yet made no movement in his Monthly Meeting. Adey Bellamy has laid his prospect before Friends, and it is likely will be liberated by the time J. E. is, if he discloses his feelings at his next Monthly Meeting. Our having come hither seems providential, as J. E. and A. B. understand the language well; and the hope of this seasonable assistance has tended to renew my faith, and patience, which I sometimes trust will hold out to the end.

"Fourth-day, 12th. We attended Gracechurch street Monthly Meeting, that for worship was low to my feelings, the one for discipline, long and flat, much business agitated, and many pertinent remarks made; but life seemed oppressed, and human, more than Divine wisdom, uppermost.

"Fifth-day, 13th. After being at meeting at Ratcliff, I accompanied G. D. and wife to Jacob Bell's, to dinner; a solemnity covered my mind afterwards, under which it felt pleasant to have a pause, for seeking the renewed influence of the pure principle of life and love, and the season was graciously owned. Spent the evening at another Friend's, I thought profitably, in free conversation.

"First-day, 16th. Went to Horselydown meeting in the morning—a low time: Gracechurch Street in the afternoon, and at six in the evening a public meeting appointed by G. D., in which he was largely engaged. I again felt, in a painful manner, the consequence of withholding more than is meet, yet trust wilful disobedience was not the cause, but a fear of not feeling sufficient authority:—'seekest thou great things?' seems the query often put to my poor mind on such occasions, and though the injunction is added 'seek them not,' how slowly do I learn!

"Second-day, 17th. Morning meeting, a time of favor through several instruments; our certificates were signed, I believe, by all present, and the meeting seemed to conclude under the uniting evidence of Christian fellowship; many dear friends expressing near sympathy with us, poor pilgrims, in our going forth, and G. D. closing with solemn supplication for the continuance of gracious protection.

"Third-day, 18th. We turned our backs on the great city, and got to Colchester to dinner; met a kind reception at our friend John Kendall's, and had there in the evening, the company of Thomas Corbyn and Thomas Hull, who returned with J. K. from the service of visiting the meetings in that county. It was pleasant to us to see T. Corbyn before our embarkation, and he was kindly affectionate and sympathizing to us; dear Rebecca Jones also spent the night here in her return from Ipswich.

"Fourth-day, was their meeting in course, which we attended, not knowing but we might afterwards proceed to Harwich; but our G. D. found a cloud remaining on his tabernacle, at which I wondered not, as I had before told him

I did believe he would not get away without a meeting for the people: one was held that evening, and I think owned by gracious regard.

"As no packets leave Harwich regularly, but on Fourth and Seventh-days, our proceeding thither seemed not desirable till near the time; we therefore rested at our comfortable lodgings Fifth-day, and on Sixth-day went to Manningtree, where a meeting had been appointed for ten o'clock; the house is small, and few Friends reside here, but it was pretty well filled with a solid, quiet company, and was to me the best meeting since my leaving home, a time of enlargement in true love and productive of peace. After dining at a Friend's in the town, we went on to Harwich, and had a meeting there at six in the evening; the house, a new small one, was soon filled with fashionably dressed people, and a considerable number were in the yard; they seemed rather unsettled in time of silence, but quiet when anything was offered: my beloved S. G. and G. D. were afresh anointed with Gospel oil, and I was comforted in beholding good work well done.

"My poor mind is under discouragement from various causes; remarkable anxiety has attended me for several days about home, and faith is indeed low, though I thankfully remember having been enabled to surrender all I have to the disposal of unerring wisdom.

"Seventh-day, 22nd. The wind contrary, and no prospect of sailing, I feel very low, and almost in danger of casting away hope.

"First-day. So ill that I could not get up till about noon; our company went to meeting, where, I think, only about seven attended. In the evening, a solemnity covered us, under which dear G. D. revived the query put to the disciples, 'when I sent you without purse or scrip, lacked ye anything?' and they said, nothing; again, they that have left all 'shall receive an hundred fold now in this time, and in the world to come eternal life.' This seemed so peculiarly applicable to my tried state, that while my soul was as though it refused comfort, I could not but taste a little renewal of hope. We just broke up when a summons to go on board was sent us.

"There being but little wind, and that not quite fair, we had a tedious passage, but were favored to experience holy protection, and landed about eight o'clock on Fourth-day evening, at Helvoetsluys, where we got to a clean inn, kept by two English women. While in the boat going on shore, a sweet calm covered my mind, accompanied by the fresh application of that gracious promise, 'I will be to thee mouth and wisdom;' this, after the tossings I had been tried with for many days, tended to renew my confidence in Divine sufficiency and goodness.

"Fifth-day, 27th. Left Helvoet this morning, and travelled on a very deep road—often in danger of overturning—to the Briel; here we crossed a ferry about a mile over, went thence to Maasslandsluys. In this place we seemed as gazing stocks to the people, many following us, though all behaved civilly, and had they understood our speech, would probably have helped us. I felt what I think was the love of the Gospel, my heart being so filled that I could have spoken to the people as I walked along the street, and while in the house where we stopped to get a little refreshment; but I felt what I was, and who I was with, and had not the courage to query whether we might not as well remain awhile; therefore with the heaviest heart I ever remember feeling at leaving any place, we went on board a treckschuyt for Delft, whence we proceeded to Rotterdam, and there got to the house of an English woman that night.

"I feel sensibly confirmed in the belief, that passing through Holland was the right way, for in coming through the towns to this place, there has been so much love prevalent, that it has felt to me as though we were not among strangers, though with a people of a strange speech; and that there were many who could be spoken to from something answering in their minds to what is felt by us, even without outward interpretation. A minister of the Calvinist church drank tea with us this evening, and undertook to give notice of a meeting which is appointed for to-morrow.

"Seventh-day, 29th. The meeting was held at ten o'clock; G. D. and S. G. were strengthened to recommend inward waiting for the revelation of Divine power, but there seemed little openness among the few assembled; several ministers of the Calvinistic church attended, and we took tea with one of them—many others were present, and a good deal of religious conversation took place, wherein an explanation was entered into of our principles and testimonies; G. D. opening these clearly, and apparently to their satisfaction. I thought this was a season spent profitably, though as to my own feelings I am like one in prison; may I be helped to resign myself into his hands who has, I trust, sent me out on this journey; for while my conflicts seem rather to increase than lessen, and the exercise of my spirit almost weighs down the poor body, I do at times feel renewed confidence that I shall be preserved, and that those I have left will be taken care of.

"First-day, 30th. A public meeting at four in the afternoon; it was very large, more coming than the house could hold; some liberty was felt by all of us in expressing what arose, but it was an exercising low time; a physician and his wife came to tea with us, and expressed satisfaction in our company, which we also felt in theirs, and parted from them in that love which throws down all distinctions of names in religion.

"Second-day, 31st. After a solemn season with the only person we knew of here, who makes any profession with us, we set off in a treckschuyt, for Amsterdam, where we arrived the next evening, and met a kind reception from John Vanderwerf.

"Fourth-day, attended the Monthly Meeting of the few Friends here, and light seeming to shine upon visiting these, in their own houses, we entered upon the service, which was so owned by the prevalence of Gospel liberty and love, that hard things were made comparatively easy. S. G. and I had never before spoken through an interpreter, which office J. V., junior, filled agreeably, and our minds were bowed in thankfulness to the Lord, who manifests himself a present helper.

The Diamond Mines of South Africa.

The De Beers and the Kimberley mines are probably the two biggest holes which greedy man has ever dug in the earth, the area of the former at the surface being thirteen acres, with a depth of 450 feet, the area and depth of the latter being even greater. These mines are no longer worked from the surface, but from shafts sunk at some distance from the original holes, and penetrating to the blue ground by transverse drivings, at depths varying from 500 to 1200 feet.

The blue ground, when extracted, is carried in small iron trucks to the "floors." These are made by removing the bush and grass from a fairly level piece of ground; the land is then rolled and made as hard and smooth as possible. These "floors" are about 600 acres in extent. They are covered to the depth of about a foot with the blue ground, which for a time remains on them without much manipulation. The heat of the sun and moisture soon have a wonderful effect upon it. Large pieces which were as hard as ordinary sandstone when taken from the mine, soon commence to crumble. At this stage of the work, the winning of the diamonds assumes more the nature of farming than of mining; the ground is continually harrowed to assist pulverization by exposing the larger pieces to the action of the sun and rain. The blue ground from Kimberley mines becomes quite well pulverized in three months, while that from DeBeers requires double that time. The longer the ground remains exposed, the better it is for "washing." The process of exposure being completed, the blue ground is then carried to very large, elaborate, and costly washing machines, in which, by means of the action of running water, the diamonds are separated from the ordinary earth. It may be mentioned that in this process, 100 loads of blue ground are concentrated into one load of diamondiferous stuff. Another machine the "pul-sator," then separates this latter stuff, which appears to be a mass of blue and dark pebbles of all shapes, into four different sizes, which then pass on to the assorters. "The assorting is done on tables, first, while wet, by white men, and then dry by natives." The assorters work with a kind of trowel, and their accuracy in detecting and separating the diamond from the eight different kinds of mineral formations which reach them, is almost unerring.

"The diamond occurs in all shades of color, from deep yellow to blue white, from deep brown to light brown, and in a great variety of colors, green, blue, pink, brown, yellow, orange, pure white and opaque." The most valuable are the pure white and the deep orange. "The stones vary in size from that of a pin's head upwards; the largest diamond yet found weighed 428½ carats. It was cut and exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, and after cutting, weighed 228½ carats."

After assorting, the diamonds are sent daily to the general office under an armed escort, and delivered to the valuers in charge of the diamond department. The first operation is to clean the diamonds of any extraneous matter by boiling them in a mixture of nitric and sulphuric acids; when cleaned, they are carefully assorted again in respect of size, color and purity. The room in the DeBeers office, where they are then displayed, offers a most striking sight. It is lighted by large windows, underneath which runs a broad counter covered with white sheets of paper, on which are laid out innumerable glistening heaps of precious stones of indescribable variety. In this room are concentrated some 60,000 carats, the daily production of the Consolidated Mine being about 5,500 carats. When the diamonds have been valued, they are sold in parcels to local buyers, who represent the leading diamond merchants of Europe. The size of a parcel varies from a few thousand to tens of thousands of carats; in one instance, two years ago, nearly a quarter of a million of carats were sold in one lot to one buyer.

The company sustain a considerable loss annually, estimated now from 10 to 15 per cent., by diamonds being stolen from the mines. To check this loss, extraordinary precautions have been resorted to. The natives are engaged for a period of three months, during which time they are confined in a compound surrounded by a high wall. On returning from their day's work, they have to strip off all their clothes, which they hang on pegs in a shed. Stark naked they then proceed to the searching-room, where their mouths, their hair, their toes, their armpits, and every portion of their body are subjected to an elaborate examination. White men would never submit to such a process, but the native sustains the indignity with cheerful equanimity, considering only the high wages which he earns. After passing through the searching room, they pass, still in a state of nudity, to their apartments in the compound, where they find blankets in which to wrap themselves for the night. During the evening, the clothes, which they have left behind them, are carefully and minutely searched, and are restored to their owners in the morning.

The precautions which are taken a few days before the natives leave the compound, their engagement being terminated, to recover diamonds which they may have swallowed, are more easily imagined than described. In addition to these arrangements, a law of exceptional rigor punishes illicit diamond buying, known in the slang of South Africa as I D B-ism. Under this statute, the ordinary presumption of law in favor of the accused disappears, and an accused person has to prove his innocence in the clearest manner, instead of the accuser having to prove his guilt. Sentences are constantly passed on persons convicted of this offence, ranging from five to fifteen years. It must be admitted this law is in thorough conformity with South African sentiments, which elevates I D B-ism almost to the level, if not above the level, of actual homicide. If a man walking in the streets or in the precincts of Kimberley were to find a diamond, and were not immediately to take it to the registrar, restore it to him, and to have the fact of its restoration registered, he would be liable to a punishment of fifteen years penal servitude. In order to prevent illicit traffic, the quantities of diamonds produced by the mines are reported to the detective department both by the producers and the exporters.

All diamonds, except those which pass through illicit channels, are sent to England by registered post, the weekly shipments averaging from 40,000 to 50,000 carats.

The greatest outlet for stolen diamonds is through Transvaal to Natal, where they are shipped by respectable merchants, who turn a deaf ear to any information from the diamond fields to the effect that they are aiding the sale of stolen property. The most ingenious ruses are resorted to by the illicit dealers for conveying the stolen diamonds out of Kimberley. They are considerably assisted by the fact that the boundaries of the Transvaal and of the Free State approach within a few miles of Kimberley, and once across the border they are comparatively safe. Recently, so I was informed, a notorious diamond thief was seen leaving Kimberley on horseback for the Transvaal. Convinced of his iniquitous designs, he was seized by the police on the border, and thoroughly searched. Nothing was found on him, and he was perforce allowed to proceed. No sooner was he well across the border, than he, under the eyes of the detective, deliberately shot and cut open his horse, extracting from its intestines a large parcel of diamonds, which, previous to the journey, had been administered to the unfortunate animal in the form of a ball.

The DeBeers Directors manage their immense concern with great liberality. A model village, called Kenilworth, within the precincts of the mines, affords most comfortable and healthy accommodations for several of the European employés. Gardens are attached to cottages, and the planting of eucalyptus, cypress, pine and oak, as well as a variety of fruit trees, has been carried to a considerable extent. A very excellent club-house has also been built, which includes, besides the mess-room and kitchen, a reading-room, where many of the monthly papers and magazines are kept, together with six hundred volumes from the Kimberly Public Library. There is also a billiard-room, with two good tables, given by two of the directors. A large recreation ground is in the course of construction. Within the compound where the native laborers are confined is a store where they can procure cheaply all the necessities of life. Wood and water are supplied free of charge, and a large swimming bath is also provided, but I did not learn if the natives made much use of it. All sick natives are taken care of in a hospital connected with a compound, where medical attendance, nurses and food are supplied gratuitously by the company.

I should not omit to mention that the entire mine, above and underground, is lighted by electricity. There are ten circuits of electric lamps for DeBeers and Kimberley mines. They consist of fifty-two arc lamps of 1,000 candle power each, 691 glow lamps of 16 and 64 candle power each, or a total illuminating power of 63,696 candles. There are, moreover, thirty telephones, connecting the different centres of work together, and over eighty electric bells are used for signalling in shafts and on haulages. Such is this marvellous mine, the like of which, I doubt, whether the world can show.

When one considers the enormous capital invested, the elaborate and costly plant, the number of human beings employed, and the object of this unparalleled concentration of effort, curious reflections occur. In all other mining, distinctly profitable objects are sought, and purposes are carried out beneficial generally to mankind. This remark would apply to gold mines, to coal mines, to tin, copper and lead mines, but at the DeBeers mines, all the wonderful arrangements I have described above, are put in force in order to extract from the depths of the ground, solely for the wealthy classes, a tiny crystal, to be used for the gratification of female vanity, in imitation of a lust for personal adornment, essentially barbaric if not altogether savage.—Men, Mines and Animals in South Africa.

“DANGERS are God’s whetstones with which to keep men sharp.”

S. Morris and J. E. Rhoads’ Visits.

KAREIZAWA, Japan, Eighth Month 26th, 1892.

As was proposed, we went to Kamakura on Third-day and found accommodations at the hotel at which Dr. Whitney and family are spending their summer vacation. They were very kind to us, making our little visit there pleasant and helpful. The sea breeze is bracing and the temperature in contrast with that at Yokohama. I think a residence of two or three weeks at the latter place would have weakened us so as to make it difficult to use much exertion.

After dinner a party of us made a little excursion to Zuchi, a beautiful bay with a fine firm beach. Much sea-weed is washed up which the farmers gather to use for manure. A fine green kind is also used for food. Two sides of the bay are formed of high cliffs, in which paths have been cut to allow people to pass around them.

The first evening we visited a huge image of Buddha which is on the side of a hill near. The walk took us through villages where we could come in close contact with the native life in its simple forms. The image has stood where it is for more than 600 years, and succeeded another which dated back some 1200 years. It is of bronze, and has been cast where it is by piling up the moulding material in successive tiers, as is shown by the marks where they join to each other. It was formerly covered by a temple, the foundation stones of which are still in place. Some men came more to see than to worship; while a woman knelt a short time without uttering audible words, but bowing her head very low and then looking up. The grounds of one or two acres were in neat order, but nothing remarkable in their appearance. It is said, the temple grounds in Japan are very generally used by the children to play in. Another temple, not far off, was a wooden building, perhaps 40 feet square, open in front; it was divided through the middle so as to shut from view the back part, which is said to contain an image of the God of Mercy. In front of the partition was an image with a halo around the head and votive offerings in front; also, a smaller painted image that was of easy access, and which showed the rubbing it received from many hands, which were then applied to parts of the body that are diseased. Several men were sitting or reclining inside.

The sight of these things gave me a deeper sense of the debasing effect of idolatry; and though I did not care to see them so much to gratify curiosity, did not regret receiving the impressions that were made.

There were several missionaries at Kamakura, and some were invited to sit with us at Dr. W’s cottage, which proved an interesting and relieving opportunity.

A young Japanese Friend from Tokyo had been asked to accompany us on our trips to this place, to which we came yesterday. It is about 90 miles from Tokyo, and nearly half-way across the island. We rode many miles through a plain, in which, at one part of the route, scarcely any mountains could be seen; though we did have a pretty good view of Fuji Yama soon after starting. After a time the mountains began to appear, and before reaching here we have passed over the summit of the range. They are of wilder forms than any in our eastern United States. In some instances huge masses of rock appear to have been tilted up on edge, and elevated to the tops of high peaks, showing nearly perpendicular precipices of great height. The sides of the mountains are split into many sharp ridges with deep, narrow ravines between them.

After travelling as far as the railroad would bring us, we expected to finish the journey on a tramway. Others, however, had secured all the seats in advance of us, and it remained to find some other conveyance. One who accompanied us succeeded in engaging a jinrikisha apiece on condition of our walking over difficult parts of the road. Most of the way led over the same route as the tram line and the grade was very easy. The route wound in and out the ravines tediously, but after four hours of steady ascent, the top was reached. Our men stopped to refresh themselves at several tea-houses, eating a pretty full meal at one. We obtained tea and ice-water. Arrived at what the men thought should be the end of their contract, we found the house we were aiming for was at a village a mile off. They set us down in front of a hotel, but after some urging consented to go on. Soon we reached the village, and after some searching found quarters with kind people, with whom we now are.

The members of the different societies have united in holding a conference for mutual edification and instruction. The time for the address at to-morrow’s meeting had been assigned to one Chappell, during his absence. He came to us and proposed that the time should be given to us, thus making the way very easy to have an opportunity with them.

29th, 12 M.—We have had our meeting this morning, in which ——— was led to set before the Conference many of the truths of the Gospel relating to the Christian life, to worship and ministry. He recommended more silent waiting and communion, in order that the Divine counsel may be understood. There was a full attendance of the members, being nearly all missionaries. There seemed to be much solemnity felt, and although the time was not expired, less disposition to speak was manifested than at the other meetings. Considerable silence prevailed, and the meeting broke up.

I did not tell in the right place that we are in close proximity to a smoking volcano, called Asema. People frequently ascend it and look into the crater. Not long ago, it threw out a great quantity of scoria, which covers the ground where we are, several feet deep. The smoke is largely sulphurous vapor that does not show very much.

Nikko, Japan, 30th.—We left Karizawa yesterday morning at 7 o’clock by jinrikisha and went down the mountains by the same route as we had ascended, but much more quickly; our men keeping a pretty good pace where the road was not rough or muddy. There is an old pass, by way of which the time is still more shortened; it is, however, very steep, and the men would not undertake it single-handed.

Our young Japanese Friend bought our tickets by a different route than we had intended, whereby we travelled over the same road as we rode on in going to Yokogawa. There was a shorter route that led through the silk-producing district, but no quicker in point of time. As it was, we saw many fields of mulberry trees and some mills for reeling silk. It is said the women attend to feeding the worms, which eat day and night until they are ready to spin their cocoons. The leaves must be given dry, as wet leaves give the worms cold. The rearing, etc., is done in a second story to the houses, where it is dry and airy. We met dray-loads of sacks containing cocoons.

Nikko is famed for its temples; a description you will no doubt find in some of the books on Japan. We shall probably only see such as lie in our way, and not visit those that are most esteemed. Thousands of pilgrims come to them from various parts of the country, and much money is expended here by them.

The town is said to be a poor place for missionary work, because the people are peculiarly interested in the temple-religion. Vice, too, is prevalent. A few individuals are however willing to listen to Christian teaching.

Much labor has been expended about the temples and they are mostly kept in good repair. The priests are said to be making considerable effort to revive the old religion.

A lively river runs by the town, and streams are led along the streets, the soothing sounds of whose waters fill our ears. There are grand cypress or cedar trees along the principal avenues and on the hillsides, whose tall straight trunks and beautiful foliage are very impressive.

We have called on several persons this afternoon in company with M. A. Gundry, who has kindly befriended us. She has been staying here for some time. One of her young women from Tokyo is with her. She has a pretty new house on the bank of the river, fitted up in Japanese style, but possessing several chairs. These have strips of thin board fastened to the feet to prevent the fine mats being injured by them. The mats are near three inches thick, and somewhat yielding and elastic. Shoes are removed on entering, as the mats serve the purpose of beds and cushions.

One of our calls was on a woman from Osaka, who is putting up at a Japanese inn for the sake of learning the language. We here had the opportunity of sitting on the floor and taking tea and cake. The latter was cut in slices, standing on edge, which was to be taken off the plate with chopsticks. I thought I made out with the whole proceeding quite as well as any of our company, though my limbs were somewhat stiffened by the operation. Our hostess was a lively and agreeable woman from San Francisco. She teaches boys when at her station.

"THOU, God, seest me." How much more often has this text been used as a restraint from evil than as a stimulus to good! To the child of the Devil the thought that the searching eye of the all-powerful God is upon him comes with terrorizing power; but to the child of God the thought that the sleepless eye of the all-loving God is upon him is soul-satisfying and life-giving. Between the two there is the same kind of difference that lies between the child who, hand in hand with his father, walks trustingly through dangerous ways, and the rogue who fears "each bush an officer." The little child would not have his father forget his presence nor release his grasp; the slinking rogue would rather feel himself unwatched, unseen, unheld. What risks the one takes, he takes in the pursuit of evil; what risks the other takes, he takes in the pursuit of good. The one prays for the all-seeing eye; the other seeks to elude it. Everything depends upon which side we look at God from. It is quite in our own power to choose sides. God remains the same. Is He but dimly perceived, but little understood, only known in part? It is sufficient that He sees us. It is by his sight that we are to walk, not by our own. This is the only safe walking.—S. S. Times.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Gratitude.

The pertinent article with the above heading in THE FRIEND of the 22nd inst., was both timely and admonitory. What a striking illustration of poor human nature is contained in the narrative of the ten lepers, who were cleansed, that but one returned to render thanks unto Him, who had conferred such a signal benefit upon them. Alas! how often do we accept the gift, but forget the Giver! Not of such, however, was the Royal Psalmist, as manifested in the beautiful language contained in the 107th Psalm:

"Oh! that men would praise the Lord for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men!"

Our late dear friend, Ebenezer Worth, once remarked, "that it was a great favor to be sensible of our blessings."

The spirit of trust and hopefulness expressed in the following lines, have sometimes been cheering, and hoping they may be so to others, are offered for insertion in THE FRIEND—author unknown:

THE BRIGHT SIDE.

There is many a rest in the road of life,
If we only would stop to take it,
And many a tone from the better land,
If the querulous heart would wake it!
To the sunny soul that is full of hope
And whose beautiful trust ne'er faileth,
The grass is green and the flowers are bright,
Tho' the wintry storm prevaileth.

Better to hope, tho' the clouds hang low,
And to keep the eyes still lifted;
For the sweet blue sky will soon peep through,
When the ominous clouds are rifted!
There was never a night without a day,
Or an evening without a morning;
And the darkest hour, as the proverb goes,
Is the hour before the dawning.

There is many a gem in the path of life
Which we pass in an idle pleasure,
That is richer far than the jeweled crown,
Or the miser's hoarded treasure;
It may be the love of a little child,
Or a mother's prayers to heaven,
Or only a beggar's grateful thanks
For a cup of water given.

Better to weave in the web of life
A bright and golden filling,
And to do God's will with a ready heart
And hands that are swift and willing,
Than to snap the delicate slender thread
Of our curious lives asunder,
And then blame heaven for the tangled ends,
And sit, and grieve, and wonder.

THE ARM OF LOVE.

A young wife sits by a cradle nest,
Her fair boy smiling on her breast,
In the quiet room draws on the night,
And she rocks and sings by the soft lamplight;
On mother bosom the rest is deep;
In the arm of love—so fall asleep.

In the cool vale, under sunny sky,
We sit alone, my own and I;
A song of joy wells in my breast,
Ah, heart to heart, how sweet the rest!
The brooklets ripple, the breezes sweep,
In the arm of love—so fall asleep.

From the churchyard tolls the solemn bell,
For the pilgrim has finished his journey well;
Here lays he down the staff, long pressed;
In the bosom of earth, how calm the rest;
Above the casket the earth they heap;
In the arm of love—so fall asleep.

SELF-SUFFICING.

I know a lake among the hills,
Serene and bright and full and free.
Unfed by any mountain rills,
And with no outlet to the sea.
And yet I marvel if there be Found anywhere through all the land
So gold-and-jewel-rim'd a cup,
As Nature with her Hebe hand
Here brims, and kneeling, offers up.

Its molten surface gives the sky
In softest sapphire beauty back;
And when the storm comes scudding by,
Dark with its stress of thunder-rack—
Although its blue be tinged with black,
The tempest has no power to dash
The creamy swell against the shore,
Nor with defiant onset lash
The ripple to a sullen roar.

From secret sources stowed away
Beneath its own sweet water flows
The unseen strength, that day by day
Keeps it in such supreme repose
As never shallow current shows:
Its edges flash with tender green,
That lures from far the hungry herds,
And in its stooping copse are seen
The nests of thousand brooding birds.

Oh, for a nature like the lake's,
A gleam amid our summer hills!
That gives, ungrudged its own, nor takes;
That ever keeps its calm, and stills
Its heart, self-centred, even when ill
Impend with drift of tempest-foam;
That woos the weary, and above
All other, weaves a nested home
For every wandering wing of love!

FIRST-DAY THOUGHTS.

J. G. WHITTIER.

"In calm and cool and silence, once again
I find my old accustomed place among
My brethren, where, perchance, no human tongue
Shall utter words; where never hymn is sung,
Nor deep-toned organ blown, nor censer swung,
Nor dim light falling through the pictured pane!
There, syllabled by Silence, let me hear
The still small Voice which reached the Prophet's ear;
Read in my heart a still Diviner law
Than Israel's leader on his tables saw!
There let me strive with each besetting sin,
Recall my wandering fancies, and restrain
The sore disquiet of a restless brain;
And, as the path of duty is made plain,
May Grace be given that I may walk therein;
Not like the hireling, for his selfish gain,
With backward glances and reluctant tread,
Making a merit of his coward dread,
But, cheerful, in the light around me thrown,
Walking as one to pleasant service led;
Doing God's will as if it were my own,
Yet trusting not in mine, but in his strength alone."

THE Quakers have been in existence as a religious body of dissenters, for about two centuries, and have undoubtedly, established a character with the world at large, of a conscientious and moral people. And if numbers of the modern members fall short of the primitive simplicity of their early predecessors, and content themselves with the reputation attached to the memory of their good name, at any rate they ought to be cautious, lest their own acts tend to bring this justly earned reputation of the Society into disrepute; and more especially ought they to avoid mixing themselves up with the party feelings of the day, a practice opposed to their conduct in early times. And as the principle upon which they refuse the payment of tithes, and other ecclesiastical demands, is of a nature so different, and originates in a motive so much purer than the paltry consideration of pecuniary loss, they should cautiously consider, whether, in ning with other dissenters upon political ions, they are not lowering the standard of own character.—From Josiah Marsh's cong remarks in his life of George Fox.

A Clay Pit and its Fossils.

the banks of the Pensauken Creek, a few west of Moorestown, there is a bed of clay largely utilized in the manufacture of es and drain tile. The top layer is a yelay, such as is found in many parts of New Jersey. Underneath is a bed of clay or hardened mud, which has at former period been deposited in a bay or n of the ocean. Between the black mud the overlying yellow clay is a bed of dark tial, more sandy in its composition. In re numerous specimens of shells, &c., the ns of the animals which, in a former geo-age, lived and moved in the waters that ed it. These shells belong to species which aited salt water; and thus we are convinced alt water must have formerly covered this of the State.

A recent visit to the locality was rewarded ding several species that were interesting.
as a joint of a species of ancient cuttlehe shell of which, instead of being coiled spiral like the Ammonites and most other ish of one valve, had grown in a straight like a cane, the successive additions to were attached by a curiously complicated with projecting points like the sutures mark the edges of the bony plates of the n skull.

A subsequent visit several specimens of monites were obtained. These curious aniseem to have been very abundant in an-times, but so far as is known have all ied in the changes which the earth's suras undergone. The nearest approach to now existing is the Pearly Nautilus, a sea shell, consisting of many chambers, succeeding one larger, separated from each by a curved pearly plate. The animal, ic is a species of cuttle-fish, inhabits the e and larger chamber, and as its growth re-more space, secretes a new and larger d walls up its former abode by a plate of l. These cells form a spiral coil, and the shell is sometimes sawn in two with a cut-zel to the sides, thus exhibiting in a clear interesting manner, the construction and d of growth of the Pearly Nautilus.

The Ammonite shell is constructed in much me manner as the Pearly Nautilus, but ed of the cross partitions being smooth t, they are folded and crinkled so as to curious patterns on the outside of the shell.
are of various sizes from one inch to more yard in diameter. The largest one I aed was the size of a large dinner plate, elve or more inches across. But it was fect, one side having decayed and left no image in its place.

A poet has described the manner of growth se shells in the following lines:

After year behold the silent toil tread his lustrous coil;
as the spiral grew,
left the past year's dwelling for the new,
with soft steps its shining archway through,
up its idle door,
ed in his last found home, and knew the old no ore.

Along the shells some were bivalves, having ells joined at the back, like those of the clam and oyster, others were univalves coiled after the pattern of a snail shell. There were several pieces of fossil wood—some large flaky pieces like the chips a woodman would make in chopping up a tree—others were fragments of smaller branches two or three inches in diameter. These had evidently lain in the water, for they were perforated by a sea worm, like the modern Teredo, which had left its lining of limestone on the surface of its borings.

I have since my first visit, been to this locality several times, and never without adding to my collection. I am unable to give the names of the different species found, but as I have placed them in charge of a friend who is interested in geologic studies, I hope through his help to become better informed.

Immediately above the black sand before mentioned, is a layer strongly impregnated with iron, and containing specimens of small crystals of iron pyrites—sulphuret of iron. This layer is thrown out in digging the clay, as the amount of iron it contains is so great that it would fuse in the heat of the kiln, and spoil the bricks. The harder portions of the black sandy layer are also rejected, because they spoil the shape of the bricks. The foreman of the works took one of the bricks in whose composition this material had entered, and showed me how badly the sides were bulged out. On breaking it open, the centre was occupied by a black spongy mass, full of air cells, like bread that had been well raised. His theory was that it retained its original moisture so tenaciously, that when put into the kiln, enough water remained in it to create a steam, whose explosive force caused the bulging.

At my last visit my attention was called to several holes of two about feet in diameter, which had been laid bare by the removal of the clay. They descended rather rapidly towards the broad marsh which borders the bank, and through which the Pensauken Creek meanders.
Their lower outlet was probably under water.
The workmen said they had been made by otters, some of which animals had been killed in the vicinity. These holes were said to have communicated with each other, in the higher portions, which are now removed. I was surprised at the amount of excavation which these animals had made, and it increased my respect for their strength and industry.

Subsequently, on conversing with a friend who had long lived on the borders of the Pen-sauken, I was told that he had seen not only their traces, but the animals themselves. One writer on natural history speaks of the otter as distributed over North America, but most abundant in the remote regions of the northwest, which abound in lakes, furnishing the fish on which they live. They have been nearly exterminated in the more thickly settled sections of our country, but being a very active, wary and sagacious animal, some of them still survive.

The otter belongs to the weasel family, modified in structure so as to fit it for residence in the water and for the pursuit and capture of fish. Its fur is fine, soft and close, and much valued by furriers, several thousand of them being annually received by the Hudson Bay Company. They seem to be playful in their habits. Of one of their diversions, Dr. God-man says, "Their favorite sport is sliding, and for this purpose in winter the highest ridge of snow is selected, to the top of which the otters scramble, where, lying on the belly with the fore feet bent backward, they give themselves an impulse with their hind legs, and swiftly glide head foremost down the declivity. This sport they continue apparently with the keenest enjoyment until fatigue or hunger induces them to desist."

Audubon mentions observing a pair of otters sliding down the muddy surface of a slide on a tributary of the Ohio River, and counted each one make twenty-two slides before they were disturbed.

Dr. Godman says their burrows generally open under water, which from the appearance of things appeared to be the case with those in our clay pits. But although they were large enough for a man to descend them, I did not explore them sufficiently far to determine this point with accuracy.

The Amana Society.

The Amana Society, or Community of True Inspiration, as it is called by its members, is situated in Iowa County, about twenty miles west of Iowa City. There are at present 1700 members who live scattered in eight little hamlets. The Society owns 25,000 acres of land, 300 head of horses, 2000 head of cattle, and 3000 sheep, besides several valuable factories.
According to reliable figures the society is owner of a million and a half in round numbers.

As the Icarians are the remnant of the French communist school of this century, so the In-spirationists are the survivors of the great revival movement which took place in Germany in the early part of the eighteenth century.

The Inspirationists sprang from Mysticism and Pietism, two factors which play a conspicuous part in the church history of Germany. The mystics, of whom Böhme was the type, sought God from within and "listened to the knockings at their own hearts, and had conscience judge of right and wrong." This religion was common and had various names. In Spain and Italy it was named Quietism, in France it was called Jansenism, and in Germany it took the name of Pietism. In all these places it fought against religious formality, and it became a religion of the heart, instead of form.

The founder of the Pietists was Jacob Spener (1635-1670) a Lutheran minister in Frankfurt, who organized small prayer meetings called "Collegia Pietatis," hence the name Pietist. The Lutheran church never adopted or approved of these views. Thus, many left the church, while others became indifferent. In some of these meetings, many spoke, as they claimed, by inspiration. The first one was a lady of noble birth, Juliane Rosamunde, of Asseburg, who, from 1679 to 1686, became inspired several times as she believed. Johann W. Petersen, a learned professor of Lüneburg became interested in the matter, and finally became convinced that inspiration could take place now as well as in the time of the prophets. From 1693 to 1700 he travelled much as a minister.

The real founders of the Inspirationists were Eberhart Gruber and John F. Rock. The former was a minister in the Lutheran church, but lost his position because he defended the doctrines of Spener; the other was a minister's son, a saddler by trade, of a mystical turn of mind. Originally from Würtemberg, they moved to Hesse, where they could enjoy more religious freedom. Here they lived a retired life for several years, reading the Scriptures and associating with pious people. It was first in 1714 that the society was organized as a religious body. In a short time it numbered thousands of adherents in Germany, Switzerland and Alsace. It was a time of stagnation in religious matters, but there were a great many pious believers all over the country, and when a new society was organized, they were admitted.

The doctrines the believers held are as follows:

They believe in the inspiration of the Bible, and take it as the corner-stone of their faith, trying to live according to the teachings of Christ and the Apostles.

They think that as God revealed hidden things through visions, dreams, and by revelations in olden times, He can do so now.

They believe in inspiration, and maintain that inspiration can take place now as well as formerly. Inspiration, according to their idea, "is a supernatural influence of the spirit of God on the human mind, by which persons are qualified to set forth Divine Truth." The one who becomes subject to inspiration must have a "pure heart, a free soul without prior judgment, meek and obedient to Divine will."

They believe that there is false as well as true inspiration, and that prophesying did not cease with the Apostles.

They think the ministry of the gospel depends on Inspiration, and is not limited by class or sex. Therefore all members have an equal right to teach and exhort in public meetings; that if one is not led by the right spirit, no system of theological training can fit one to explain Scriptures. With them, "the Holy Ghost is sought from within, not from without." They believe in prayer, both in meetings and at home and in the closet. It is the "spontaneous expression of the soul which should not be fettered by any fixed or prescribed formula."

They do not believe in the Trinity as three distinct persons, but they reverently believe in the Three, conceived of as One.

They do not believe in a purgatory, nor in a millenium in this life; nor in predestination.

They believe in the resurrection, in a reward for the good, and punishment for the wicked.

They do not baptize with water, for they believe baptism is purely spiritual.

They believe in and use the Lord's Supper, but only as a symbol of an inward feasting with the Lord. It is not used at any stated time or place, but after severe trials, or misfortunes; for the strengthening of the young members; in the commemorating of the suffering of Christ. Several days spent in prayer are necessary in order to participate in this rite.

They practice feet washing, and have love-feasts, much in the manner of the primitive Christians.

They believe war to be inconsistent with Christianity, i. e., with the teachings of Christ and the apostles.

Oaths are inadmissible, since they were forbidden by Christ.

They use salutations, but object to frivolous plays as recreations which divert the mind from God.

Singing is indulged in at meetings and at home, for edification, but instrumental music is forbidden.

As the members refused to pay tithes, or support a hired ministry in any manner, and as they refused to enter the army and objected to take oaths, people began to suspect them. Priests and public officers were not slow in taking advantage of the severe laws, and caused the members to be arrested; but arrests, persecution and oppression only strengthened their belief, and made them more willing to suffer in order to proclaim Christ to the world.

They maintained that man is not saved by faith alone, but that good works are necessary. Great stress was laid on virtue. Honesty, uprightness and morality were strictly enforced on the members. Social as well as religious reforms they sought to accomplish, and this may be one reason why such an outcry arose from the mass of the people, who did not wish to be disturbed in the practices of their old customs.

From 1670 to 1817 stagnation set in, and it seemed that the glorious work which had begun should come to an untimely end. The older members had passed away, the younger ones lost courage or took up with the ways of the world. Still they hoped for a revival which had been prophesied. The dawn finally came unnoticed and unheralded. It brought new blood and new life into the society, and from this time (1817) its future was to a certain extent assured.

It was during this revival that William Allen, a minister of Friends, from England, was travelling in Germany. Hearing of these people, who held such peculiar religious views, he went to see them in 1822. Here he spent several days, and held several meetings among them, which seemed highly edifying to the members, for their creed had so much in common with Friends' principles. Allen, in his Memoirs, speaks of them with much respect, and the Inspirationists, who were granted the privilege of this meeting, have left us in their records an interesting account of Allen's visit among them a visit undertaken from motives of Christian love and fellowship.

The first who began to prophesy after this gift had ceased for over half a century, was Michael Kraussert, of Strassburg. His gift was recognized, and he began to travel and preach, again arousing the old enthusiasm. However, in a few years he fell back, and finally lost his power of prophecy.

The most remarkable person, perhaps, who was ever connected with the Society was Barbara Henemian, a poor, ignorant peasant girl from Lower Alsace, where she was born in 1795. She was one of the first awakened in the revival, one who experienced the oppression which the government practised more and more towards the members of the society during their last years in Germany. She followed the flock to America in search of freedom and a home, where she experienced all the trials to which they were exposed in the first settlement, near Buffalo, New York, and she was one of the first to go to Iowa, where she took up her work—a work which did not cease until 1883, when she was laid to rest.

Her parents were pious people, in poor circumstance. Barbara was of a lively disposition. She worked in a factory, where she earned a pittance at spinning wool; suddenly a peculiar state of mind bordering on melancholy clouded her lively temperament. Once, as she partook of the sacrament, the priest said, "Who is unworthy and drinks, he drinks judgment unto himself." This made a deep impression on her mind, and changed the whole course of her life. Hearing of the Inspirationists, she visited them, conversed about religion, and became a member. Soon she began to see visions and to prophesy. She came under the influence of what she believed to be inspiration, in the meetings, in the fields, while at work, at home or on journeys. For this reason persons always accompanied her, to take down what she said while under this influence.

This state of the mind caused jerking and twitchings of the body for a short time before she began to speak, so that she was conscious of what was coming on. When she concentrated her mind upon those things which she wished to know, it caused a nervous exhaustion from which she did not easily recover. She was only one in the society who was thought to possess the gift of inspiration. After the death of Christian Metz, in 1867, and since her death no one has claimed this gift.

From 1820 to 1830, persecution again broke out; many were driven out of Alsace and Switzerland, and they came to Hesse. Many were and so several who had means leased a few estates and factories where they could all live in common, eat together, and divide the profits if there were any. Here we have the first beginnings of the communistic life, which the society afterwards adopted. It arose unconsciously from small beginnings, with no thoughts of results which would flow from it.

When the year 1841 had arrived, things came to a crisis. The members drew up an imploring request to the ministry at Darmstadt begging for more freedom. Their children were compelled to attend the state schools, their women were sent to prison or taken into the army where they were compelled to spend their years of their lives in learning the art of war, which seemed inconsistent with true religion. Besides these trials there were other financial troubles which could not be settled, as crops had been poor and the factories they were running on the communistic plan were not realizing enough to pay debts and rents.

Christian Metz one day "felt a peculiar feeling come over him, and something like a light suddenly burst from heaven." He told to several of the members about his vision. He found that they also had had similar visions. In the summer of 1842, one of the members came "inspired," and told him they should leave their native land, and should settle in a free country and adopt a community of goods. After this vision was spoken, all the members assembled to discuss the feasibility of the plans. It was decided to select three members who should go to America, and buy a tract of land if they saw a favorable place.

It is out of place here to discuss the nature of these visions, neither are we called upon to decide how far the "inspiration" claimed by their preachers was a real breathing upon the part of the Spirit of God.

(To be concluded.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

After handing B. T. Jones, a Presbyterian minister of this place, one of T. Evans' Copy Account of Friends, and explaining to him that they were standard works in the Society of Orthodox Friends and that they contained the belief of Early Friends, and all true Friends down to the present day, he, Jones, said, "I could not get along without you Quakers. We Presbyterians and other denominations are like gambling, theatre-going, horse-racing, and other evils, but you Quakers stand like a rock against them. No, sir, we could not get along without your help in battling with these evils, and went on to explain the position he took that the Quakers took against all the evils that surrounded us, and that they were foremost in reforms."

THE person who cannot differ in judgment without engendering personal malice, or who will attempt to injure an opponent, or rejoice in his misfortune, is in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity.

Entombed Hypnotics.

BY BISHOP J. M. THOBURN.

every year or two a story goes the rounds of American papers to the effect that some of the wonderful devotees of India are able to themselves unconscious, or rather inanimate, and in this state be buried alive and left in the grave for days, and even months, after they are restored to life again.

I have repeatedly met with statements of this character; and some years ago, Dr. Buckley, who takes a special interest in researches of this kind, wrote to me to know how far my own observations had corroborated stories of the kind. In a general way I heard such stories, but had met with a single case, well attested otherwise. I began at once to make inquiries, and was repeatedly told that such cases actually occur; but after trying in vain to obtain even one of the floating stories which reached my ears, I gave up the task as hopeless. The man who is able to do it always lives many hundred miles distant. The name of the town or village can never be given. The place and time at which he performed the miracle are never known. In short, there is nothing but the most vague of shadows on which to build such a story.

As far as the stories with which Europe and America are concerned, they may one and all be traced to the history of a man, named Hari Singh, who belonged to Cashmere, or possibly the Punjab, and submitted himself to be buried alive in the presence of Ranjit Singh, in the year 1837. The authority almost invariably given for this statement is Dr. John Martin Honiberger, formerly physician at the court of Ranjit Singh, then ruler of the Sikhs. I was personally acquainted with Dr. Honiberger thirty years ago, and had every reason to esteem him as a man of veracity and integrity. He was at that time very old, but with a native memory and clear judgment. So far as his testimony to an occurrence which he is concerned, I should not hesitate to accept of it without question; but when I examine the story itself I find it far from satisfactory. Dr. Honiberger never witnessed anything of the kind. He says that he returned from a furlough in Europe in 1839, and on the day he had as a travelling companion General Ventura, who was at that time in the service of Ranjit Singh. In the course of the day General Ventura told him that during his absence some wonderful things had taken place at Lahore; that, among other things, a man from the mountains had been able to place himself in a state resembling death, and while in that condition was buried, and when disinterred returned to life again. Dr. Honiberger, after speaking of Hari Das as having submitted himself into a hypnotic or unconscious state, "He was wrapped in the linen on which he was sitting; the seal of Ranjit Singh was put thereon, and it was placed in a chest, which the Maharajah put a strong lock. The man was buried in a garden outside the city, and the place inclosed with a wall surrounded by sentinels. On the fortieth day, which was the time fixed for his exhumation, a great number of the authorities of the court, with General Ventura and several Europeans from the vicinity, one of them a medical officer, went to the inclosure. The chest was taken up and opened, and the fakir was found in the same position as they had left him, cold and stiff. A friend of mine told me that had I been present when they endeavored to bring him to life, by applying warmth to his head, injecting air into his ears and mouth, and rubbing the whole of his body to promote circulation, etc., I should certainly not have had the slightest doubt as to the reality of the performance. The minister, Raja Dhyam Singh, assured me that he himself kept this fakir four months under the ground when he was at Jummo, in the mountains. On the day of his burial he ordered his beard to be shaved, and at his exhumation his chin was as smooth as on the day of his interment, thus furnishing a complete proof of the powers of vitality having been suspended during that period."

The same story is related by one or two other writers; but it is worthy of note that they have it only as hearsay. Dr. Honiberger himself did not witness this wonderful scene. It is also stated that the man Hari Das had a bad reputation, and that his moral character was of the worst description. There is nothing incredible in the statement that he threw himself into a state which resembled death. That can be done by many men, both in India and elsewhere. Nor is it incredible that he was buried in the presence of Ranjit Singh. There, however, the admissions must cease. It is perfectly credible that the body was removed from the grave almost immediately after the guard had been set. Large numbers of these devotees are accomplished jugglers; but we need not assume that any real deception was used in this case. A very moderate bribe would accomplish all that was necessary. The story of the barley being sown over the ground was probably a later addition to the original statement. So also with regard to the interment lasting four months. The statement was made to Dr. Honiberger by an officer of Ranjit Singh; and even if we assume that this gentleman intended to tell the truth, he was no doubt credulous to the last degree, and perhaps noticed that he had a sympathetic hearer in the person of Dr. Honiberger.

The weak point in the whole story, however, is found in the fact that a little later an English officer proposed to Hari Das that he try an experiment by allowing himself to be locked up in a strong box, suspended from the ceiling of a room, so that the white ants could not possibly reach the box and endanger his safety, and remain for a specified time in the box, while the officer in question held the key. To this Hari Das would not for one moment consent. The key, no matter what happened, must be in the hands of his chosen friends. Dr. Honiberger states that many Englishmen lost confidence in his pretensions because of his unwillingness to have the experiment tried with reasonable safeguards to test its reality. When we remember that the whole occurrence took place more than fifty years ago, that all India has been searched over and over in vain for another man who can accomplish the same wonderful feat, and that only one case has yet been located so that even the most cursory examination of the alleged feat could be made, the reader will no doubt hesitate to believe so extraordinary a story. From the first the Indian jugglers and the Indian devotees have been practically one and the same, and it is from this extremely doubtful source that Theosophy has drawn most of its wonders and all its traditions. Our friends in America need not trouble their minds about people in India having learned how to bury themselves alive and remain in the grave four months, forty days, or any lesser period. Thus far the assertion that such a wonder has actually transpired rests upon an exceedingly slender foundation.—Christian Advocate.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Joseph Hoag's Vision.

In the article entitled "Joseph and Huldah Hoag," by F. G. Carliland, in No. 9 of the current vol. of "THE FRIEND," is a denial on the authority of Lindley M. Hoag and Wm. H. Dean, of the latter part of J. Hoag's Vision as published in his Journal.

Having assisted in the correction of the proof sheets of the Journal at the time of its publication, and being intimately connected with one of the Friends to whom J. Hoag committed his writings after his final revision of them, I had frequent opportunities of conversing with him, and then learned for the first time that L. M. H. and some others of the family denied some parts of the vision; particularly where speaking of the separation among Friends, he says, "Those who separated, went with lofty looks and taunting, censoring language." It was then that I was informed that this copy of the vision as well as some other parts of the manuscript Journal was taken down from his lips by Narcissa Battey—afterwards Coffin—as his amanuensis; the original with some other manuscripts having been lost while he was absent from home on religious account.

After seeing this article in THE FRIEND, I procured the address and wrote to Narcissa B. Coffin, and received from her husband a letter in reply (she being unable to write on account of ill health,) from which I extract the following, viz:

"The vision as it now stands in his Journal was taken from his lips by Narcissa when his faculties were in good condition. After she had finished writing it, she read it to him, and after waiting a short time, he said, 'That is right; that seems comfortable to me.'"

I might also here state that soon after the publication of the Journal, the surviving Friend to whom his writings had been consigned received letters from two of J. Hoag's daughters, expressive of their satisfaction with the Journal, as it was published, and particularly of the "vision entire," inasmuch as parts of it had been denied.

That he himself committed it to writing is evident from these words from his Journal, page 380: "I had no idea of writing it for many years, until it became such a burden that, for my own relief, I have written it."

The portion of the vision denied, reads as follows, viz:

"Then a Monarchical Power arose—took the government of the States—established a national religion, and made all Societies tributary to support its expenses. I saw them take property from Friends to a large amount. I was amazed at beholding all this, and heard a voice proclaim, 'This power shall not always stand, but with this Power I will chastise my Church until they return to the faithfulness of their forefathers. Thou seest what is coming on thy native land for their iniquity and the blood of Africa; the remembrance of which has come up before me.' This vision is yet for many days."

It is beyond credence that a man with sound mental faculties, as N. B. Coffin represents her grandfather Hoag at the time she assisted him in revising his Journal, should become so "confused" as to mistake his own opinion for what had been thus shown him in the vision of Light, and which had become such a burden upon his mind as to cause him to seek relief by committing it to writing.

To my mind the unfulfilled part of the vision is as authentic as those portions which have already been fulfilled.

Truly thy friend,

THOS. C. BATTEY.

MOSE, Ohio, Tenth Month 23rd.

"It is the time of our Yearly Meeting, and no doubt it has been the fervent concern of many Friends going up to this yearly sacrifice that our compassionate and good Shepherd might be near and strengthen for the service whereunto you are called.

"I have, in my musing upon the condition of our shattered and peeled Society, been often led earnestly to crave, that the remnant of the Lord's heritage who have been favored to see the excellency of our high and holy profession, might keep their ranks in righteousness, upholding the doctrines and testimonies which He has made it our duty to uphold.

"There is, amidst all our discouragements and weaknesses of flesh and spirit, cause for thankfulness, inasmuch as tokens for good are at times afforded, to raise our drooping spirits, and to increase our faith in Him whose compassions fail not, whose all-penetrating eye pierces through the thick darkness that at this moment surrounds our beloved Society; and his gracious ear is open to hear the cries and sighs of his faithful children everywhere. Oh! that there might be a rallying to, and confiding in, Him who has promised, 'Lo! I am with you alway; even to the end of the world!'

"My faith is unshaken in his fatherly care over his people whom He hath gathered from the world, its manners, fashions and customs, to be witnesses for himself in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation; and although they may be permitted to be closely tried and proved, as is the case with very many at the present time, yet all who faithfully adhere to the ancient covenant into which the Lord hath entered with them, will assuredly be kept; for, as is testified in that remarkable prediction of Francis Howgill: 'The sun shall leave its shining brightness and cease to give light to the world; and the moon shall be altogether darkness, and give no light unto the night; the stars shall cease to know their office or place; my covenant with day and night, times and seasons, shall sooner come to an end, than the covenant I have made with this people, into which they are entered with Me, shall end or be broken.'—Extracted from a Letter written by Joseph Edgerton, Fourth Month 20th, 1863.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows that the interest and non-interest bearing debt decreased $196,280 during the Tenth Month. The cash in the Treasury amounts to $766,202,480.23.

In the election held on the 8th inst., Grover Cleveland and Adlai E. Stevenson were elected President and Vice President of the United States.

The Government of the United States has given its assent to a proposed convention for the suppression or regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors and firearms to the islands of the Pacific Ocean. The plan was suggested by the British Government in Seventh Month last.

The Department of State has received official notice that the Gilbert Islands, in the Pacific, have been placed under the protection of Great Britain by decree promulgated on Fifth Month 27th, last. The King of one of the Gilbert Islands appealed to the United States for protection against this arrangement, but the United States replied negatively, Secretary Foster writing: "The Government of the United States is without colonial interests of any kind in that quarter of the globe, and its administrative abilities are remotely confined to participation in the encouragement of good government and autonomy in the Samoan group."

The Acting Secretary of the Treasury has advised the Department of State in response to a communication covering an inquiry from the United States Consul General at Berlin, that certificates of Imperial Commissioner Wermuth as to the identity of German laborers coming to this country as employees of exhibitors at the World's Columbian Exposition will be sufficient to secure such employees admission at our ports. Similar evidence of identity as to such employees from other countries will be regarded as sufficient.

Information received at the Post-office Department indicates that the return postal card recently issued by the Department will prove a success. Business men are ordering them in large quantities, and the sales up to this time exceed the expectation of the officials.

The Supervising Architect of the Treasury has approved the plans submitted by the Pneumatic Transit Company of New Jersey for entering the general Post-office building and the branch office, in Philadelphia, for the trial of the pneumatic tube service for mail transit purposes, and the work of construction will begin at once. It is the intention to have the work completed ready for test early next month.

The cranberry crop at Ilwaco, Wash., this year is said to be equal in quality to the Cape Cod product.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 380, being 37 less than the previous week and 30 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing 197 were male and 183 females; 39 died of consumption; 38 of diphtheria; 37 of diseases of the heart; 26 of pneumonia; 20 of marasmus; 17 of old age; 13 of bronchitis; 13 of cancer; 12 of convulsions; 12 Bright's disease; 12 of inflammation of the brain and 10 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 114½ a 115; currency, 6's, 107 a 117.

COTTON was dull, but ½c per pound higher. Middling uplands officially quoted at 8½c. per pound.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk spot, $15 a 16; spring bran, in bulk, spot, $14 a 15.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.15; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.75; Western winter, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.00; winter patent, $4.00 a $4.35; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.15; do., patent $4.25 a $4.50; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour was scarce and held at $3.65 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania. Buckwheat flour moved slowly at $1.85 a $1.95 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 71½ a 71½ cts.

No. 2 mixed corn, 47½ a 48 cts.

No. 2 white oats, 39½ a 40 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 4½ a 5 cts.; good, 4½ a 4½ cts.; medium, 4½ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 3½ cts. culls, 2½ a 3½ cts.; fat cows, 2½ a 3½ cts.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; medium, 4½ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4 cts.; culls, 2½ a 3½ cts. Lambs, 5½ a 6½ cts.

HOGS were in fair demand.

FOREIGN.—Twelve hundred police were concentrated in and about Trafalgar Square on the 5th inst., for the purpose of watching the gathering of unemployed working men who proposed to hold a great demonstration in the square. The mounted police force had been deprived of their swords and ordered to carry only their batons. The Home Secretary had instructed the Chief of Police to refrain from interfering with the crowd unless they became riotous, in which case the Chief had orders to act with vigor and put down the disorder. Precautions had been taken to prevent a mob from pillaging the shopkeepers in the neighborhood. Instead, however, of the vast throng of the unemployed that was expected to gather, not more than 200 persons were present at 2 o'clock, the time set for the meeting. The affair was a complete fizzle. A few red banners and several mottoes were seen. The crowd was chiefly made up of well-dressed spectators, who gathered to see what could be done. The working men were conspicuous by their absence.

All the efforts that have been made to bring about a settlement of the threatened strike in the cotton manufacturing industry have failed. Thirty mills at Ashton-under-Lyme were closed on the 5th inst., and the long threatened crisis was on. A general strike of the operatives commenced Seventh-day afternoon, and 55,000 persons are idle. The spinners have a good chief in Mawdsley, Secretary of the Automated Association of Operative Cotton Spinners is not likely that he will give way without a struggle. The general strike will probably last several months.

In commenting upon the outlook, the Pall Mall Gazette says it has no doubt that the heavy tariff on cotton goods abroad is at the bottom of the difficulty. Harrison is elected, it adds, there is no chance of better opening in the United States. Even if land is elected, a reduced duty on British cotton is uncertain. With all the European markets closed against the British product the outlook is not rosy.

The Irish statistics show an enormous increase in lunacy in Ireland. This is attributed partly to emigration, the robust leaving the weak and infirm at home. In 1891 the proportion was 355 lunatics every 100,000 of the population, against 249 in 1881.

A Cairo despatch to the London Times says that the Egyptian cotton crop is expected to exceed 1 million cantars (495,000,000 pounds), a yield exceeding the best previous records.

The military expenses of France, since the 1870-71, have been about $3,800,000,000.

When the reorganization under the present law is completed the German army will have attained a strength of 4,400,000 men, whereas France will be unable to go beyond her present war strength. The increase of the annual military expenses will be 64,000,000 marks.

The preamble of the bill sets forth that in view of the military political situation has undergone a change to Germany's disadvantage, and that this necessitates the adoption of thoroughgoing measures. The former military preponderance of Germany has disappeared. France has a war strength of 4,300,000 men and Russia of 4,556,000 men. To meet this Germany must utilize her defensive power to the full. Every man who is really capable of bearing arms must serve in the national forces.

The Chronicle's correspondent at Vienna says that the Austrian Reichsrath will soon discuss a bill to join the Oder and Danube Rivers by means of a canal, thus making a complete water-way between the Baltic Sea and the Black Sea. A French syndicate is surveying the route for the proposed canal.

Some uneasiness has been caused throughout India by the news of the appearance of the black plague, which has followed on the heels of the cholera in Turkestan. In the town of Askabad alone, 13 persons in a population of 30,000 died in the week ending Ninth Month 29th. The scourge often breaks out in cholera when the epidemic has been particularly severe. Medical knowledge of the strange malady is very meagre, for decomposition is so rapid that the mortuaries reveal nothing. The plague is more insidious and deadly than cholera itself. It sweeps the warning upon a district like a silent tornado, and appears suddenly as it came. It vanished from Askabad in six days, leaving only the corpses of its victims to mark its presence.

The deaths from cholera at Chang Kiang, India, are reported to aggregate from 30,000 to 40,000. The people going any distance from home carry a small bottle of the name and address thereon." Cholera is also reported at Hankow.

The Odessa correspondent of the London Daily News says: "During 1891, 109,515 persons emigrated from Russia to America. In 1890, 85,548 had emigrated thither."

New Zealand has set apart two islands for the preservation of wild birds and other animals.

The Chilean Government has absolutely prohibited fishing for sea lions, seals and sea otters in the Archipelago of Chile, Island of Juan Fernandez and the territory of the Straits of Magellan.

A telegram from Durango, Mexico, says that a large quantity of iron in the world, has been purchased by Huntington, President of the Southern Pacific Railway Company.

It is reported from Mexico that a company has been organized to mine the sulphur in the crater of the volcano Popocatepetl, which is now said to be in a quiescent state.

Delegates from the Dominion Government of Newfoundland are to meet in Halifax this week to discuss the trade relations of the two countries.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—Trains leave Broad Street Station, Philadelphia, at 7:17 A. M., 2:53 and 4:35 P. M., for Westtown, are received at the station. Z. HAINES, agent.

"The situation of these few sheep, as it were, in a wilderness country, calls for near sympathy, and it is a favor when not only this feeling is extended, but a willingness accompanies it to let it run as it flows. It is about four years since they were first visited by G. D., S. Emlen, and J. Kendal; that life which is the crown of all profession is certainly low; the seed seems in a wintry state, scarcely shooting above ground, yet we have thought it is under the care of Him who can nourish and bring it forth, if it be only allowed to lie under his cultivating hand, and not exposed too much to the chilling breath of our surroundings. There are also some hidden, seeking minds in these parts—perhaps mixed with the various names to religion, and others who we find do not join with any denomination, but keep quietly among themselves, exemplary in their conduct, doing good, and communicating of their outward blessings; plain in their appearance and manner; one of these, after sitting in an opportunity where evident solemnity covered us, observed, that though we could not understand each other, there was 'a feeling and unity within.'

"First-day, 6th of Fourth Month. We had no public meetings, one at half-past nine, the other at four. G. D. and S. G. were favored to minister with Gospel love and authority, I had shed cause for confusion, and the acknowledgment that to me belongeth shame; pain still attends the remembrance of my want of dedication in these meetings.

"Second-day morning. We had a little sitting among ourselves, desiring to feel our way on, or detention in this city, rightly ordered; we were afresh helped to believe, that, as the eye was kept single, he who had led forth would continue to preserve us. We went to tea with a family named Decknatel—a widow, her son, and two daughters; these were educated in the nabaptist profession her husband having been preacher among this sect, but since his death they have not joined in communion with any particular people, but keep themselves select, except sometimes going to the Moravian worship. A sweet influence prevailed in the house, and a good deal of religious conversation occurred—J. Vanderwerf being with us to interest. They believe in the sufficiency of the Spirit of Truth to lead into all truth, though they seem not fully to have entered into that rest where there is a ceasing from our own works, as they sing hymns sometimes, and have an instrument of music in their house. They were very desirous of understanding us, and our errand—it seemed strange to them for me to leave a husband and seven children, but feeling liberty to enter a little into the cause, and some particulars of my conviction, &c. as the remembrance arose with renewed thankfulness, they appeared not only satisfied, but to comprehend the language. This conversation introduced to a solemn silence, in which they readily joined, and we had each to unite in the testimony that the salutation of 'peace unto it' belonged to the house: this memorable season closed in awful supplication, and we parted under a feeling of that pure love which throws down the narrow barriers of nominal distinction, and baptizes into the unity of the one Spirit.

"9th. At four o'clock this afternoon we had another public meeting, which was well attended as to numbers, but the people were unsettled in time of silence; the doctrine of Truth ran clearly, and a hope was raised that some felt a testimony to it in their own minds.

"Left Amsterdam with J. F., Jr., and Frederick Mentz, in a carriage boat, the usual way of travelling in this country; it is drawn along a canal by a horse, and consists of a small cabin, calculated to hold seven or eight, and a larger room which will contain about thirty people, with seats to accommodate all the passengers, and light sufficient to work by. We arrived at Utrecht between three and four o'clock, felt exercised respecting a meeting here, but not living enough by faith, and looking too much outward, discouragement prevailed.

"11th. Set off from Utrecht in a post wagon, and travelled over deep roads, through a woody country thickly inhabited, though the land is poor, and we found but indifferent lodging and entertainment until we reached Dusseldorf, on the evening of the 13th, where we got to a good inn.

"14th. Concluded to stay this day, to feel whether bound or dismissed from hence; in the forenoon called on Michael David Wetterboar, whom our friends Decknatel recommended us to see, we also drank tea with him, and found him an inward retired man, living pretty much alone, and not knowing that he has any companions in this large place, where superstition seems to reign. We had a season of solid retirement after tea, and some profitable conversation through R. G. in French.

"Went off the direct course about eighteen miles to Elberfeld, expecting to find some seeking people. We were directed to a person named Smith, with whom we spent a little time; he speaks English and was civil, but seemed fearful of engaging to be our interpreter; he informed us there were some mystics in town, who met together on First-days, but we found no way to get into their company. In the morning we walked out, G. D. and I one way, and R. and S. G. another, but though we called in at some houses, no way opened for a meeting, we therefore returned to Dusseldorf to tea. M. D. W. spent the evening with us, and we had a season of spiritual refreshment in the feeling of Christian liberty and love, under which we parted.

"17th. Left Dusseldorf, about half-past six, and got to Cologne to dinner—a dark place of popish superstition, crosses and images appearing almost everywhere in and about it; we all felt oppressed and glad to leave this place; reached Bonn, a smaller town, where similar idolatry prevailed; G. D. and R. G. walking out, saw the host, as it is called, carrying about and the people kneeling to it.

"18th. Rode through a beautiful valley of vineyards, and other plantations, bounded on one side with richly cultivated mountains, and on the other by the Rhine, on each side of which towns and villages thickly appeared, also some monasteries and ruins, altogether forming as diversified and lovely a scene as I ever rode through; but in this day's journey I found nature unusually oppressed, so that it was hard to bear the motion, and my illness increased so much, that when I saw a town on the other side of the Rhine, not knowing it was our destination, I thought it looked a desirable resting place, and wished to get to it; when the driver turned the carriage that way, and it proved to be Nieuwied, a place to which we had recommendations.* Here we got to a comfortable inn, like a private lodging, kept by Moravians, who received us cordially, and we took up our quarters with them.

"19th. I was very ill, so as to lie in bed all day, low in mind, as well as in body; dear S. G. indisposed also, and we felt glad in this state to be in a quiet asylum.

"20th. First-day, my complaints continuing I was not able to go out, my dear companions sat at my bedside, where, in a season of quiet refreshment, we remembered with comfort that it was when the disciples walked together and were sad, that their great Master joined himself to them.

"21st. A day of distress every way, mostly in bed during the forenoon; after dinner went to see the Moravian establishment, the schools for girls and boys, &c., but so low that nothing seemed capable of cheering me; my faith and patience are so tried that I am often ready to fear the honor of the great name, and that excellent cause which, through every discouragement, is dear to my heart, may suffer by my engaging in this embassy. I feel myself so insufficient for the work, and even at seasons

* Copy of one of the Introductory Letters given by the family of Decknatel:

"My Dear Brother:—I give this address by these Friends, whom they call Quakers, from England; perhaps they will call in their journey at Nieuwied—though you cannot speak with them but by an interpreter, yet you may have an agreeable feeling and influence in silence, through the favor of the Lord, which you desire—I salute you with renewed affection.
J. D."

when holy help is near, qualified to do so little, that I am ready to query, for what am I sent? Yet I remember there are various vessels in a house, and it may sometimes seem proper to the Master to call for one of the smallest, to use as He pleases—to convey what He appoints; and if care be only taken to have this vessel kept clean, though it may not be often called for, or able to contain much, it may answer some little purpose, by having a place in the house; and help to fill up some corner, which a larger one could not so easily get into. I know that I sought not this, that I ventured not without feeling the weight of 'Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel' where the holy finger is bapisms, with the renewal of frequent close conflicts, raise a hope through all, that though the sea may be permitted to swell, and the waves rise exceedingly high, the poor vessel will be preserved from becoming a wreck amidst the storms, and the little cargo be safely landed at last.

"23rd. We called this morning on an old man, belonging to a sect who called themselves inspired—a little conversation through an interpreter proved rather satisfactory. At seven in the evening we went to sit with these people in their meeting, expecting from the account received of them, that they sat mostly in silence, but we found it far otherwise. They remained awhile still, with apparent solemnity, then all kneeled down, and used words as prayer, afterwards singing, then one of them read part of a chapter and expounded. We sat still until they had concluded, when a few words were, as well as the language admitted, conveyed to them. On the whole we were not sorry we obtained this acquaintance with their manner of worship, as others denominated them Quakers, and we were now able to unfold to them the difference between us. We have abundance to discourage us within and without, many fears, and no outward help but the comfort we find in being closely banded together; and beside the sufferings we are dipped into, no apparent prospect of these tending to gather many, if any, from the barren mountains; for let us feel as we may, we have, since leaving Utrecht, been unable to convey our meaning to the people in general, and appointed no meeting—what our passing through, and being as gazing stocks may do, must be left; it will, I trust, increase our humiliation, if no other good be done.

I read of a boy who had a remarkable dream. He thought that the richest man in town came to him and said: "I am tired of my house and grounds; come and take care of them and I will give them to you." Then came an honored judge and said: "I want you to take my place; I am weary of being in court day after day; I will give you my seat on the bench if you will do my work." Then the doctor proposed that he take his extensive practice and let him rest, and so on. At last up shambled old Tommy, and said: "I'm wanted to fill a drunkard's grave; I have come to see if you will take my place in these saloons and on these streets?"

This is a dream that is not all a dream. For every boy in this land to-day who lives to grow up, some position is waiting as surely as if rich man, judge, doctor, or drunkard stood ready to hand over his place at once. Which will you choose, boys? There are thousands of honorable places; but there are also prison cells and drunkard's graves. Which do you choose?

For "THE FRIEND."

A Trip to East Branch.

East Branch is the location of an old Friend's meeting house in New Jersey, 13 miles east of Bordentown. It is supposed to have derived its name from its nearness to the east branch of the Assumpink Creek, which empties into the Delaware River at Trenton. The house is on an elevated piece of land, commanding an extensive view over the surrounding country.

After the separation of 1827, the house remained in the possession of the adherents to Elias Hicks, but the meeting gradually declined and was discontinued many years ago, although circular meetings are held there once a month during the summer season. The minds of some Friends being drawn towards the people in that section of the country, the writer accompanied two of them on a visit to the spot, leaving home for that purpose on a Seventh-day in the latter part of the Tenth Month, and going to the neighborhood of the village of Crosswicks, where we were hospitably entertained by a member of that meeting, who took us the next afternoon to East Branch.

During the evening, and at intervals of the following day, there was much interesting and instructive conversation. In illustrating the importance of keeping the mind in a watchful state, so as to be prepared to receive the impressions which the spirit of the Lord might make upon it, and so to perform any services which might be called for, one of the company told of a Friend, who in travelling, shortly before, had found himself in company with eight or ten others in the receiving room of a hotel, where one of the guests was quite profane. While weighing in his own mind the question as to how to administer a reproof, or what was his duty in the case, a conversation on the subject of conscience arose between two of the company, who appeared to be young men of some education. Finally our friend was appealed to to know his views on the question. He replied that conscience was a natural faculty of man, and might be perverted; but he believed in the Scripture doctrine, that the "Grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men teaching them," &c., and that when conscience was instructed by this grace it was infallible. One thing led on to another, the company became interested, and the profane man was quiet and sober, so that it proved an instructive and profitable opportunity.

Our host spoke of the increase in numbers in that section of the Episcopalians, and said that an Evangelist of that denomination had been some time before holding a number of revival meetings at Trenton.

Two of his acquaintances, very respectable people, had attended several of these, and were quite interested in them. One evening, before the Evangelist commenced his discourse, the preacher in charge of the place, made a short address, encouraging those who felt induced to do so, to become members of their church; and to make the way easy, told the audience, that if any of them wished to indulge in drinking, card-playing, attending theatres or dancing, none of these things would be in their way. Our host's friends were so disgusted with this speech, that they lost all interest in the meetings. It is to be hoped that very few of the preachers of the Episcopalians or of any other sect, would thus boldly set at naught the commands of our Saviour and his apostles not to be conformed to this world, but to deny themselves, and take up the cross and follow our Holy Redeemer. It is a horrible thing for the preachers of religion to teach people that they can be true Christians without submitting to the heart changing operations of that grace which teacheth to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly in this world. "His servants ye are to whom ye obey"—Christ came into the world to save sinners—but those who are saved by Him, whom He redeems from the corruptions, and as William Penn forcibly states, "We deem it a state of presumption to call Jesus Redeemer, and yet they not redeemed by Him from their passion, pride, covetousness, wantonness, vanity, vain honors, friendships and glory of this world."

At the usual meeting of Friends at Crosswicks, the prominent thought in the vocal communications appeared to be the necessity of abiding in Christ, the true vine—feeling his life and power to rule in us, and be the governing motive of our actions.

Our ride in the afternoon was through a well cultivated and productive country, a part of the Cretaceous formation which extends in a broad belt across the State in a northeast direction from Salem in southern New Jersey to Raritan Bay. It was a clayey loam, with some sand and occasional patches of gravel. Near the village of Crosswicks, the road crossed a narrow valley washed out by a small branch of Crosswicks Creek, and exposing on the side a thick bed of dark blue or black clay similar in appearance to that found further south in the neighborhood of Pensaukin Creek. Here an extensive manufactory of brick and drain tiles had been established. The bricks made from this clay are hard and flinty, and difficult to break in such shapes and sizes as the masons require. A visit to the locality the following morning showed that some fossils were to be found there. The proprietor said they met with shark's teeth and other forms, but he had not saved any. As they were not digging clay at the time, having ceased for the winter, our search did not develop many specimens; yet we picked up impressions of a fluted shell, and a piece with the peculiar joint of an Ammonite.

Two weeks before our visit to East Branch meeting had been appointed at that place for the same Friends; but as the letter informing them of the fact failed to reach them, the ministers had not gone there. A considerable number of the neighbors had collected to whom it was stated that the expected preachers had failed to come. It was concluded notwithstanding to hold the meeting; and one who attended it said that the feeling that they were sitting in the presence of the Almighty One, and no more to depend upon, seemed to make the season of silent worship peculiarly impressive. There was afterwards some acceptable vocal service.

On this occasion the congregation was not large, but it was a favored meeting. The closing and offices of our Saviour, Jesus Christ, were dwelt upon, and many Scripture texts quoted show that it flowed from the love of God, who gave his only begotten Son for our redemption, that He came into the world that we might have life and might have it more abundantly. Attention was also called to the necessity of experiencing the inward revelation of the Light of Christ in the soul, in accordance with the declaration, "If when we were enemies to God, we were reconciled by the death of his Son, much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." Very earnest and persuasive exhortations were delivered to the people to yield their hearts to the visitations of Divine love. J. W.

Eighth Month 30th.—Many of the Missionaries feel that but slow progress is being made in the conversion of the people, and they must look to the call they have received to the labor or encouragement rather than to results.

It would evidently be a difficult undertaking for Friends to engage in, and keep strictly to our principles in preaching and worship. Being thrown much into association with those of other societies is likely to prove too strong a temptation to depart from our established testimonies when mingling among them; which is likely to be the case where there are comparatively few religious people, and they mostly engaged in the same cause.

I could not therefore encourage our conscientious members to enter on such a life unless they had a very clear call to it; for I cannot see how any one can be rightly occupying a spiritual life, and at the same time habitually violating their conscientious convictions.

31st.—A beautifully clear sky and refreshing breeze induced us to walk along the river this morning. Passing near M. A. Gundry's, she soon joined us. The water is beautifully clear and flows in rapids and cascades over hard rocks worn smooth by its action. The banks, as in almost every place not trodden or cultivated by man, are covered by plants and trees in great variety, and of the most pleasing and graceful forms. Mountains rise on either side to add grandeur to the view.

Our walk soon brought us to the Temple of One Hundred Gods. The stone images are arranged along one side of the path and facing the river. They appear to be nearly all of Buddha, though the features vary to a certain extent. A number were headless, or the heads had been broken off and then set on again. We witnessed an earthquake had done the destruction. A few images were placed upon rocks or other picturesque spots, an eye to effect being evident in the whole arrangement.

Small stones were heaped up at the base of certain idols, and small slips of paper with characters on them were pasted on many; all of which represented prayers. The whole place was open and free. The entrance was marked by heavy stone walls. At one spot, an inscription in Sanscrit was carved on an overhanging rock on the opposite side of the stream—said to be very ancient.

A fee is paid for a ticket to visit the grand temples containing the tombs of celebrated Shouns, and the shoes must be removed on entering. As our business is not sight-seeing, we do not think it right to indulge in what seems too much like encouraging idolatry.

One or two calls seem likely to end our service here and our prospect is to return to Yokohama to-morrow.

Ninth Month 3rd.—Our journey from Nikko to Yokohama was comfortably accomplished on Fifth-day. Yesterday, a letter came from Dr. Whitney proposing that we should spend First-day at Hakone, a mountain resort to the South. Tamakura being on or near the route, we spent last night there.

Doctor has given us explicit directions as to the route and letters of introduction to some of the people he wished us to see, and we are now on the way.

This being on the main line of railroad toward the south, the cars are well filled with people. We ride second class—fare two sen per mile. Third class cars are fairly comfortable—fare one sen per mile. They are generally well filled, as the Japanese are evidently a travelling people. While it is said they are not very energetic or pushing in business, they appear to us to be industrious as we see them about their homes and farms.

A great variety of crops is raised, but rice is the great staple. This is only undertaken on land that can be irrigated, and often succeeds with other crops. The greater part of what we see is not yet in head, having been sown in the Sixth Month or near that time.

Much ingenuity is shown in preparing the ground for flooding by dividing it into plats by little ridges according to the different levels. These are sometimes in dells that are terraced as the land gently rises between narrow spurs that run out from the main ridge of hills. The terraces are like steps as we view them from the valleys, and the rice is a vivid green; as are also the hills, being covered with an exuberance of bamboo grass, trees, shrubs, vines, and other plants. Some of these little scenes are among the most pleasing.

5.20 p. m.—While writing we reached the point where we leave the steam-road and take to tram cars.—The second class and third being filled, we take a first class car, the chief advantage in which is plenty of room; but for the privilege fifty sen instead of thirty is charged. This carried us to Yumoto over an easy grade. Here we transferred to jinrikishas with two men apiece and commenced a steeper climb over a fairly good road. Several miles ride brought us to Miyonoshita, high up the pass, where is a first class hotel.

We had the name of a woman who is boarding at this place, and we stopped for 'tiffin' (lunch). She gave us much interesting information in the short time we were together, including an account of a young convert who had recently died in the faith.

Having eaten a good meal, we were soon ready to resume our journey, which must be either on foot, horse, or koga (pronounced konga). The latter is a frame floor and top suspended from a pole and carried by two men, on their shoulders. We had each an extra coolie to relieve the carriers, and another to bear our two valises slung to a staff, making seven men in all. The distance is about seven miles, and the path narrow, steep, and rocky in many parts of it. Our men kept in good heart all through, although the frequent shifting of the pole from one shoulder to the other indicated it an irksome task. We chose to walk over some of the most difficult places. After passing the summit there was a descent, down which a trot was in order. This was anything but soothing to a reclining head, and I was ready to choose a walk for our return in preference to the kogo.

On reaching Hakone we were directed to a Japanese hotel. A lively little woman took us in charge, assigning us to two pleasant communicating rooms which overlook a beautiful lake set among the mountains. Our altitude is over 3000 feet and the air is fresh and invigorating, a great contrast to that of Yokohama.

The conical form of Fuji Yama is in view from our windows, although it must be many miles off.

Our house is in Japanese fashion, somewhat modified to suit foreign ideas. Our rooms are private by means of the sliding frames and screens. On the side towards the lake glass sash shut out the cool night winds.

Dinner in foreign style of cooking, &c., was served us in our rooms, by the entertaining hostess, who can talk enough English to ask and answer numerous questions.

A bath was early provided for each of us, as part of the needful conveniences.

There is so much that is new to be seen that one's letters could be extended to a great length and but little be said about the main object of our visit, which we are desirous to keep steadily in view. Much travelling and time may be spent in seeing a few individuals.

A teapot and cup, purchased at a railroad station, full of tea, for three sen, are too brittle to mail.

We may be at Mito, where is a Friend's meeting next First-day, the 11th, if Dr. Whitney can leave home. He has spoken of numerous other places it would be desirable to visit after the schools open.

Hakone, Japan, 4th.—The railroad system is good, and is being extended over the island. It is nearly all owned by the Government, and managed by Japanese officials. Their engineers lay out new roads and superintend their construction, which latter is substantial. The English system of cars and passenger traffic is in use, except on one road in the island of Yezo, which is American.

The land was taken from the Daimios at a price, and is sold in fee simple to the farmers, so that there is likely to be a large body of the population interested in peace, and a good administration of National affairs.

To be in a state of mind or feeling, and to know just what word or phrase one's native language appropriates as a symbol to express that condition, are two different things. Many a person's best self is discredited by the world because that person is without the power of adequately expressing himself. While this is in a degree true of persons of any age or position, it is most true of the young child. It is a comparatively easy matter for a baby to learn what the word "hand," for instance, stands for. It is a much more difficult matter to know what state of mind abstract terms like "joy," or "regret," stand for. And yet we are likely to forget how gradual must be the process by which a child comes into a full appreciation of such abstract terms. It is easy to hold up the hand and say "hand." It is not so easy to hold up the feeling we call joy, and say that that is joy. "Are you sorry I am going away?" said a well-meaning visitor to a little child, as the child said good-bye to her through the car-window. The child nodded in a doubtful way, as if maybe it ought to be sorry, whatever that might mean. Many a child has been put down as callous or indifferent, because it failed to say it was "sorry" for doing wrong, when it could not be certain what being "sorry" implied; and a child, much more than an adult, prefers to know what it is talking about before it begins to speak. Only those who have been "in the habit of steeping the mind in the atmosphere of child-life" can realize what a complex and extended process of observation, induction, and deduction it takes, in a child, to arrive at a certainty what the use of "sorry" or any other abstract term commits one to. But the great number of adults whose understanding of their own language is very slight ought at least to be taken as a hint not to expect too much in that line from a little child. To appreciate the mind and sentiments of childhood, we must look a good deal farther and more deeply than to mere words.—S. S. Times.

LITTLE FOXES.

MARY CRANE.

[This poem was printed in THE FRIEND some years since, and is now re-printed by request.—Ed.]

"Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines."—SOL. SONGS, ii. 15.

Little foxes spoiling
The beloved vine
Trusted to my tending
By the hand Divine;
Little foxes, wherefore
Have ye entrance found
To the vine so precious
Growing in my ground?

Have ye leaped the fences?
Have ye climbed the wall?
Were there tiny openings?
Ye are very small;
And ye can creep slyly
Through a tiny space;
But I thought I closed up
Every open place.

And I watch by daytime,
And I watch by night,
For the vine you're spoiling
Is my heart's delight;
I have kept the earth worm
From its precious root;
I have trimmed the branches
But they bear no fruit.

For the little foxes
Have assailed the vine
Trusted to my tending
By the Hand Divine,
And though I've been faithful
Since its birthday morn,
They were in the garden
When the babe was born.

For they were the failings
That I would not see
When they were my failings,
When they dwelt in me.
Little faults unheeded
That I now despise,
For my baby took them
With my hair and eyes.

And I chide her often,
For I know I must;
Yet I do it always
Bowed down to the dust;
With a face all crimson
With a burning blush,
With an inward whisper
That I cannot hush.

And sometimes it seemeth
Like the voice of God,
And it says, "Poor coward
Using now the rod
On a child's frail body
Till I hear it moan,
And see it shrink and quiver,
For a sin thine own!"

Oh my Father, pity,
Pity and forgive!
Slay the little foxes
I allowed to live
Till they left the larger
For the smaller vine—
Till they touched the dear life,
Dearer far than mine.

Oh! my Father, hear me,
Make my darling thine;
Though I am so human,
Make her all Divine;
Slay the little foxes,
That both vines may be Laden with fruit worthy
To be offered thee.

SHELLS we find on the beach, for pearls we must dive.

The Spirit of Sport.

The very essence of sport with a gun is suffering and bloodshed. I do not call these consequences, they are a necessity of sport. The death-throe is not an accident, but an object; and pleasure in witnessing it is an inherent essential part of enjoyable sport. To this end, and this only, is game preserved and killed.

In all tales of sport the death throes of the bird or animal are lingered upon. What is the joy of "playing" a trout or salmon but enjoyment of an animal's death-struggle prolonged as far as possible?

This love of bloodshed—delight in killing—is the animus of pigeon-shooting. The pigeons are carefully kept and well fed, in order that they may be vigorous. Then they are placed in "traps"—a contrivance to toss them into the air. The shooter, with a double-barrelled gun, stands at a convenient distance all ready, and the instant the bird appears he is shot at. If killed on the spot it is well; if not, he is found as soon as possible, if possible, and has his neck wrung. This is pigeon-shooting in its best estate. The bird has little chance to get away. It is ejected from the trap into easy range of the gun before it has even an opportunity to escape. Now there are machines which toss balls of glass or winged contrivances of clay. These are thrown into the air swiftly and irregularly, and are as hard to hit as a live pigeon—harder in fact. Sportsmen acknowledge this, but reject them when they can afford to get live pigeons. They say it is "no fun" to knock the glass to pieces. They want to see the feathers fly, and watch the stricken bird roll over and over and flutter to the ground.

Very little removed from the baseness of pigeon-shooting at traps is grouse-driving. Hedges, or shelters, large enough to hide the grouse, are built so near together that no part of the space between them is out of shot-range. These extend in a continuous line across an open field or moor. A sportsman, having two double-barrelled guns, and an assistant to load them, is stationed in each hedge. Then a ring of attendants begins beating the moor, and the grouse and pheasants are driven forward toward the line of guns. They suspect nothing—there is nowhere else to go if they do—and are shot down as rapidly as they appear; not one in twenty being quite killed, not one in fifty escaping unhurt. When the drive is over, such of the wounded as the dogs can find weltering in their blood are retrieved and killed, and there is loud glorifying if the total result is larger than was made last year or somewhere else.

The same thirst for the death of an animal—any animal—belongs to the shooting of larger game. Men lauded as "true sportsmen" range the wilds of every continent, at vast expense of money and time, to put to death animals in a way and for purposes to be explained only as the gratification of selfish and worse than brutal propensities. The leopard and hyena are hated and despised because they wantonly destroy more than they can feed upon, apparently from mere bloodthirstiness; while the lion and tiger are held noble because they kill only what they can devour. It is the former rather than the latter that the sportsman resembles.

The very essence of sport with a gun is the doing and enjoyment of death and bloodshed.—From Our Animal Friends.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Amana Society.

In the same year (1842), three men went to New York, and from there to Buffalo, where they purchased 5000 acres of the Seneca Reservation, lying six miles east of Buffalo. In the spring of 1843 the members began to come, and the first village of a communistic nature was laid out, much after the manner of the old German village. It was called Ebenezer (Eben, a stone, and ezer, meaning help), no doubt from the fact that there was much similarity in their own history to the circumstance mentioned in I Samuel vii: 12, where it is stated that Samuel set up a monumental stone as a memorial of Divine assistance in a battle against the Philistines; their battle had been a combat for Truth and for freedom of conscience, which had been denied them in their native land, and which they now hoped to enjoy unmolested in the land of freedom.

Within three years eight hundred persons had come over, and three villages had been erected while the amount of land had increased to between 8,000 and 9,000 acres.

Still the location was not desirable. Buffalo was a growing city, it offered attractions to the young, strangers came in masses to visit them and now and then would persuade the younger ones to leave. These sagacious, far-sighted men as they were, knew well that for a communistic society to succeed it must hide itself from the world—anything to attract the eye will divert the mind also. The trustees, full of executive abilities, saw also that land near Buffalo was too expensive, while in the West more could be obtained for less money, and the rise in value would proportionally also be more.

In 1855, notwithstanding their prosperity, a number of men were sent out in search of another locality.

The community had expressed no views as to where these men should go. Arriving at Chicago they thought of going to Wisconsin, but as a new railroad had just been completed to Davenport, Iowa, and the tide of emigration flowed in that direction, they followed the mighty army of land-seekers. From there, they went to Iowa City, the capital of the State. The land was rolling and excellent for agricultural purposes and they decided to buy 18,000 acres, twenty miles west of Iowa City.

The natural advantages of the place were many. The alluvial soil (bottom land) along the rivers is the richest in the State; the Iowa River furnished plenty of water, and was large enough to drive any kind of machinery they wished to erect. Timber such as oak, hickory, walnut and maple, would furnish fuel and building material, while the clay was excellent for brick, and plenty of limestone was found along the bluffs.

By fall in the same year a large number arrived to take up pioneer life in Iowa. A suitable name for the new village was wanted, and a ten years before, they had gone to the Bible for a name, so once more they consulted the sacred Book for another name which would be appropriate. The hill called Amana described by Solomon, in his Song (chap. iv: 8), resembles, perhaps, in beauty of surroundings, the place the members gave the same name; but there is a meaning in the word "Amana" which undoubtedly led them to select it. It means, "remain true,"—a motto from which they have never wavered. It took ten years before a could come and their property could be di-of in New York, and twelve hundred in crossed the States which lie between New York and Iowa.

The Society in 1859, was incorporated under an act entitled "An act for the incorporation of benevolent, charitable, religious and scientific societies," passed the preceding year.

Art. I. of the Constitution by which the Society is governed, contains the following: "The foundation of our civil organization is, and shall remain forever, God, the Lord, and the faith, which He worked in us according to his free grace and mercy, and which is founded upon the Word of God as revealed in the Old and New Testament; (2), the testimony of Jesus through the spirit of prophecy; (3), the hidden gift of grace and chastisement."

The control and management is vested in seven trustees, elected annually. From these are selected among themselves, a president, vice president and secretary. Eighty elders are elected annually to look after the spiritual welfare of the community. The right to vote is given to all males over twenty-one, and to Jews and females over thirty, who are not represented by any male. In the church affairs men are allowed to speak both in their meetings for worship and in their business meetings; but they are debarred from holding any office, religious or otherwise. However, as to their government of women, we must bear in mind that over sixty years Barbara Heineman, as their prophetess, ruled the Society, and it was by her power, her visions, her guidance, that the most important changes were made. What she proclaimed while inspired was always followed, as we believed it was revelation direct from the Divine.

Rotation in office is not preferred, although annual elections are held. The elders are chosen from the older members who lead pure lives, while the trustees are selected from the middle-aged men. Thus the most able and the most experienced are entrusted with the management of the temporal and moral welfare of all. This rejection of communism and this mode of government may be considered as extremely important elements in the permanency and prosperity of the community.

The use of the German language is another which binds the members closely together; and the same might be said of the Lcarians, who have not yet given up their French tongue. The system of village life which the Society has adopted preserves a sort of isolation of different groups, while the villages are not far enough apart to interfere the least with the community. This village system preserves a simplicity of life, and prevents evils which would result if all were congregated into one place. The children are brought up with special religious training, but each family has all freedom and sole in regard to their home affairs. The Society has never tried to put any restrictions on home life and its management.

In each village there are several boarding-houses, where all but the sick and old must go for their meals, each house accommodating from thirty to thirty. Each village has a laundry, a bakery and butcher shop, a store and creamery, and wagons from each of these places make daily rounds as in the cities.

During meal-time no talking of any kind is allowed. Grace is said before and after the meal, all standing, and as the leader ends all kneel, God bless and keep us safely." Women sit at one table, men at another, and if there are several children, they have also a table to themselves. The reason for this is that where so many should eat at the same table it would give rise to idle talk, gossip and trifling conduct—which things are prohibited as much as possible.

In a community as everywhere else brains are in demand. Soon the little fellows distinguish themselves in school, rising step by step, and become book-keepers, trustees, with more responsibility, still with more freedom. Their doctors and dentists are selected from the brightest youngsters in school; still here, as every other place, wealth, influence, social standing has something to do as to choice. I noticed that sons of the rich, influential men were always given the easy, clean positions, while a much better young fellow, mentally, was given the much more unpleasant duty of driving oxen, hoeing in the cabbage-field or working in the dye-works.

"How can there be such a difference in social standing in a community?" some one may ask. Some of the founders still living put in a great deal of money—I have heard from $50,000 to $75,000. These men wield much power. They say, "Here, if you don't vote our way, we will leave and take our money." The Society can't afford to lose these men, hence their say in the matter is to a certain extent law.

Every one, man, woman and child, draws a salary; children draw from $10 to $15, women from $25 to $35, while the men average from $50 to $100. This money is for luxuries and clothing. Besides, if any one does extra work, he receives extra pay. It is meritorious to save this money and refund it to the Society, and many have laid up large sums of money from such meagre salaries. During the civil war several thousand dollars were donated to charities for the care of the sick, and this money was such as had been saved by their small earnings.

Marriage on the whole is unfavorable to community life, and the Society looks on celibacy as meritorious. By examining the records I found that a large proportion of the aged of both sexes had battled through life in single blessedness. This attitude is taken by nearly all the communities in the United States. Asking an elder the reason for this, he answered that "marriage tended to worldliness, and less to spirituality. If a person marries we put him in a lower class, until he afterwards has proved himself pious we take him into his former class again." However, a man at twenty-five, a woman at twenty-two, can send in their request to the elders, and if the elders and the inspired instrument think it is God's will that such persons shall be united, the consent is given, and the couple must wait another year until the ceremony can take place.

Once a year an examination is held of all the members, to ascertain if all live according to the Scriptures and their creed. Each person, like in a monastery, must make a full confession as to his sins, faults and shortcomings, whether any one is ready to testify against him or not. When their prophets lived, these were supposed to know whether the person told the truth or not. If any one was caught, he was admonished.

Often people come and want to join the society. They have been so often disappointed in their neophytes that they are very careful. Their Society is a religious order, more than an industrial association, so similar belief is necessary; also a knowledge of German, as that is the only language used—very few being able to converse in English. A novice must work two years without pay, and at the end of that time, if he has carried himself well, and believes in their religion, he is admitted, giving all his property over to the trustees. Very few converts have been made, the growth of the Society having been mainly from within.

BARTHRINUS L. WICK.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

Letter of John Thorpe.

"Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm."—1 CHRON., xvi: 22.

"I have been led to consider the weaknesses and infirmities which are too frequently observed to attend, whilst clothed with flesh, the most devoted followers of the Holy Jesus; when the holy watch is not maintained, when the holy influence is withdrawn, they then become weak, and are like other men. Thus they who are dedicated to the service of the ministry, bear as in their foreheads the inscription of holiness, having to conflict with all the struggles of the private soldier, may sometimes manifest weaknesses inconsistent with the dignity of the holy office; and he who yet remains to be the accuser of the brethren, will not fail, where he can, under any disguise, gain admittance, exceedingly to expose and magnify these; and would lead by little and little to despise the Lord's anointed, to 'speak evil of dignities,' and lightly to esteem the sacrifices which the Lord hath commanded to be offered in the holy place.

It is not in my heart to justify, to excuse, or to extenuate, the failings and imperfections of the foremost rank in the Lord's army. I know it deeply behooves them, above all others, to walk circumspectly, to make straight steps to their feet, to be examples to the flock; and I am verily persuaded there are none feel more deeply bowed under the humiliating sensibility of their own unworthiness, none more frequently covered with blushing and confusion of face than these. I do not want to excuse or explain away their failings; but I want to impress a proper regard to the dignity of the holy office; I want to revive that ancient precept, 'Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.' God forbid, said David, that I should put forth my hand against the Lord's anointed. If weakness appear, if the enemy prevail in any little matter, oh! 'tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon, lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph.' Oh! did but the people know, were it but possible for the uncircumcised to consider, the secret travail of their spirits; the painfully distressing conflicts which these have to pass through, and which yet await them; how often they have wandered in the wilderness, 'with their hands upon their loins,' what they have to pass through in the weeks of preparation, while eating the roll of prophecy, and lying on their sides; how often such are now covered with sackcloth, and have secretly to muse on the contents of the roll, wherein is written 'lamentations, and mourning, and woe;' were it possible, I say, for such, who are yet whole, not having yet fallen upon that stone which the Lord hath laid in Zion for a foundation, and been thereby broken, and enabled to offer the sacrifices of a broken heart; were it possible for those who have not trodden the arduous path of regeneration, to consider these things, they would not need to be reminded to mark such whom the Lord hath set over them, to esteem them very highly, to honor them with double honor for the work's sake, because 'they watch for your souls, as they that must give account' in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Two Christian Singers.

Literature is a mixed influence on the spiritual life of the modern world. The great gifts of genius have not always been dedicated to the service of the Giver. Indeed, since Goethe's time a sort of paganism has been a literary fashion; and it has not always been up to the level of Goethe's, which, he said, was "not non-Christian, and, above all, not anti-Christian."

It is a matter for satisfaction, however, that, while instances of such paganism are found among our second rate men, the greatest names in our English and American literatures have been those of men who recognized in their writings as in their lives the truth of the Gospel. Bryant and Longfellow, Lowell and Whittier, unite with Browning and Tennyson in the grand transoceanic antiphon of praise to their God.

The two poets who have been taken from us so recently stood very far apart in their types of Christian faith, but in the great essential truths they were as one. John Greenleaf Whittier was the finest outcome of the Quaker spirit in literature. He was a thorough Friend in his acceptance of both the great central principles of their creed and the traditions which have grown up around it. He believed in "the inward, universal, and saving Light," as the first and chief means by which the soul of man comes to the knowledge of God. He "Minded the Light," and walked with the calm assurance of a man who was convinced that God was leading him. Hence the Quakerly quietness and patient persistence of his spirit even in unquiet and discouraging circumstances. He looked on calmly while the mob wrecked his office and destroyed his scanty furniture, and then went back to his task as though nothing had happened. The handful of London Friends in Charles II's time, assembling twice a week in the roofless ruin of their meeting-house, as indifferent to the rage of the mob as to the pelting of the rain, was a similar illustration of the Quaker temper.

He was equally like the primitive Friends in his capacity for outspoken indignation against all things base, cruel, and of evil report. Lowell laughingly suggests that George Fox would hardly recognize Whittier as a spiritual son of his. But in truth Fox would have had less difficulty with Whittier than with the silken-voiced people, out of whom centuries of the Rules and Discipline seem to have eliminated the power of sharp and indignant speech.

Whittier's theology and his ideas of church method both lay within the lines of Quaker tradition. "I am not a Universalist or a Unitarian, but a Friend," he said to an English visitor. He deplored the changes which have been introduced in some Western Yearly Meetings, by which singing has been introduced as a part of worship, and pastors have been chosen to take charge of the Monthly Meetings. In his view, this was a departure from much that is precious in Quakerism. What most people would regard as mere negatives, had for him a positive value. He prized the deliberate formlessness of Quakerism, holding that "God is most where man is least,"—a very doubtful proposition.

But he did not, like some others of the same mystical tendency, resolve the Gospel story into a group of symbols, whose historicity is a matter of indifference. To him "the inward light" was identical with the historical Christ. His finest poem, in some respects, is "Our Master," in which he sings:

"We may not climb the heavenly steeps,
To bring the Lord Christ down:
In vain we search the lowest deeps,
For him no depths can drown.

But warm and tender even yet
A present help is He;
And faith has still its Olivet,
And love its Galilee.

The healing of his seamless dress
Is by our beds of pain;
We touch him in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again.

Deep strike thy roots, O heavenly Vine,
Within our earthly sod,
Most human and yet most Divine,
The flower of man and God!"

Alfred Tennyson was born and brought up under the shadow of an Anglican church-spire, in an English rectory, and among the venerable and seemly traditions of a church which lays more stress on form than does any other of Protestantism. His mental tone was taken before the great upheaval of the Oxford movement, and the dawn of the age of earnestness. So to him the man who relied on any private Divine guidance seemed on the way to fanaticism.

The religious enthusiast was the type most alien from his sympathies. His picture of Simeon Stylites reveals his antipathy to all such characters. In his view, the ideal life is the daily and faithful discharge of simple duties, which come to us without our seeking. He has no faith in vocations that may take men away from that homely routine, to set them to greater tasks. At least he believes that the average man will find his true vocation in the lines of social movement in which he is born.

Hence his respect for much in English society which has no worth for Americans. The royalty at the top of the social system, giving it unity and coherence; the deference of the "lowly" for their betters,—all are part of his social ideal. He is the poet of order and the proprieties, just as truly as Browning is the poet of the great purifying passions. His heroine, who wilts and dies under

"The burden of an honor Unto which she was not born,"

his princess who must suffer for offending against the social conventions, and a score of others in his poems, are unwilling witnesses to the masterful authority of established order.

His poetry reached its highest point in "In Memoriam" and the "Idyls of the King." The former is the immortal record of a great and passionate friendship, interrupted to appearance by the death of his friend, but triumphing over death and separation through the victory of faith. There is not in literature a more veracious record of a genuine passion. But how wonderfully it all falls within the lines of everyday English life! The seething fluid of intense emotion is gathered and preserved in the vessels of ordinary use. The stages of the passage from despairing grief to Christian hope are marked by the recurrence of quiet English Christmases, and their hearthside observances. And even here his disposition to find English conventions correspondent to order of the ideal society crops out, as in the comparison:

"My spirit loved and loves Him yet,
Like some poor girl whose heart is set
On one whose rank exceeds her own.

He mixing with his proper sphere,
She finds the baseness of her lot."

So in the "Idyls" we have a romantic tale of a far-off fairyland brought within the bounds of modern English ideas. At the centre stand Arthur, the champion and representative order amid the conflicting characters and types of his knights. And the final ruin comes not less through the lower forms of disorder represented by Lancelot's relations with the queen, than through the fantastic enthusiasm which carries the knights away from Arthur's side in search for the Holy Grail. So the poem complains:

"How often, O my knights,
This chance of noble deeds will come and go
Unchallenged, while you follow wandering fi
Lost in the quagmire!"

But when he strikes the highest note, we are made to feel his unity with his brother poet. Whittier could not have written, but how fittingly he would have adopted, the grand introduction which forms the prelude to "In Memoriam":

"Strong Son of God, immortal Love,
Whom we, that have not seen thy face,
By faith, and faith alone, embrace,
Believing where we cannot prove."

Thou seemest human and Divine,
The highest, holiest manhood thou;
Our wills are ours, we know not how;
Our wills are ours, to make them thine.

So the two poets stand as illustrating conditions of life which seem the most opposite. What each valued as best in social method, the other regarded as at best a lower and second good. But "wisdom is justified of all her children." Each had a partial truth given in his keeping, and bore his testimony to it all his night. And each thus served his generation, and entered upon that higher and broader life where "all contradictions are reconciled in Jesus Christ."—S. S. Times.

EXTRACT FROM DR. CHALMER'S WRITING.—"We know not a more deeply interesting walk of observation than that which is pursued by modern missionaries, when they come in contact and communication with the people of a still unbroken country, when they take their lodgment on one of the remote and yet travelled wilds of paganism, when after the interval of four thousand years from the dissolution of the great family of mankind, they are to one of its widely diverging branches and ascertain what of conscience or what of religious light has among them survived the lapse of many generations; when they thus, as it were, knock at the door of nature left for ages to be tried and try if there yet be slumbering any sense of intelligence which can at all respond to the message they have brought along with them. We do we know an evolution of the human mind which carries in it more of a big and affecting interest than that to which philosophy has cast an inquiring regard, even that among the dark and long unentered recesses, there subsists an undying voice, which owns the effort and echoes back the truth of Christianity. Inasmuch, that let missionaries go the very extremity of our species, and speak of sin, judgment, and condemnation, they do not speak in vocabularies unknown; and sweet to many is the preacher's voice, when he tells that a Saviour is born; and out of the life of even this deep and settled degeneracy come forth the materials of a satisfying demonstration; and thus in the very darkest places have converts multiplied, and Christianities arisen, and the gospel been the savor of life unto life to some who have embraced it and been the savor of death unto death to others."

who have declined it, all proving that a principle still existed in their bosoms, which, if followed, would guide them to salvation, which, if they fled from, would try them and find them guilty. Nor let us wonder thereon that the apostle, even when speaking of those who are given over to every abomination, would still affirm of them that they know the commands of God. Even a remainder of that knowledge which they liked not to retain, still held its hold upon their conscience, and gave them a responsibility which belongs not to the beasts that perish. Man, in short, throughout the whole of this world's peopled territory, has been by which he may righteously be judged; and still enough of it is known and felt by his conscience to make it out, that for its violation he should be righteously condemned. So dark as our conceptions may be of the present character and future state of those who are under the shadow of heathenism, we may be sure that a clear and righteous principle of distribution will be applied to them all; and that those who shall be judged worthy of death on that day will be found to have committed such sins as they themselves either knew or might be known to be worthy of it."

Natural History, Science, etc.

Swarming of White Ants.—The white ants in Florida send out colonies during the rainy season. They have long loose wings to get away. Other creatures seem to know when they come, and gather round the entrance to devour them. Snakes, frogs, fowls snap them up, crowding out, they tumble over dazed in the bright light. Those that rise on the wing are devoured by birds. A short flight and they are down and sprawling on the ground, and their legs become quite unmanageable. But, planting their hind feet firmly on the dragging wings, pressing them to the ground, the ant gives himself a surge forward, and is free. No more far aloft, he goes below as soon as possible. The women and children run with little brooms and sweep up baskets full of the savory morsels, they come out of the hole. After awhile the expedient is over, all is quiet, and the earth for a mile round is speckled with the discarded ants.—Hore's Tanganyika.

Yorrah Timber.—This is obtained from a species of Eucalyptus which grows abundantly in Western Australia. When selected from hilly localities, cut while the sap is least active, and fully dried, the wood proves impervious to the borings of the Teredo and the White Ants. The vessels constructed of this wood, although unperforated, have remained sound after 25 years of service. It is one of the least inflammable building purposes, and one of the best for fuel. It is very heavy and so intensely so that it is difficult to work it with ordinary carpenter's tools.

Birds in Wet Weather.—C. C. Abbott, says that "the feathers of birds often become so matted as to render flight impracticable, and so many birds fall victims to carnivorous mammals. Attention was called to this fact during the autumn, when, after a sudden dash of rain, I found a number of warblers that were too fat to fly. Their fluttering did not prevent me from catching one, and directly after I saw a bird in the clutches of a red squirrel."

Mineral Beauties.—C. C. Abbott in speaking of a visit to a copper mine in Arizona, says:—"I would know how magnificent a mineral mine, how it surpasses even the orchids among flowers, the butterflies among insects, or birds of paradise among birds, let him gather from the mouth of the great copper mine, fragments of the ore as they are ruthlessly dumped upon the ground. When malachite, azurite and cuprite are seen as I saw them at Bisbee, then one can form some idea of Nature's perfected handiwork."

A Strange Phenomenon.—A short time since, the water in the harbor of Sidney, Australia, was so changed in color as to present in places the color of blood. In a few days a large part, some say one-half, of the animal life existing in the shoal water near shore was extinguished, the oyster beds being seriously injured, and all bivalves suffering to a very great extent. An examination of the discolored water showed that the phenomenon was owing to the growth of a microscopical animalcule of the genus Glenodinium, which sometimes develops with marvellous rapidity.

Such sudden developments of a minute vegetable produce the red snow of the Arctic regions, but do not in any degree do away with the miraculous character of the Egyptian plague. That the Almighty makes use of natural causes to produce results is not disputed, yet none but God can do so, and the change of the waters of the Nile, which afterwards underwent putrefaction, can only be attributed to his direct and miraculous interference, who doeth according to his will in the armies of heaven, among the children of men, or the most insignificant of his creatures.—Episcopal Recorder.

"THE KING'S SCRIBE."—The king's scribe was an important officer of state in all Oriental monarchies. He was, in fact, a great secretary of state, whose duties were to keep an exact account of all tribute received, and of the spoil of captured cities. In the Assyrian sculptures the king's scribes are frequently represented with a long scroll of parchment in their left hand, and a pen in their right, making an inventory of the booty brought in by the soldiers. All the spoil was first brought by the captors to one place, where it is represented as being carefully sorted and counted in the presence of the royal scribes, who take an exact inventory of the whole before it is carried away by its captors. Scales are being used to weigh the bullion and articles made of the precious metals, lest they should be clipped afterwards. A certain proportion of the gold and silver, in whatever form it was, was due to the temple of the national deity, and another portion was set apart for the king's private treasury.—S. S. Times.

Alcohol and Vitality.—A writer in The Independent says the use of alcoholic drinks in the United States is degrading the standard of size, of weight, of vigor for activity and endurance on the part of the whole people. From a physical, social and sanitary point of view, such as radically affects the prowess and perpetuity of the United States, we regard the present freedom of use of alcoholic beverages as a greater menace to race vitality and so to national life, than slavery ever was.

Mixed Marriages.—An engagement is reported between Crown Prince Ferdinand of Hohenzollern of Roumania, who is a Catholic, and the Protestant princess Marie of Edinburgh. The Independent says, "These mixed marriages are not wise and give occasion to serious evil." There is apt to be trouble about the education of the children who are born to parents thus unequally yoked together—each naturally desiring that they should be brought up in their own faith.

Education in Canada.—The educational question is up among the Catholics of Canada. In the province of Quebec, at a late meeting of the Roman Catholic Board of the Council of Public Instruction, which includes all the bishops and some prominent laymen, the question came up whether teachers who are ecclesiastics should submit to examination, and the bishops all said no, while the laymen, after a short controversy, all said they must. R. Musson, ex-Governor of the Province, when the bishops said they alone had jurisdiction, replied:

"On the contrary, we are more concerned than you, for we have children and you have not. When we complain of the ridiculous system of education in your classical colleges, you reply that those colleges are founded to train priests and not practical men; and yet, when we withdraw our children and send them to Protestant institutions, you threaten us with excommunication. Do not suppose you can much longer brave the Catholic population."

Women Preachers.—The Congregationalists have five women who have been ordained to preach the Gospel—two of them in the State of New York, and the others in the West. Of their adaptation to the pastorate little is said, and of their success, nothing.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 19, 1892.

At the Conference of the Progressive Yearly Meeting on this continent, which convened at Indianapolis on 18th of Ninth Month, a discussion of the Pastoral system occupied the time of several sittings, and issued in the adoption of the following minute, which it is stated was objected to by the delegation from Baltimore and by part of that from North Carolina:

"The Conference desires to urge upon Friends everywhere the importance of the diligent exercise of the various spiritual gifts bestowed by the Master, especially those of the ministry of the word, and of the pastoral care of the flock of God. In connection with these services the Church is reminded of its duty in making such provision as may be necessary for the support of those who give their time to the work, so that the Gospel may not be hindered, nor the shepherding of the flock impaired by the want of pecuniary means. At the same time that we strongly commend a proper pastoral system, we desire that Friends will be careful to see that it is not abused by the assumption of undue authority on the part of pastors, by their standing in the way of any service the Lord may lay upon others, or by leading the members of the flock to look and depend upon human agency instead of the Divine shepherd and bishop of souls himself. We believe that the faithful exercise of pastoral care is an important agency in the Master's hand in establishing and building up the membership of the Church."

Perhaps the language in which this minute is framed, is as skilfully adapted as the circumstances would admit, not to shock the feelings of those who adhere to the principles our Society holds as to the exercise of Gospel ministry, and the care of the flock, while at the same time it advocates the introduction of a system of paid preachers, substantially the same as that in vogue among most of the Protestant denominations.

Some of the evil fruits of this departure from Quakerism are pointed out in the editorial column of THE FRIEND of Tenth Month 29th, and it is perhaps not needful to repeat them here; but they give point to the remarks of a correspondent, who recently wrote to the editor, expressing his belief that those who avow a hiring ministry as a feature of their meetings, and have set aside the practice of silent worship ought no longer to be spoken of as "Friends." The probability is, that where such a radical change is made as the substitution of ministers selected and paid by the congregations, for the free will offerings called for from his prepared servants by the Head of the Church, that such hiring ministry will be only one step in the downward course, which will lead to the renunciation of most of the distinguishing features of our profession. The "abuses" which the minute cautions against are so closely connected with the system itself, as to be almost the necessary outgrowth of it; and it would be about as reasonable as to tell one to handle pitch and yet not defile his fingers therewith.

But while we feel strongly the degradation which follows these departures from Quakerism, we do not doubt that there are places and services assigned in the universal church for others besides ourselves; but, as stated by a valued friend more than fifteen years ago, "If our Society should drift into the adoption of such views of religious truth, and such ideas, and the practices which are the natural fruit of them, it would entirely fail to accomplish the design for which it was raised up in the beginning, by a mighty hand, and by an outstretched arm."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—At the late Presidential election, the following vote is believed to have been cast for Presidential electors, subject to possible revision. For Cleveland: Alabama, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, (5 electors), Mississippi, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohio (12 electors), South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia and Wisconsin. Total, 288. For Harrison: Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan (9 electors), Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio (11 electors), Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Vermont and Washington. Total, 133. For Weaver: Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Nevada and Wyoming. Total, 23.

The next Senate it is thought will stand as follows: Democrats, 44; Republicans, 40; Populists, 4.

It is stated that President Harrison has decided to pursue a strictly conservative course in all matters relating to appointments. He does not desire to lay the Administration open to the charge of arbitrarily depriving the incoming Administration of patronage in a spirit of vindictiveness or retaliation. Consequently he will extend the classified service only to the degree which he had determined upon in case he was elected. The decision, it is said, will not affect more than half a dozen positions in each department.

A Washington despatch says that, "in view of the still lingering possibility of a fresh outbreak of cholera in European countries in the early spring and the consequent danger of its introduction into the United States, the officials of the Treasury Department have determined to maintain the utmost vigilance in guarding our ports against the entrance of people or merchandise that might possibly convey the germs of the dreaded epidemic. To this end immigration will be generally discouraged, and the provisions of the President's proclamation of September 1st, imposing a quarantine of 20 days on all suspected immigrants, will be vigorously enforced." According to the official construction, "all aliens who come to this country for permanent residence are immigrants, whether they travel in cabin or steerage."

The Washington Post of the 13th inst., publishes an article to the effect that Ivan Petroff, a special agent of the State Department, and formerly in the Census Office, has been detected in the act of furnishing false information to this Government in relation to the sealing industry of Alaska, and which has been embodied in the preparation of the Bering Sea case for arbitration.

Knud Sands, representative of an English syndicate, said in Ottawa, on the 12th inst., that he had purchased 90,000 acres of mineral lands in West Virginia, where the syndicate intend to establish steel and iron works, such as those owned by Andrew Carnegie. K. Sands has secured the services of skilled workers in iron and steel from Homestead, Pa., who were lately employed in the Carnegie works.

The Farmers' Alliance of Indiana has adopted a series of resolutions embodying the demands it will make upon the next Legislature of that State. It asks, among other things, revision of the tax laws and the fixing of salaries of public officials "on a level with compensation that similar service will command in the open market," and the suppression of the liquor traffic.

Some of Kansas' empty jails are at present being used to store the surplus wheat. The Kansas City Journal says that this would indicate a healthy state of morals and finances.

Three hundred and twenty-eight thousand divorces have been granted by the courts of this country during the past twenty years, 90 per cent. of them to women.

There are said to be now visible in the heavens no less than six comets. One of these, first discovered in Europe by Holmes, has been seen at the Warner and Dudley observatories, New York. It is now approaching the earth, and is expected will be visible on Eleventh Month 28th, "many times larger than the full moon."

The acreage in vegetables in Southern Florida this year will probably be very large.

North Dakota is reported to have a newspaper published in the Sioux language.

A rich strike of coal is reported from Klamath County, Oregon.

Southern California's orange and olive crop this year is most promising, while that of the lemons will be short.

A large number of Chinamen have been smuggled, it is said, into this country from Mexico, and the United States customs officers have been unable to prevent it, owing to the lack of guards along the Rio Grande.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 404; being 24 more than the previous week, and 13 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing 211 were males and 193 females; 52 died of consumption; 49 of diphtheria; 41 of pneumonia; 37 of diseases of the heart; 15 of Bright's disease; 14 of marasmus; 11 of bronchitis; 10 of casualties and 10 of apoplexy.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4's, 100 a 102; 4½'s, 114½ a 115; currency, 6's, 107½ a 117.

COTTON.—The market was strong and advanced ¼c. per pound, bringing quotations for middling uplands up to 9½c. per pound.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk spot, $15 a 16; spring bran, in bulk, spot, $14 a 15.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.15; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.75; Western winter, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.00; winter patent, $4.00 a $4.35; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.15; do., patent $4.25 a $4.50; do., favorite brands, higher.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 73 a 73½ cts.
No. 2 mixed corn, 49½ a 49½ cts.
No. 2 white oats, 40½ a 41½ cts.

FOREIGN.—On the 13th inst., a meeting was held in Trafalgar Square, London, to celebrate the fifth anniversary of the scene of a great popular demonstration in celebration of the restoration by the Liberal Government of the right to hold public meetings in the square, and to give voice to the demands of the unemployed poor upon the Government and local bodies to start all needed public improvements, so as to assist in relieving existing destitution. Speeches were made from six different platforms, one of the speakers being John Burns, M. P. An enormous but orderly crowd was present, and hundreds of red flags were displayed.

The second week of the cotton lock-out opens with increased prospects of the trouble being long continued. There are 6,000,000 spindles still at work on full time, 750,000 on short time, and 12,000,000 are stopped. The Masters' Federation has asked the owners of the spindles working on full time to begin to shorten their working hours on the 17th inst. All the owners have assented except the masters at Bolton, who spin Egyptian cotton chiefly. They plead that their hands are full of orders and that their mills must work full time to fill them. The leaders of the spinners state that if the employers generally adopt short time, without a corresponding reduction of wages, the deadlock will end. Whether or not the manufacturers would follow such a course, which would practically be conceding the demands first made by the operatives, is an open question. If they run their mills on short time and reduce wages as well, the fight will be long continued.

The Standard's Paris correspondent states that fresh cases of cholera are reported from Etaples, Courty, Calais, Arras, Boulogne, Avion, and elsewhere in north of France.

The Buda-Pesth correspondent of the same paper reports that the disease is spreading in western southern Hungary.

Twenty-seven died on the 11th inst., at Arad, 30 more on the 12th. There are several new cases in Holland. Many fatal cases have occurred there.

At concurrent meetings of the Centrists in Bavaria and Wurtemberg, a well-nigh unanimous sentiment against the German Army bill was expressed. This attitude of the Centrists has shattered the confidence of the Ministerialists in the Reichstag in the acceptance of the measure. The Centrist newspapers again changed their tone. They have reverted to former denunciations of the bill, and not a single one of the Centre party now advocates anything but unpromising hostility to it.

Opposition to the measure is also growing among the people, who are growing more and more alive to the fact that the bill will entail upon them financial burdens by raising the prices of tobacco, beer, spirits. The disclosure of the fact that Prussia is financially embarrassed, taken with the proposal of Miquel, Prussian Minister of Finance, to levy a tax on capital, has contributed to a revulsion against the Government's financial policy generally.

At a meeting of Liberal members of the Hungarian Diet, held on the 9th inst., Count Szapary, the Hungarian Minister, announced that Emperor Francis Joseph had accepted the resignations of the members of the Hungarian Cabinet.

It is announced from St. Petersburg that the expense of organizing the Russian section of the Chicago Columbian Exhibition will amount to 800,000 roubles.

The prohibition against the emigration of Helms from Russia, that was enforced during the cholera epidemic, has now been withdrawn. A number of parties of emigrants have started for Hamburg from various parts of the country, and other parties are making preparations to start.

Iceland has established a high school for girls.

A cable despatch received in Boston, from the International Union of Astronomers, announced the discovery of a bright comet by Holmes, the position of which on Eleventh Month 6th, at midnight, was right ascension zero hours, 46 minutes, 46 seconds; declination, 38 degrees, 30 minutes.

A despatch from Panama, by way of Galveston, says that Costa Rica has just been devastated by floods. Plantations were ruined, bridges swept away, buildings destroyed and a large section of railway ruined. A number of persons were reported to have been drowned. The damage amounts to hundreds of thousands of dollars.

24th. In a little retirement this morning it seemed to shine on a public meeting here. Menonists agreeing to give the use of their use at 4 o'clock in the afternoon; a few of us, with some Moravians, and Inspirants, ended. Joseph Mortimer, from Yorkshire, duly acted as interpreter for us. Feeling a deep desire in my heart to call on a man whose maintenance had struck me in the meeting, I went: on entering the house, a salutation of love arose, and a memorable season ensued, which to me seemed like a brook by the way, a solatary after a season of great trial and fight—and we left Nieuwied with renewed feelings of that love which had nearly united so many there.

We got to Wisbaden the evening of the 14th, and met with an Englishman who accompanied us to several bathing houses, this place being famous for an extraordinary boiling spring of sulphureous nature, which is communicated by pipes to the different houses. From thence we proceeded to Frankfort, a fine populous town, remarkable for the liberties it possesses, being governed by its own magistrates, who are Lutherans; it is supposed to contain twenty thousand inhabitants, and among these three thousand Jews. No man pays more than five pounds for taxes, which commences on his declaration himself worth fifteen hundred pounds. This being so privileged is a thriving one, and is obliged to take part in war, unless the city be invaded.

Here we met one called a Pietist, with whom I had some religious conversation to our mutual comfort.

From Frankfort we pursued our journey through Fridburg, and some parts of Suabia, having little delay, we arrived at Basle the first of the Fifth Month.

4th. Had a little season of quiet retirement here, and in the evening we went to see a person named Brennan, with whom Claude Gay resided for three weeks—he and another old man lived retired—they are of the sect of Unitarians; several met us to tea, and religious conference ensuing, liberty was felt in recommending silent waiting for ability to worship. On sitting renewed that fellowship which is the bond of the saint's peace, and the harmony in service increased that cement, which is as precious ointment sending forth a sweet savor. We went to supper with Jean Christe, a Moravian to whom we were recommended from Nieuwied; several of that sect were with us, and we had a satisfactory time of innocent cheerfulness and freedom.

5th. Sat as usual together in our chamber; my mind was under some exercise about a public meeting, but I felt fearful of mentioning it; our friend Christe came to tea with us: the symptoms of being measurably redeemed are obvious in this man; we all felt much love in our hearts towards him, and his seemed opened to us. J. Sulger, a Moravian, who understands English, kindly interprets for us; in him also the seed of life appears to shoot forth in grain which we hope is ripening. Oh! if these visited ones were but inward enough, how would their growth be forwarded!

6th. Went to tea with a large company of Moravians; some of their inquiries respecting women's preaching and the nature of our visit, were answered to apparent satisfaction, but our minds being drawn into silence we found it a close conflict to yield—the company were ready to hear, or talk, but the opposition in them to silence, and our nature pleading to be excused, brought on deep exercise. Our friend Sulger asked if he should desire them to be still; this was a relief to S. G. and myself, and she was, after some time of stillness, engaged to explain the nature of true worship, and the necessity of waiting for preparation to perform it. They again began talking, to show their approbation of what had been said; but silence being again requested, G. D. followed with good authority, and I thought some of them then felt what true silence was, particularly our interpreter, to whom, as well as through him, I believe, the testimony flowed. I sat some time in close travail, desiring that the people might feel as well as hear, but found it a great trial to speak what seemed given me for them; at length love prevailed, and this memorable season, which closed in solemn prayer, was to me, one of the most relieving since I came on the continent.

We went to sup with the two dear old men, J. Christe accompanying us; it was a pleasant visit—peace evidently surrounding the dwelling: on parting I just remembered how Jacob was favored near the close of his life, and what worship he performed leaning on his staff; after reviving which, we left them in love.

7th. Our men Friends called on a few persons at a little distance from town, and in the evening we all went to J. C.'s, where after some time, silence was procured, several young people being present, to whom our minds were drawn in feeling of Gospel solicitude, which we were enabled to evince; and although this season was a strange thing to, I believe, all, except ourselves, what was said seemed well taken, and we felt peace in having yielded to this manifestation of duty.

8th. On a little comparing our feelings this morning, we thought it best to appoint a meeting: many difficulties occurred, but at length our friends, J. and H. Brennan agreed to give us a room in their house. It proved a deeply exercising season, though strength was mercifully afforded to express the feelings that were raised: but the opposition to this way of worship was, I believe, clearly felt to obstruct the stream from running as it otherwise might. Those called Inspirants have a great dislike to women's preaching, and our transgression in this respect, probably did not suit them; we however felt easy, and this little act of dedication tended to an increase of peace, and cleared the way for moving on.

9th. Parted with our dear friends at Basle under a sense of uniting love, and travelled through a beautiful country, richly diversified by nature and improved by art, to Geneva, where I was confined one day by illness at a poor inn. Though I was still greatly indisposed, we sat forward on the 16th, and travelled through almost incessant rain to Chalons, a little French village, where we were indifferently entertained and lodged at a very dirty inn. Next day we had a romantic ride between very high rocks and mountains—strong torrents of water pouring with wonderful rapidity, some not less than three hundred feet, with perpendicular and sloping falls—these emptying themselves into a lake below, and thence into the Rhone. This scene of grandeur was rendered awful by remarkably loud claps of thunder, and vivid flashes of lightning, which continued some hours, accompanied by heavy hail storms and rain. Through Divine preservation we got to a tolerable inn to sleep, and were favored to reach Lyons the evening of the 18th; and I had fresh cause for thankfulness in finding several letters from my beloved husband, conveying the intelligence of all being well. This, after suffering much from anxiety about home, was humbling to my heart. May I learn increasingly to commit all into the Divine hand!

We proceeded from Lyons in a carriage boat down the Rhone, passing many towns and villages, on the banks of this rapid river; landed at Point Esprit, and reached Nismes in the afternoon of the 22nd; from whence we proceeded next day to Congenies,* about three leagues distant.

On the coach stopping at a little inn where we designed to alight, a large number of people surrounded us, some looking almost overcome with joy, others surprised, some smiling, but all behaving civilly. Our men Friends alighting in order to make arrangements for our reception, left us women in the coach; but such was the covering with which my mind was then favored, that being a spectacle to thousands would have seemed trifling to me; tears flowed, from a renewed sense of unmerited regard, and the extension of the love of the universal parent to his children, spread a serenity not easily set forth.

"We were desired to accompany some who joined us to a neighboring house, and the room we entered was soon filled with persons, who, by every testimony we could comprehend, rejoiced in seeing us; though many expressed their feelings only by tears. They reluctantly consented for the first night, to our occupying three tolerably commodious bed-chambers at the house of a Protestant, (but not one professing as they do), and we designed to engage these rooms, with another for a kitchen, and hire a servant to attend on us: but before we were dressed next morning, several of these affectionate poor women carried off our trunks, &c.; and on consulting together we concluded it was best to yield to the wishes of those we came to visit, resigning the personal convenience we might enjoy, in being permitted to provide for ourselves. We therefore accepted apartments in two of their houses, and while these and their manner of cooking, are very different to what we have ever been accustomed to, the belief that we are here in right direction, smooths what would otherwise be hard to bear. Their love for our company is such that they seldom leave us alone, and seem to think they cannot do enough to make us comfortable.

"A few both of the men and women are sensible, intelligent persons, with whom, could we converse, some of us would be well pleased.

"We are well aware, that speaking only through an interpreter obstructs the stream of freedom, and yet I have thought that even this might have its use, by tending to prevent too much conversation, and thereby drawing their and our minds from that state of watchfulness, wherein receiving suitable supplies, we may be qualified properly to administer in due season to their wants.

"First-day, 25th. Their meeting this morning was attended by between eighty and ninety persons: soon after sitting down several of them appeared strangely agitated, and no less than five spoke one after another, partly in testimony and partly in supplication, all sitting except one man, who stood up and expressed a little in humility and tenderness.

"We found that our safety was in getting to our own exercise, desiring, as ability was afforded, that the right seed might rise into dominion, and the imaginations of the creature be brought into subjection: and though it was evident, that but few of them were acquainted with that silence, wherein the willings and workings of nature are reduced, and the still small voice which succeeds the wind and the fire, intelligibly heard, yet we were comforted in observing much of this emotion subside, and the meeting was favored towards the conclusion, with a solemnity it wanted before; the people settling more into stillness, while testimony and prayer went forth through G. D.

"Thinking that sympathy with them in their different growths, and situations, was likely to be more fully known by a discriminating visit, we proposed after having our certificates read this evening, to sit with them in their families, which proposal they gladly accepted.

Slum Children at Play.

During the Ninth Month we were able, through the liberality of a Friend, to take five parties of children from the Friends' Mission, Pearl Street, out to Tottenham, to enjoy an afternoon's play in the garden, and tea in the large empty building known as "The Laundry." In all we had 125 children, most of them attenders of some class or meeting held in Pearl House. Four parties were brought by train; it was a pretty sight to see the procession of ragged little ones (their faces unusually clean, but often without hats) and three or four of "the mission ladies" as caretakers, start from Pearl House for the walk to Liverpool street or Bishopsgate Station. Quite a stir was created in the street, and many parents came to the doors or windows to see the start, while several children who had been once, and longed to come again, would go as far as the station in the vain hope of being taken a second time. As one of these processions was going along Bishopsgate, some bystanders were heard to observe "They must be the Salvation Army."

The excitement of the children when in the train is intense; they jump, and shout, and sing, and rattle bones together in a most bewildering way, besides keeping their caretakers in a state of continual terror by the way they crowd to and lean out of the windows of the carriages.

On arriving at Forster House a wild rush and clamor ensues for the battledores and shuttlecocks and balls, it being impossible to make them understand that these things must be shared and exchanged; so that our chief work throughout the afternoon is in deciding disputes between different claimants for these toys, and organizing games, for these children do not know how to play except with a bonfire in the middle of their street; but it was most delightful to see their intense enjoyment of the unwonted surroundings, and then of the tea.

"It is good tea, lady!" was a frequent ejaculation, and there were several requests to be allowed to take home some cake to some small brother or sister who was poorly. Other children were determined to make the best of the opportunity, and mysteriously fastened up in some part of their pitifully ragged garments as much cake as they could quietly hide, so that after tea we found several children had quite a store of good things, which became very embarrassing when they wanted to play games.

On the whole, they respected our property very well. "You musn't pick the flowers in the park" said one small child to another, and though we lost a few balls, most were honestly given up when we asked to have all playthings put together preparatory to going home.

Many of these children were Jews, and as some of the parties were on a Friday, the Jews might only come on condition that they should be home again by sunset, the beginning of their Sabbath. We were also strictly enjoined by the parents that the children should have no meat. One little Jewess, as we took them home, slipped her hand in one of ours and said "The day does goes so quick teacher, I wish it would go slower: I never went out for pleasure before—I do like to go out for pleasure—I should like to come with you every day."

The most exciting excursion was that of the infants, more than thirty of whom were brought in a brake the five miles from Pearl Street to Forster House. The scene at starting baffles description, all the inhabitants of Pearl Street seemed to have turned out, and many parents were determined that their children should go, tickets or no tickets. Such clamor and crying, and pushing and thrusting, and wild confusion ensued that we felt that two policemen would have had their work set to keep order. Many ineligible children were hoisted up on the sides of the vehicle, and how they escaped without injury was a marvel. At last, with the kind help of Charles Duck from the Bedford Institute, the brake was filled, and we moved on, followed by a score or more of boys and girls who only waited C. Duck's descent from the steps, to try to enter the brake. At the Bedford Institute a halt was made, and all the children who had no right to be there were turned out (except one who was overlooked) and then proceeded along Shoreditch, followed a dozen or twenty boys. At the end of a mile all except two of these had turned back, we were surprised to see two ragged urchins who had been once before, still holding on. And they held on with such perseverance that they obtained their end, and finally arrived at Forster House, where of course we could not refuse them tea, when they had so well earned it. Neither could we find in our hearts to make them run back, so one answer to our inquiry "Lady, will we have to run all the way back?" was permission to sit on the steps, so that the youngsters consider their escapade a grand success and brag of it to their friends and neighbors. How we longed that such determination and perseverance could be turned into a right channel while the boys are still young!

We were very thankful that every party of the little ones was safely brought back to their homes, not one accident occurring to any, and we know that, especially among the Jews, the pleasure given to the children has been the means of putting us into happy relations with the mothers. The frequent inquiry of the children now is, "Lady, when will we go into the country again?" "May we come again next year?" to which question we always reply "as we hope so."—S. E. Rowntree, in The London Friend.

THE LOUISIANA LOTTERY.—One of the most remarkable things about the contest over the Louisiana Lottery bill in the Louisiana Legislature, was the dramatic effects accompanying it. When the lottery men had at last secured the necessary two-thirds vote, the death of a Senator broke their ranks, and an "anti" man was elected in his place. Again the necessary number was secured, and as the vote was about to be taken, one Senator fell to the floor with convulsions, prostration, and had to be carried home. On another day, just before the assembling for decisive action, another member was prostrated in the same manner. On one day, just as S. E. Tuck, the leader of the lottery ranks was speaking, the thunders drowned his voice, and the lightning flashed along the electric wires in the capitol building, extinguishing the lights, and the word went out, "God is fighting the Lottery Company." And after all was said and done, and but one vote was wanted to override the Governor's veto, and preparations had been made to bring the sick Senator on his couch to the Capitol, a rain storm prevented, and the Legislature had to adjourn, unable to do the company's bidding. And to crown all this final disaster, the sick Senator died, thus defeating the plans of the lottery people. We know of no such remarkable series of interruptions, seemingly providential, recorded in history, outside the Old Testament.—Church Advocate.

THE person who cannot differ in judgment without engendering personal malice, or a spirit which will attempt to injure an opponent, or rejoice in his misfortune, is in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity.

"With a Death Upon It."

In the year 1838 John Williams, known later as the martyr of Erromanga, was the chief laborer among the South Sea Islands, under the auspices of the London Missionary Society. He drew his whole energies into the work to which he considered himself devoted, as Dr. Judson used to say a missionary ought always to be, for he omitted no effort to impress on the Islanders how entirely they filled his thoughts. On his return from a brief visit to England on business connected with the mission, he brought with him a number of plants new to Polynesia, which had been thought likely to grow well in the Islands, and to prove useful to the natives who were often great sufferers from the terrible storms common to their latitudes, which destroy bread fruit and other trees which form the staple food there. Such hurricanes are followed by famines, and these again by pestilence. Williams had suggested the desirability of obtaining, if possible, a number of plants of low growth, less likely than the lofty bread-fruit, &c., to be affected by tornados. Among others, he brought a slip of the Chinese banana, or Musa Cavendishii, named after the Duke of Devonshire, who had contributed liberally to this department of the mission. But on landing at Tahiti this slip appeared quite dead, so that even John Williams, one of the most hopeful and undispiritable of men, decided it to be worthless and threw it away. Another missionary, however, noticing the poor limp thing lying desolately where it had fallen, took it tenderly in his hand and thinking that if no good came of his endeavor at least no harm could ensue, planted it in his garden plot.

The vitality which had seemed extinct proved to exist; the slip which had been supposed dead very soon put forth brisk evidence that it was alive. The Chinese banana, in short, was fairly introduced into Polynesia, and to day every island south of the equator has been enriched with this valuable esculent. One of our later missionaries says of it:

"Its value is to natives beyond all computation. Our teachers have taken it wherever they have gone, and it is now found throughout the Pacific, from Tahiti to the Islands of Torres Straits and New Guinea."

In his account of a marvellous produce of a little slip thrown aside for dead, reminded us of an incident in our own travels. When we were visiting Fredericton, in the Canadian Province of New Brunswick, many years ago, we were called to call on an old woman who was too ill to attend the services we were holding. A venerable old saint we found her to be. In the course of conversation she remarked:

"I wonder if you ever noticed how God generally brings in his promise with a death upon

"He failed to quite catch her meaning, and asked her to explain herself more clearly.

"Well," she resumed, "When God gives us a particular promise he generally does it just at the time when he has made things so that it can't be true; there's the death upon it; and He expects us to trust his word, just that bare word, and to believe he'll bring it all out sure, in spite of can or can't."

"How exactly the homely old saint of New Brunswick said what the great court preacher, Channing, said long before in another land and in her tongue! "When God desires to show that his work comes entirely from his hand, He does everything to impotence and to desolation—and then He acts!"

The elegant diction of the French Bishop may express the thought more aesthetically, but certainly it does not express it more graphically than the not quite grammatical English of the old woman. "Diversity of operation, but the same spirit." Whether by a sermon before the Grand monarque, or in a conversation in a Canadian cottage, or by an object lesson in the South Sea Islands, God teaches one comforting lesson, that He is able to bring forth life where human ken can deserv only death, and that He would have his people "Be sober and hope to the end."—The Presbyterian.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Testimony

OF WARNING AND ENCOURAGEMENT, AT PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

Fourth Month 22nd, 1845.—Elizabeth Evans said in substance, that she had felt a concern on her mind during the sittings of both to-day and yesterday, and she feared to leave the meeting without expressing it. She had remembered the words of the Prophet, "Lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth." It is a time of commotion, of shaking among all religious denominations; not one was exempted from it in some shape or other as far as she knew, the true Israel of God of which our Society forms a part, is undergoing a sifting; and the language of many hearts had been, "Let not thy hand stop for our crying, till all impurities are taken away."

Many of us had sorrowfully felt, and her heart had been made sick with the want of unity of feeling, the unsettlement that was among some, and the dissatisfaction of others. There had been a hushing up, a covering up, a putting the evil day afar off; but the time was drawing near when it would have to be shown what and where we were. Though we had to appearance been getting along smoothly from year to year, yet hundreds had felt there was an undercurrent of dissatisfaction and insincerity, of putting on two faces; using two languages, according to the company some were in. She had remembered the disciples were commanded not to take two coats.

She had heard it remarked and she knew it to be so, that we had much less expression at this time than was usual on the various interesting things that had come before us; and she did not wonder at it; many had been made to drink of the wine of astonishment. If any were disposed to think hardly of her, she desired to be able to bear it. The Lord would have a people without spot or blemish or any such thing; the chaff must be sifted from the wheat; but she was comforted by the assurance that not one grain of the solid substantial wheat should fall to the ground; nothing but the chaff must fly. He will sift again and again. The language of her heart had been, grievous as it might be to endure.

"Oh, Lord! if thou wilt extend thy arms around us and encircle and hold up, then carry on thy blessed work to purify us." The dear young people she said had claimed her most tender sympathy; she believed many of them were deepening in the root, notwithstanding they had been sorely puzzled at the difference of opinion, and also to account for many things that had passed and were passing. Some were ready to seek in other societies for the rest they found not in their own; but it would not do to look outward. The watchword was, "Abide in the patience a little longer, and your deliverance, our deliverance, will be wrought."

Though we might seem to be in a narrow place, as with the Red Sea before us, and the bands of the Philistines behind, the Lord will make a way for us where there is no way, and will again enable our Society to enjoy her Sabbath as in former times. The Lord is on his way to open the prison doors, and where those who like Joseph are bound in prison, who have been let down into the pit where there is no water; who have been hated and sold of their brethren, shall be set free. The Lord will sift again and again, and the chaff will fly, but hundreds will be planted like Joseph, as a fruitful vine by the side of a well whose branches ran over the wall. The archers have grieved him and shot at him, and hated him, but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob.

Late Flowers.

The mild, dry weather of the Tenth Month prevented the formation of heavy frost, and preserved the vegetation largely unblighted, so that in a visit to a neighboring swamp, as late as the 17th of Tenth Month, there were still to be found some flowers and other objects to repay the search of the naturalist.

Among these were several specimens of a rather large-flowered blue Aster, which was either Aster longifolius, or some allied species—but what one I am not able to say with certainty, because after my return home, circumstances prevented the careful investigation necessary to determine. For it requires considerable acquaintance with this genus (of which Gray enumerates more than fifty species) to be sure which of its varieties it is that you meet with in the woods and fields.

On the borders of the small run, that flowed through the meadow, were many patches of a Golden Rod (Solidago) just coming into bloom. The beautiful yellow of the flowers, and the wrinkled leaves that closely beset the stem, indicated that it was the common species, S. Rugosa. Yet that is one of the earliest species seen in the summer. The abundance of the plants did not favor the supposition that their development had been retarded by the bite of a grazing animal or by some other accidental injury—so that I was quite at a loss to explain this apparently unseasonable show of bloom.

As is usual on flowers of this class, a number of insects were walking over them, probably feeding on the pollen which they furnished. Two or three varieties of the Beetle family were there; and what I at first supposed to be a small species of Bumble Bee—but on closer inspection concluded to be a fly—as I could see but two wings. If it was really a fly, the imitation of a bee was very perfect—so much so that I shrank from taking it in my hand, lest I might find by the sting that I had made a mistake. There were also two or three species of Wasps, or of flies closely imitating them.

The Canadian Burnet (Poterium Canadense) still retained its bloom; and I was much interested in noticing on a small patch of the meadow, hundreds of the Ladies' Tresses (Spiranthes cernua, a low-growing orchid, with a slender stem, crowned with a spirally twisted spike of white flowers. This plant is by no means uncommon in New Jersey, but never before had I seen such numbers of them gathered in one spot.

SPRING WANDERINGS.

LONGFELLOW.

When the warm sun that brings
Seed-time and harvest has returned again,
'Tis sweet to visit the still wood, where springs
The first flower of the plain.

I love the season well
When forest glades are teeming with bright forms,
If dark and many folded clouds foretell
The coming of the storms.

From the earth's loosened mould
The sapling draws its sustenance and thrives.
Though stricken to the heart with winter's cold,
The drooping tree revives.

The softly warbled song
Comes through the pleasant woods, and colored wings
Are gloaming in the golden sun, along
The forest openings.

And when bright sunset fills
The silver woods with light, the green slope throws
Its shadows in hollows of the hills,
And wide the upland glows.

And when the day is gone,
In the blue lake the sky o'er-reaching far
Is hollowed out, and the moon dips her horn
While twinkles many a star.

Invested in the tide
Stand the gray rocks, and trembling shadows throw;
And the fair trees look over side by side,
And see themselves below.

ON SEEING WILLIAM PENN'S "NO CROSS NO CROWN."

No cross, no crown; no suffering, no reward;
These are the precepts of our dying Lord;
He points to paths his holy feet have trod,
His bright example leads the way to God.
Cease then to wonder, O ye worldly wise!
The Christian warrior gains a heavenly prize;
He leaves the glories of a world like this,
For immortality and boundless bliss.
He is the truly wise, whose mental eye,
Illum'd with beams of wisdom from on high,
Beholds the frailty of all earthly joy,
And seeks the treasure time can ne'er destroy.
Hear, O my soul, the Saviour's call obey;
Take up thy cross, and walk the narrow way.
Ah! wherefore doubt, tho' threatening storms arise,
Tho' hovering darkness cloud thy mental skies?
He who has been thy glorious morning light,
Can chase the horrors of impending night;
Can prove thy refuge in the noontide ray,
And gild with brightness thy declining day.
Eternal mercy give my soul to prove,
The precious influence of redeeming love;
Save from the bondage, from the power of sin,
Save from the war that rages still within;
Eternal grace and purity impart,
Set up thy standard in this wayward heart.
O! thou didst drain the dregs of bitter woe,
That streams of joy for rebel man might flow;
For man thou left the glories of thy throne,
And trod the suffering path, forsaken and alone.
Ye humble hearts, in adoration bend,
Cast all your cares on this Almighty friend;
He crowns with conquest in each trying hour;
His is the glory, His the boundless power.
The hosts of darkness flee at his control,
While messengers of grace surround the soul.
Now faith, and hope, shall bid their children sing,
"O tyrant Death! where's now thy dreaded sting?
No more the victory, boasting Grave, is thine;
I am my Lord's, and He's forever mine."

C. REES.

LET us not expect all gifts in all men, and that every man should excel in every gift; for then one would be saying to another, I have no need of thee. But God hath given diversity of gifts to divers saints, that each may acknowledge something in another, which he hath not himself, and may reckon his perfection to lie in his union and communion with them.—Wm. Dell.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Extracts from the Diary of Louis Taber.

Lincoln, Ninth Month 2nd, 1832.—Am to-day entering the twenty-second year of my life. It is the most solemn period of my existence. I am humbled under the consideration of my transgressions, and look forward to my future life, trusting in the care of Omnipotence for my protection. I have endeavored to devote myself more fully to the cause of my Redeemer; and it is now my desire to seek first the kingdom and its righteousness, trusting that all things necessary may be added.

Tenth Month 5th.—I have been renewedly tendered under a consideration of the dispensations of Divine goodness. I have had to reflect upon my many little omissions and misses. My mind has been deeply impressed with a fear that I may yet have to stand as a watchman on the walls of Zion and declare the goodness of God. It is my sincere prayer that I may be found doing all to the glory of the great Giver of every good and perfect gift, in faith and resignation to his will, being assured that the afflictions of this life, are overpaid by that eternal weight of glory which awaits the righteous.

Third Month 28th, 1833.—About five months since, I left home to teach a school in Sheffield, Lower Canada. Yesterday I returned, and was pleased and thankful again to meet friends and connections, parents, sisters and brothers, and to find them all enjoying good health. What a blessing is a paternal roof! How many and various are the enjoyments of a family where piety abounds and the ruling principle is love.

Sixth Month 8th.—The Yearly Meeting of New York, which I attended and from which I have returned, was large, and graciously owned by the Great Head of the Church. The business of the meeting was transacted in much brotherly love. Excellent epistles were read from all the Yearly Meetings of Friends. My heart was grateful for those spiritual blessings. After the storm is past, comes the calm sunshine of peace. May that sacred influence remain long upon my mind.

North Berwick, Second Month 23rd, 1834.—A long time has elapsed since I have penned my feelings, so little has occurred worthy of remembrance. I have passed many a lonely hour separated from all my friends and relatives. But O for the want of abiding in that tender, watchful frame of mind which ever characterizes the humble follower of Jesus, I have in some measure lost the savor of life, and have sometimes vainly sought him whom my soul loveth. By the assistance of Divine grace I hope to find forgiveness and strength to walk with more devotedness of spirit to my Heavenly Master. My ingratitude to my God has sometimes appeared so great that I dare not ask for forgiveness. But the blood of the everlasting covenant is yet sufficient for me.

Sixth Month 9th.—Sitting alone in my chamber, I have been reflecting how trivial circumstances will affect our happiness, and how willing we are to believe, that contentment and happiness might be found in some situation which we have not yet attained. How little do we know of ourselves and how much do we wish to know of others! The resignation of our own wills to the will of God, is the supreme bliss.

Seventh Month 28th.—Oh how hard it is to give up all and to follow Christ; to be willing to become fools for his sake; to cast down all our earthly crowns at the Redeemer's feet. But we cannot serve two masters. We cannot serve God and mammon. We cannot take the world in one hand and religion in the other. There is no compromise about it. There is no part road to Heaven. Except ye be regenerated a born again ye can in no case enter the kingdom. We are called to come out and be separate. We must be the humble followers of rejected and crucified but arisen Lord. We are called with a high and holy calling. We have unto us dispensed the gospel of the grace of God.

Seventh Month 28th.—Under the living ministry of our friend, Joseph Bowen, my heart again been broken and tendered. "I have been induced to believe," were his expressions, "that if there is not more growth experienced from the gentle and refreshing showers with which kind Providence has blessed you, there will be a famine, and not of water nor of bread, but hearing of the word of God." Addressing you Friends, he said, "There are those who weep between the porch and the altar for you, who can clasp you in their arms and bless you. Why do ye also go away? Shall strangers come in and be your ploughmen and your vinedressers, and will you be aliens?" Oh the baptizing and reaching effect of a living ministry. It is a blessing for which we cannot be sufficiently thankful.

Sixth Month 21st, 1835.—The Yearly Meeting which I attended was large, and again favored with the presence of Master of assembly. Many lively testimonies were borne, and my heart was humbled under a sense of the goodness and care of God. I lamented my growth coldness and apathy in the best things; and was induced to form new resolutions to follow more earnestly after the Truth. The Shepherd of Israel still watches over his fold. During the past winter I visited my friends at home, enjoying again the sweets of friendship and the domestic circle. I then remembered the vow of the patriarch: "If God will be with me and will keep me in this way that I go," * * * "then shall the Lord be my God." Gen. xxviii: 20, 21.

Ninth Month 2nd, 1836.—I have to-day completed my twenty-fifth year, and have one less in which to prepare for the change that awaits me. A long time has passed since I have written anything; but I have had again to look over my past life, and to reflect upon the many unforeseen events which have transpired since I commenced this diary. When I consider the shortness of time, and that almost half of my life, at the longest, is already past, I feel the necessity of greater diligence and more watchfulness unto prayer. I have often been thankful for my prosperity here, and except it as a favor from the Divine hand, but I often feel the need of his holy presence to sustain me. Some of my mental conflicts have been very great, and I have sometimes almost distrusted the care of my Heavenly Father. But I am often strengthened to put confidence in Him, believing He will yet, if I abide in faith and patience, make a path through the mighty deep. Never have I felt greater property of spirit than it has been my lot to feel, much of the time during the last few months. But I have had times of refreshing from the Lord for which my heart has been truly thankful. How have I wished for greater devotedness and fervency of spirit, and that I might now begin anew my journey and my life!

I attended New York Yearly Meeting this spring, and saw my parents and a sister. I found it hard parting with them. I also attended New England Yearly Meeting, and Quarterly Meetings of Salem and Dover, the former held at Lynn and the latter at Berwick, giving a pleasant visit with my friends in both places. I am now in my occupation at the school. The responsibilities of my situation sometimes oppress my spirits; and I am satisfied if teachers felt the importance of their positions, they might do much towards instilling into the minds of children principles of piety and virtue. May I be strengthened to be more faithful in the discharge of my duties, to be more devoted to the cause of truth, and to my God, and may my trust be more fully in Him.

Ninth Month 6th.—Our venerable friend, James Brown, expired to-day, about noon, in the ninety-eighth year of his age, after a short illness of two weeks. He made a peaceful exit. His strength continued to decline rapidly until he slept in the Lord. His countenance was composed and natural, and a comfortable assurance was felt that he had found his rest. He was much beloved and will be long lamented.

"Sweet is the scene when virtue dies
When sinks a righteous soul to rest."

Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.

Ninth Month 8th.—The funeral of Moses Brown was large, and several testimonies were borne to his virtues and integrity, both as a man and a Christian. The Divine presence was felt. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

First Month 5th, 1837.—While one of the preachers was reading this morning at the table the 27th chapter of the Acts, 20th to 25th verses, my mind was deeply impressed with the goodness and superintending providence of God. My spirit was refreshed and my heart tendered even to tears, for which visitation of Divine love I am thankful. The secret aspirations of my soul to my Heavenly Father were that all my former transgressions might be blotted out of the book of remembrance, and that I might be found more faithful in the discharge of my duties to God and to my fellow beings. The humble messenger Zionward is I believe often made sensible that these seasons are not at his command, but when it is the case with us as with the disciples formerly, that the doors being shut, Jesus comes and stands in the midst, how grateful ought we to be, and how awful will be the consequences, if we slight these calls of the Divine Master, and "and do despite unto the spirit of promise." May it be my happy experience to feel the sweet incomes of heavenly love, and may my trust and confidence be fully centered in Him.

Bless the Lord, O my soul and forget not all His benefits.

Were we able to look into futurity and see all the changes and trials through which we may be permitted to pass, the prospect would so depress our spirits as to entirely unfit us for the duties of life. It is among the wise provisions of Providence that our blessings and adversities are so intermingled as to render life desirable while the latter gradually break off our attachment to the world and fit us for an inheritance among those that are sanctified. Often as I resolved to pen some of my reflections, I have been too poor both in body and mind to write much worth re-perusal.

Ninth Month 27th.—On the 10th of Fourth Month I left Providence, R. I., in a very poor state of health, which had been induced in part by study and confinement, and I had been some time declining.

Tenth Month 27th.—My friends advised me to visit home and remain a part of the summer. With a prospect of being able soon to return I cheerfully complied with their advice, and reached home without much inconvenience except considerable fatigue. It is always pleasant on ordinary occasions to visit a father's house, but the circumstances under which I left and returned, and the prospect of my health contributed greatly to depress my feelings. At home we find that care and sympathy for which we may look in vain among strangers. A good home in sickness should be numbered among our richest blessings. Instead of improving as I had anticipated, my health continued to decline for two months, and I sometimes had reason to fear that my disorder would not soon be removed. The beautiful lines of Bryant were often present to my mind—

"Yet a few days, and thee
The all-beholding sun shall see no more
In all his course."

We can imagine the feelings of another at the close of life, but in sickness only when we find ourselves cut off from all worldly prospects, can we fully realize what must be our feelings when we leave the world and break off our attachments, to enter into a new and untried state of existence, to be shall I add, born again into the world of spirits. It is at such an hour, if ever, that we need to feel the supporting promises of the Gospel, the consolations of the Spirit and the Christian's hope. I was sometimes able to resign all to the Divine will. Since receiving some help for which I was truly grateful, I have continued slowly to improve.

(To be continued.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

As "the earth that drinketh in the rain that oft cometh upon it, and bringeth forth herbs, meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God," so the mind of the Christian believer is enriched by the showers of celestial good dispensed through the Grace of God. Much of error is infused into the human mind by wrong thinking. It is wise to take advice from the poet: "Guard well thy thoughts—thy thoughts are heard in Heaven." The visited children of the Lord, after having experienced enough of Grace Divine to change the heart and become saved, as many seem to think they are when newly converted, yet have great need of a "continuance in well doing," a constant abiding in the fear of the Lord—yes, "all the day long." Various comparisons are used in the sacred Scriptures to elucidate Truth and explain the facts recorded in connection with spiritual Truth. Jesus said to the Jews, "Ye pay tithes of mint, anise and cummin, and neglect the weightier matters of the law—judgment, mercy and faith." Are not Christians as well as Jews censurable for this? Is it not a common fault with us to fritter away precious time in taking thought of the things unworthy of thought?—"judgment, mercy and faith," being subjects brought but little into practical thought.

Felix trembled when Paul reasoned with him of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come. He trembled with guilt because he had failed to practice what he knew was his duty. Alas, that it is so much the case—failing to practice all the Christian duties. The earthly mind failing to prepare the soil to drink in the celestial rain that oft cometh upon it, receives not the blessing that Infinite wisdom designs should come from the bountiful provisions of God's manifold grace. Whatever is an essential to the well-being of an immortal soul is worthy of thought in such way as to prove the sincerity of action and the purity of motive that governs action. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

P. R. GIFFORD.

PROVIDENCE, Eleventh Month 5th, 1892.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Toads as Collectors.—Toads are night-hunters, and some naturalists have employed them to collect specimens of insects. The toads are put down at night, and in the morning are collected, when gentle pressure causes them to eject a portion of their nocturnal spoils.

Field Mice.—A proof of the sort of plague these creatures may become, as well as of the folly of shooting down every bird of prey wherever seen, was afforded a few years ago in the south of Scotland. A raid had been made, and war declared against hawks and owls, that was carried out to the bitter end, but the field-mice increased to such an extent, that whole fields of grass were utterly destroyed, the little creatures being actually in millions. So true it is that there is a balance in nature, which cannot be interfered with, with impunity.

A Herring Panic.—A wonderful herring panic occurred some years since on the coast of Aberdeenshire, Scotland. The herring shoals appeared to have gone suddenly mad; some said they were pursued by some sort of a sea-monster. However, they threw themselves on shore, in heaps, in ridges, in myriads. There was no doing anything with the multitude of stranded living fishes, and for a whole week at least, carts from all the neighboring farms were employed carrying them away for manure, the people being naturally afraid that a plague would break out as the fish decayed.

Arresting the Current.—As the strongest current will make a break for the earth by way of the telegraph or telephone wire to reach its destination, it would, if not arrested, go through the instruments in the operating offices of those companies and burn them out. The companies, to guard against such accidents, use what is called "lightning arresters," which are intended to avoid lightning as well as stray currents. Attached to each wire in the central office of the telephone company is a fine No. 36 insulated wire that runs across a small piece of tin foil, held in its place by two small brass supporters at either end, one end of which connects with a ground wire.

While this little wire is large enough to pass a current sufficient for telephone purposes, a current of a higher power will instantly burn it in two, and the intruding current, instead of getting into the building, will take the ground wire for the earth. There is also a device of similar construction used by telephone companies that will "open the current" and expose the breakage the first time an attempt is made to use the telephone with which it is connected afterward. This places the possibility of an accident at the minimum. Telephones in buildings are not so protected, and hence an occasional stray current will reach them. They are so constructed, however, that no serious danger can result to the operator. It is said, however, that an instance is on record where a man was killed by lightning when responding to a telephone call in Chicago about two years ago.

Pigeon-post.—During the Franco-German war of 1871, a pigeon-post was successfully established to keep up communication with the outer world. It was worked thus: balloons ascended high in air, and meeting with favorable winds, the aeronauts permitted themselves to be drifted far over the land held in the clutch of the enemy, and having arrived, say, over Tours, they descended. Now these balloons carried with them from Paris a large number of Belgian homing pigeons. Letters from England, etc., were now photographed on thin paper, each one being reduced to a microscopic form, the tiny documents were then put in well-secured quills and tied to the central tail-feathers of the birds, and these were released. Straight back, then, to their homes in the beleaguered city they flew, with the messages from the friends of the besieged. The first three birds that arrived are said to have brought back nearly one thousand despatches.—Friends in Wood and Field.

The River Jordan.—The curious statement is published in the organ of the Palestine Exploration Fund, on the authority of Dr. Lorter, that the Dead Sea loses every day by evaporation several million tons of water. He says this enormous mass is easily drawn up by the rays of the sun, the valley wherein the sea lies being one of the hottest points upon the globe. This vast basin is remarkable as being the deepest depression upon the surface of the earth. It is 1,300 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, and rocky walls rising to 2,600 feet in height surround it on all sides. It is nourished only by the river Jordan; and, there being no outlet, its entire tribute of water must be absorbed by evaporation only. Dr. Lorter says that the waters of the lake are concentrating more and more, and so great has its density become that the human body easily floats on the surface without the slightest exertion of hands or feet.

Duelling.—The absurdity of this mode of seeking satisfaction for injuries, is illustrated by an anecdote told of William Cobbett. When challenged to fight, he recommended the challenger to draw a Cobbett in chalk upon a door, and if he succeeded in hitting it to send him instant word, in order that he might have an opportunity of acknowledging that, had the true Cobbett been there, he, in all probability, would have been hit, too. But, hit or no hit, he maintained the bullets could have no effect whatever on the original cause of quarrel.

Foreign Element in our Population.—A writer in the Christian Advocate speaks of the difficulty of Americanizing our enormous foreign population, a large proportion of whom are out of harmony with American ideas. He thinks it hopeless to expect any legislation from Congress in the way of restricting immigration, in the present state of the political parties; and he suggests a steamship mission movement, which shall supply every emigrant vessel with a missionary who may accompany the vessel on its passage from foreign ports, and give instruction to the emigrants.

Masonry as a Law unto Itself.—"Bro." Josiah H. Drummond, Chairman of Maine's Committee on Ancient Craft Masonry, explicitly lays down the law of Masonry, in these terms: "Masons, and those intending to be Masons, should understand that the law of the Grand Lodge is the law of Masonry, and that if they cannot obey that law, whether it seems to them right or wrong, reasonable or unreasonable, they had better get out of the institution as soon as possible, as they certainly do not belong in it." He should have added, what has long been known and is ever manifest to every investigator of Freemasonry, as exposed by members of that fraternity, that the law of the Grand Lodge is inimical to all the civil institutions of our country, simply because it is the law of Masonry. Take the following clause from the obligation of a Master Mason: "I promise and swear that I will vote for a brother or companion Mason, and promote his election to office, in preference to any other candidate of equal qualifications." Then take this part of the Royal Arch Mason's oath: "I furthermore promise and swear that I will keep all the secrets of a companion Royal Arch Mason, when communicated to me as such, without exception." Sometimes the phraseology is changed, but it always covers, or comprehends, murder and treason; sometimes it is expressed, "murder and treason not excepted." In another clause of the same obligation the candidate is sworn to "assist a companion Royal Arch Mason, when engaged in any difficulty, and will espouse his cause so far as to extricate him from the same, whether he be right or wrong." This oath he takes after having pledged himself to "stand to and abide by all the laws, rules and regulations of any chapter of Royal Arch Masons of which I may become a member; the constitution and laws of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter, under whose jurisdiction the same may work; together with the constitution, laws and edicts of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States of America, so far as they shall come to my knowledge." The inference to be drawn from Drummond's decision, in connection with these obligations, is, that when the Grand Lodge and the General Grand Chapter unite to overthrow the Constitution and civil government, including all the horrors of murder and treason, every loyal member of the Blue Lodge and Chapter must obey them, "without mental reservation or evasion of any kind." It is well to have these conclusions widely and distinctly understood. The laws of Masonry not only promote assassination but high treason.—Christian Cynosure.

New Light out of Palestine.—We would not have our readers, who are so much interested in the Scriptures and in the discoveries which illustrate and explain them, fail to notice a remarkable discovery just announced, made on the soil of Palestine by a young American, F. J. Bliss, son of President Bliss, of the American Protestant College at Beirut, although he was working under the direction of the English Palestine Exploration Fund. It is the discovery for the first time in Palestine of a written record that goes back to the time of David or even of Moses. It is an actual letter of historical value, on a clay tablet, and in the Babylonian language and writing. It gives us a little glimpse of the disturbed condition of things in Palestine while the children of Israel were in bondage in Egypt, and it contains a mention of a Zamrida, governor of Lachish, of whom we already had knowledge from the remarkable collection of tablets also in the Babylonian writing, found four years ago, at Tel el-Amarna in Egypt.

We now know it was not the Nile but the Euphrates that gave its culture first to Syria and Phenicia. The records of man do not go back of the time when Babylonia ruled along the Mediterranean, while Egypt got its first foothold in this region about 1700 B. C., when Amasis I. set up his outposts as far beyond the Egyptian border as Sharohen and Gaza. But for more than a thousand years before this, Syria and Palestine had been learning the Babylonian language, had submitted to its rules, and had adopted its civilization. We no longer wonder that the Bible makes Babylonia and not Egypt the mother of nations.

Spiritual Power.—Professor Buell, of Boston, in an article on Theological Education, published in The Christian Advocate, says:—"Spiritual power invests a preacher's words with an energy and influence which nothing else can impart. It is the power which made Felix tremble when Paul spoke of righteousness, temperance and coming judgment. It is the power which attracted Onesimus, the runaway slave, to Paul's lodgings in Rome, and sent him back to his master a Christian man and brother. It is the power which young Spurgeon felt in the rude eloquence of an obscure village preacher. It is the power which dwelt in a certain Christian of this city, whose name I do not know, which nine years ago convinced a common thief that there was salvation for him, and that has enabled him during these nine years by honest labor to pay back an aggregate sum of $1600 to the people from whom he stole."

Music in Friends' Schools.—Wigton, in Cumberland is one of the Friends' Schools in England where music is not taught to the scholars. Recent efforts have been made to add it to the curriculum of studies. The London Friend says that at a general meeting held on the afternoon of the Quarterly Meeting in the Sixth Month, the question was revived, but "after a lengthy and animated discussion, in which opinions were freely expressed on both sides, it was felt that there was not sufficient unanimity for any change to be made."

Thomas Driver's Work in Behalf of an Unfortunate Man.

The San Francisco Chronicle tells of a new use for the telephone—a proposed method of utilizing it in a work of mercy and love—which originated with our fellow townsman, Thomas Driver, whose sympathies have been aroused by the spectacle of Samuel Dutcher, an intelligent social man, sitting alone in his cabin, awaiting in solitude the coming of death, and unable to hold communion even with sympathetic friends.

Thomas Driver, of San Leandro, has a new plan to assist the leper. He gives his views the following communication to the Board of Supervisors: "Your petitioner has for many years been a visitor to the County Hospital Sundays, seeking the welfare and comfort of the many poor patients gathered therein. No I find a leper isolated from the main building in a little cabin on the hill. I have conceived the idea of building a telephone line at my own expense from the leper's cabin to the reading-room at the hospital, and by it I hope to alleviate his lonesomeness in a measure by enabling him to hold a conversation with his friends who visit the reading-room." T. Driver simply with permission to erect the poles on the property of the county. He will do all the work and furnish all the material at his own expense. The matter was referred to the Hospital Committee, and it was decided to grant the request so the leper will have a telephone.

When S. Dutcher learned of the plan, was deeply affected at the genuine interest taken in his case by an entire stranger, and the knowledge that though he is of necessity ostracized from the paths of his fellow men he is not forsaken by them, will render less dreadful a few years that remain for him this side of the grave.—San Leandro Puper.

David Sands, in a letter to his wife in 1791, relates the following circumstance to have occurred during his Gospel mission in Ireland about that time:

"Some conviction has appeared in the course of my late journey, and that amongst the noblest in war. A person who had long professed himself one of the most fearless and undaunted, and an officer of no inferior rank, having been with us in several meetings which I had in town that had been besieged, where many lives were lost, and from which the clergy had fled, invited me to his house to breakfast. After breakfast was over, I had a religious opportunity with himself and his family, when he was much moved and reached, as he had been in meetings before. He arose, and stripping off his military dress, and laying by his sword, asked for some other garments, saying to his wife and children, 'I shall never fight more, for I am convinced it is not in accordance with the spirit of Christ.'

George Fox's Burial.

At the request of a Friend in Iowa, the following interesting account of the death and burial of that great and good man, George Fox, reprinted from vol. II. of Friends' Library, ges 387-9.

LONDON, the 15th of Eleventh Month, 1690.

Henry Coward, Thomas Green, Thomas Dockrey, Richard Barrow, William Higginson, and Thomas Widders, [probably of Lancaster.]

My dear Friends and well-beloved brethren, to whom my life is bound up in the covenant God's gracious, glorious light, wherein consisteth our life and peace: as we keep our habitations and dwelling places therein, we shall be preserved near unto the ocean of all loved life, and know the fountain unsealed, and the springings of it to bubble up in our particular bosoms: wherein we may drink together into the one Spirit, by which we are led, in the enjoyment of the heavenly power it sanctifies;—in the living sense and concurring virtue of which, according to measure, we do dearly value you all.*

Well, dear Friends, before this comes to your hands, I [conclude] you have an account of the departure of our ancient Friend and honorable elder in the church of God, George Fox; who was this day buried, in the presence of a large and living assembly of God's people, who did accompany him to the ground, and as supposed to be above 4000 Friends. The meeting-house at Gracechurch-street could not contain them, nor the court before the door, nor any could not get to within hearing of the testimonies. Many living, open, powerful testimonies were published in the meeting-house, by many in the grave-yard, among many tender hearts, watery eyes, and contrite spirits. The London Friends were very discreet, to alter all passages and concerns relating thereto in great wisdom every way: there being six Monthly Meetings belonging to this city, sixteen Friends were nominated and appointed of every Monthly Meeting, who were to carry the corpse, and none else; and that his relations should all go next the corpse; that all ends should go on one side of the street, two and three in a rank, as close together as they could go,—that the other side might be clear for the citizens and coaches, that were going about their business. The grave-yard is a large plot of ground, yet it was quite full, and some of the people of the world were there. The last week George Fox was at the Quarterly Meeting, the Second-day morning meeting, the Meeting for Sufferings, and at two meetings of worship; besides the First-day morning meeting, which was at Gracechurch-street Meeting-house. On the Seventh-day, he came to lodge at Henry Gouldney's, [in White Hart Court.] He was near on the First-day where he kept the meeting; and said he was as well that meeting as he had been a long time before; yet he began to be ill in the evening, about the fifth hour of the First-day; and departed before the tenth hour in the evening of the third-day following, as with him most of the time; wherein he made many living powerful sentences, to the edifying of the company present. There was no sign of any great pain upon him, neither did he ever complain. Robert Widders' manner of departure and his were much alike, for

I saw them both; only George shut up his eyes himself, and his chin never fell, nor needed any binding up, but lay as if he had been fallen asleep,—one would have thought he had smiled: he was the most pleasant corpse that I ever looked upon, and many hundreds of Friends came to see his face, having the most part of three days' time to behold him, before the coffin was nailed up. Friends carried the coffin on their shoulders, without any bier, cloth, or cover, but the natural wood; yet the coffin was very smooth and comely.

Well Friends, about two hours or less before he died, he took me by the hand, and bid me remember his love to Friends where I travelled. I intended to go out of the city on the morrow after he began to be sick; but seeing him ill, it was Friends' mind I should stay, and see how it might be with him; and I had more freedom to stay than to go; and I was glad to see such a heavenly and harmonious conclusion as dear George Fox made; the sense and sweetness of it, will, I believe, never depart from me: in the heavenly virtue of which, I desire to rest; and remain your brother.

ROBERT BARROW.

P. S.—I go towards Oxfordshire to-morrow.

I shall now give you an account of the Friends that declared, and as they spoke, one after another, viz: James Parke, Robert Barrow, Ambrose Rigge, Joseph Batt, William Penn, Francis Camfield, Charles Marshall, John Taylor of York, Francis Stamper, George Whitehead, Stephen Crisp; and Thomas Green ended in prayer.*

The Friends who spoke at the grave [were] as follows:—William Penn, Joseph Batt, George Whitehead, John Vaughton, and William Bingley.

Letter to John Airey,† giving an account of the Decease of George Fox.

Loving Friend John Airey,—This comes to acquaint thee, that that ancient, honorable, and worthy man, George Fox, is departed this life. He was at Gracechurch-street meeting on First-day last, and gave in his testimony amongst others: after meeting he fell into cold shivering fits, and grew worse and worse, and weaker, until Third-day last at night, between nine and ten, he died. In his weakness he desired to be remembered to all Friends, and advised and admonished Friends to fly to the power of God: he died sweetly and quietly, and was sensible to the last. After the meeting on Fourth-day at Gracechurch-street, all or most of the Friends of the ministry there, went into a chamber hard by; as well to condole on the loss and death of that good man, as also to take care about his burial, which is ordered from this meeting-house to-morrow, [Sixth-day,] about four in the afternoon. In the chamber was Wm. Penn, Stephen Crisp, Geo. Whitehead, J. Taylor of York, Wm. Bingley, John Vaughton, Fras. Stamper, John Field, Samuel Waldenfield, John Boucher, and others: and only, as I remember, three of us not preachers. While we sat together under the deep consideration of the loss of that good man, the wonderful power of God fell upon all in the room; insomuch that not one could contain themselves, but was broken down by the weight of that glory; so that for a considerable time there was nothing but deep sighs, groans and tears. And after that all had [given vent to their feelings] and grew quiet in their minds, several of them, under that great sense, gave testimonies concerning him, too large here to insert: One said, "a valiant is fallen in Israel this day, and his place there would be vacant, if some faithful ones did not supply that glorious station he was in." Another, "that it was his faith, and that it was with him, that that Spirit and power which [had] in so large a measure, dwelt in that body, should extend itself into thousands." Another repeated the antiquity of his standing, service, and faithfulness to the end. Another, that he was [as] a fixed star in the firmament of God's glory, and there he should shine for ever.—I hope I shall never forget that day; the remembrance of it is sweet.

It is ordered that the elders and ancients of Friends take up the corpse first, and six are chosen and matched out of each of the six Monthly Meetings about London to carry, of which I am one for our quarter, and J. Beliam.

This letter is without signature, and is stated to be recorded in a Register Book of Friends at North Shields.

PASSING down the street a day or two ago, the editor of the Recorder found himself in a crowd which densely covered the sidewalks. The eyes of all, both men and women, were fixed upon a fashionable hat store, and some policemen were making not very successful efforts to induce the crowd to keep moving. Asking the cause of the excitement, we were told that one of America's most eminent men was buying a hat. We caught the name of this eminent citizen only in part, and learned that James— was the man, and rejoiced to know that Blaine was sufficiently recovered to get so far as Philadelphia. But a moment later we were undeceived, and learned that the prominent citizen was not James Blaine but another James, the hero of the latest prize-fight. Fearing lest the Recorder should be suspected of feeling an interest in him, we hastily passed on, partly disgusted, and partly amused at this latest exhibition of hero-worship. Certainly such curiosity, however harmless in itself, as it might be argued, afforded evidence of the widespread and debasing effect of that fall of Adam, which has lowered the tastes of his descendants, while it has involved them in the guilt and ruin of his sin.—Episcopal Recorder.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 26, 1892.

It is a subtle stratagem of the enemy of all righteousness, to make the bounties conferred upon us by our Heavenly Father a means of drawing away our hearts from them, and of settling our affections on this present world, its possessions and pleasures. The teachings of our Saviour and his apostles contain distinct caution against this snare—such as "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." "If any man will be my disciple, let him deny himself, take up his daily cross and follow me." "Ye cannot serve God and mammon."

*Some disadvantage is felt, as regards the copy of the Epistle, in not having had the original to transcribe from.

In the late Quarterly Meeting of Philadelphia, this subject was somewhat opened. We subjoin a brief summary of the line of thought there presented; desiring that our readers will appreciate the importance of that devotion to the cause of Christ, and that earnestness in working out their individual salvation, which led the apostle to declare that he counted all else as of no value, so that he might win Christ.

"Lovest thou me more than these means of outward sustenance which thou gatherest?" This has become a very critical and vital question to the Society of Friends.

The multitude of fishes which had been brought to Peter's feet, were objects of desire which he had been favored to gather by Christ's own power. So the accumulations which reward the business-principles and industry of members of our religious Society, are fruits of virtues blessed by Him. The principles of the same godliness which has promise of the life which is to come, are found profitable for the life which now is. "Where virtue, frugality, and respect for right exist, riches will by a natural consequence accumulate." And our accumulations captivating us—the gifts more than the Giver absorbing our regard—tend to smother and stifle our spiritual life, and to drown our religious Society in the current of worldliness.

How oppressive already are the burdens of social expenditure under the exacting bondage of the maxims and customs of modern society, and its assumed conveniences and its necessities once called luxuries—the superfluities which are beguiling us from the simplicity that is in Christ; binding so many away from our mid-week meetings to earn them or to care for them; intensifying the strain on the over-wrought nerves of money-earning fathers, and of housekeeping and dress-preparing mothers; making early marriages impracticable; and crowding out true home-life with artificial desires. Such are some of the self-inflicted punishments of the mammon-spirit, and of that superfluity in living which lays hold on it and is fostered by it. And when it is full grown it bringeth forth death. Under its dominion in any household the principles of our religious profession vanish, and are scouted as narrow; or if professed in the form of an outward consistency, they are denied in the power of inward life.

Where our treasure is, there our heart will be also. And when our treasure is in the Saviour who hath bought us with a price, we love to serve Him in our body and in our spirit, which are his; and we love to associate with kindred hearts on any day of the week in waiting on and worshipping his holy name. Though a uniting in mid-week worship may involve a sacrifice of gain or outward interests, yet how clear is the answer of a good conscience to the question: "Lovest thou me more than these?" Our mid-week meetings are a test of our membership's love, rather than such apparent sacrifices on First-day, as costs one nothing. Let us return to our first love, lest the charge come upon us: "Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world" and "the things that are in the world." "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A complete list of representatives in Congress shows that the Democrats will have 222 members, the Republicans 125, and the Populists 6, and the Prohibitionists 1, giving the Democrats a majority of 90. If the Democrats carry the election for Congressmen in Rhode Island they will have a majority of 92 over all opposition.

It is stated that the newly elected Fusionists in North Dakota will ally themselves with the Prohibitionists, and make vigorous war upon the saloons.

The total value of the exports of merchandise from the United States during the 12 months ending Tenth Month 31st, 1892, was $982,844,685, as against $927,910,612 in the 12 months preceeding; during the same period the imports amounted to $866,805,956, as against $819,002,822 during the 12 months ended Tenth Month, 1891.

The News and Courier, of Charleston, South Carolina, has had an exhaustive examination made of the cotton crop of the South, extending over the entire cotton belt. Its reports show that the crop is short far beyond the calculation of all experts who have thus far figured on it. It further shows that the greater part of the crop has been picked and rushed to market, and that the late top crop will amount to practically nothing. From these reports, which come from the Commissioners of Agriculture of various States and from trustworthy newspapers, it appears that the crop will scarcely exceed six million bales.

Superintendent of the Census Porter has discharged Ivan Petroff, the special agent who prepared the reports of Alaska for the tenth and eleventh census, and who, it is stated, gave false information in his work for the State Department in the Bering Sea cases. Secretary Noble approved this action.

Secretary Edge, of the Pennsylvania State Board of Agriculture, estimates the total value of wheat, corn, oats, potato and hay crops of 1892 at $82,500,000. The estimated value of live stock is $100,000.

There are nearly 500 buffaloes in the Yellowstone National Park.

The Beaver Falls plant of the Carnegie Steel Company was started on the 15th inst. The company claims that, so far as the Lawrenceville and Homestead Works are concerned, the strike is over.

At a meeting of the Amalgamated Association in Homestead on the afternoon of the 20th instant, the great strike at Carnegie's was officially declared off. The losses of the owners of the works, the strikers and of the business men of Homestead, amount, it is believed, to several million dollars. Something may be gained, provided the lesson is learned that violence is not the right way to settle disputes.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 379; which was 25 less than last week, and 61 less than during the corresponding week last year. Of the whole number 181 were males and 198 females. Fifty-two died of diphtheria; 43 of pneumonia; 35 of consumption; 40 of diseases of the heart; 18 of apoplexy; 18 of old age; 16 of cancer and 13 of marasmus.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 114½ a 115; currency, 6's, 107½ a 118.

COTTON was dull, and unchanged on a basis of 9½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, spot, $15 a 16; spring bran, in bulk, spot, $14 a 15.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.15; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.75; Western winter, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.00; winter patent, $4.00 a $4.35; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.15; do., patent $4.25 a $4.50; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour was dull, but unchanged. Choice Pennsylvania ranged from $3.55 to $3.60 per barrel. Buckwheat flour moved slowly at $1.80 a $1.90 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 74 a 74½ cts. No. 2 mixed corn, 48½ a 49½ cts.

No. 2 white oats, 41 a 41½ cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ a 5½c. good, 4¾ a 5c.; medium, 4¾ a 4¾c.; common, 4 a 4¼c.; culls, 3 a 3¾c.; fat cows, 2½ a 3¼c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Good stock were active and firm. Extra, 5½ a 5½c.; good, 4¾ a 5c.; medium, 4¾ a 4¾c.; common, 3½ a 4c.; culls, 2½ a 3¾c.; lambs, 3½ a 6½c.

HOGS were in fair demand, but firm.

FOREIGN.—The members of the American delegation to the Brussels Monetary Conference who have arrived in London are more hopeful of practical results arising from the consultations than are most Englishmen. They believe that at least a strong majority conclusion can be reached which will have a great influence on the nations represented. It is feared that the Continental delegates will endeavor to prolong the Conference by a long adjournment over the Christmas holidays, the object being to prevent any legislation based on its recommendations by the present American Congress. The United States delegates by an adjournment will be reached within two or three weeks.

Contrary to previous reports, the Procureur General of France has decided to prosecute the Directors of the Panama Canal Company. One hundred and sixty persons, including Count De Lesseps are said to be compromised.

A despatch from Rome, dated the 15th instant, says: Floods are causing a great amount of damage on island of Elba. Several bridges on the main road running across the island have been washed away. One whole side of San Giovanni is undermined threatens to fall at any moment. If it does fall, it will crush out of existence a number of houses lying at its base. The occupants of the threatened houses have fled to places of safety.

With a view to meeting the deficit in the Budget the Russian Government will raise the excise duty on brandy, tobacco, beer and phosphorous matches and petroleum. Extra taxes will be placed on habited houses and forests and salt, and exempt from military service will also be taxed.

Count Tolstoi, in the Russian Gazette, calls attention to the continued miserable condition of the peasantry of Russia. He says that famine again threatens the district in which he resides. The rye harvest is as bad as it was in 1891. Oats are an utter failure. There is a complete dearth of material for fires, and the peasantry are exhausted by last winter's miseries. The Count Tolstoi declares, as is black as possible.

The London Standard's Moscow correspondent reports that a Russian Cagliostro, named Saoin, was a candidature for the throne of Bulgaria was announced last year, has escaped from Siberia, whither he had been sentenced for life.

A despatch received in Paris from Porto Novo says that the French troops have entered Abomey, the capital of Dahomey, without meeting any opposition. King Behanzin has vanished, and the French are in possession of the capital.

It was expected that the Dahomans would fight desperately to keep the French out of Abomey, and their action in evacuating the place causes considerable surprise here. It is thought that now that the united King Behanzin's kingdom is broken up, France will adopt tactics that will render King Behanzin's successor, who will be appointed by the French, a mere figure head. The country will in reality be governed by a French resident.

The Banque de Paris des Bays Bas has advanced the Spanish Government another twenty-five million francs. This makes seventy-five million francs advanced by the bank. In loaning the money the bank imposes a condition that the Cortes meet at the beginning of Twelfth Month and authorize the Government to raise a loan, part of which shall be used to repay the bank.

Since the 19th inst. fifteen cases of cholera and sixteen deaths from the disease have been registered in Bruges. The outbreak is attributed to the use of pickled fish as food.

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION will meet in the Assembly Room at Friends' Select School, 140 N. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, on Twelfth Month 3d. The following program has been arranged:

2 P. M.—"Language Teaching," by Robert C. Metcalf, Supervisor of the Boston Public Schools. Questions and Discussion. Recess.

3 P. M.—"The Training of Friends' Teachers in England," by J. Henry Bartlett; "The Ideal Preceptor," "How He Can Help His School," "How He Can Help His Teachers," by Supervisor Metcalf. Questions and Discussions. All interested are cordially invited to be present.

Lectures from the Life of Mary Dudley.

Sixth Month, 4th. Since the 26th ult. we sat with twelve families at Calvinson; at place resides Louis Majolier, who has been attentive companion in the family sittings, at our lodgings since we first came; he is a able, intelligent young man, evidently under tendering visitation of Truth, and hum-desirous of right instruction. As is often case amongst the more privileged members our religious Society, we have in many of e visits to struggle hard for the arising of some of those we sit with, seeming unac-tivated with the necessity of witnessing the union of that Divine power, which is the v of glory and diadem of beauty to the Israel; but there are others, who, having surably learned where to wait, we believe a little strengthened by our sympathy with a, and receive with joy the communicated l. In some seasons this has had free course, y, like thirsty ground, drinking in the rain; hat the watered, and those who have been edly helped to water, have rejoiced to-er.

Their appearance, manner of behavior, &c., certainly such as bear little resemblance to a Society; but the honest simplicity there is ing them, the apparent consciousness of their encies, and tenderness of spirit, confirm hope of a clearer prospect opening in due ion. We have not felt it our business to call e attention to the different branches of our stian testimony; the little labor bestowed ing to centre them to that 'light' which eath manifest,' and, by an obedience whereto, egradual advances of the 'perfect day' is n; and we are greatly deceived if this a has not dawned upon many in this dark er, though its brightness is yet intercepted yshades and clouds. Their meeting last i-day was different from the former, only e disturbing the quiet of it, and none of e agitations which were apparent in the eeding assembly. In the afternoon they e their Monthly Meeting, the business where- only the care of their poor, and oversight ch other's moral conduct; but our men rads, who understand the language, observed their method far exceeded their expecta- o. This season was also graciously regarded, and renewed help afforded for the service re-quired. The company of J. E. and A. B., is truly pleasant, and their facility in speaking French helpful; they lodge at a Friend's named Marignan, and we at a widow Benezet's.

"6th. In a conference together this forenoon, we concluded to have the most weighty part of the people here together, and have a sitting with them; and after selecting some names for this purpose, at four in the afternoon sat with a family who came from the country.

This was to me a season of instruction, under a feeling of the universal regard of Him who knows the various situations of his children, not respecting the persons of any. What was said to these poor people seemed to have entrance, and tended to our peace. At six o'clock we met as appointed with those selected; much freedom of speech was used, in pointing out to them some inconsistencies, and recommending to increasing watchfulness; that being swift to hear, and slow to speak, they might be enabled to distinguish the Shepherd's voice and fol-low it, refusing to obey that of the stranger. I hope this was a profitable season to them and us.

"8th. First-day, at about ten o'clock, we met as usual; the assembly was soon covered with great stillness, and evident solemnity, which I sincerely desired might not be lessened by me, though I believed it right to revive the lan-guage of David, 'One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple.' I felt renewed help in communicating what arose, and the sense of good seemed to increase, while the stream of Gospel ministry flowed through other instru-ments, and our spirits were bowed in awful reverence before Him, who had not sent us a warfare at our own cost, but graciously sup-plied every lack. They were afterwards re-com-mended by S. G., and myself, to be not only hearers, but doers of the law, and, like Mary, to ponder the sayings they had heard in their hearts, keeping up the watch.

"I had previously mentioned to our company a view of having the younger and unmarried people assembled; and at the close of this meet-ing it was proposed to have them convened at four o'clock in the afternoon. At two, we sat with nine persons who came from a dis-tance, to satisfaction; and at the time appointed met our young friends, who made a considera-ble appearance as to numbers. The fore part of this sitting was heavy, but life gradually arose, and sweet liberty ensued: our belief be-ing confirmed that there is, among this class, though in an unfavorable soil, a seed sown, which, through individual faithfulness, would spread and become fruitful, to the praise of the great Husbandman. These were honestly can-tioned against what might retard their growth, and earnest prayer was offered on their behalf. Some of us feeling desirous of having a meeting with the inhabitants of this place, the subject was solidly considered among ourselves, and notwithstanding apparent difficulties, we agreed to attempt it.

"By the laws of the land no public meeting is allowed to any but the Catholics, Protestants meeting even here in the fields or private houses, and the dear people we are visiting sit in their assemblies with the outside door locked; and believing they had not yet attained sufficient strength to be exposed to much suffering, we have feared putting them out of their usual way; the proposal, however, of giving liberty to any of the neighbors who might incline to accept the invitation, was readily acceded to by them. At ten o'clock on the morning of the tenth, a considerable number of Protestants, and some Roman Catholics, assembled; they behaved with great quietness, and the meeting was mercifully owned by a feeling of liberty to labor, and a sense of that love which is univer-sal, and would gather all under its blessed in-fluence.

"11th. We rose early, and after breakfast most of those we had visited in the village col-lecting in our apartment, a solemnity covered us, under which the same love which had at-tracted us to them flowed in a strong current, and the language of the apostle was revived, 'Finally, brethren, farewell! be of one mind, live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you.' We parted with many tears on both sides, from these endeared people, for whom we had, in our different measures, travailed that Christ might be formed in them, and they be not only the visited, but redeemed of the Lord. L. Majolier and F. Benezet ac-companied us to a town called St. Gilles, where we lodged at a comfortable house belonging to one of our Friends, and on the 12th had a meet-ing with such as resided in the place; next day I became alarmingly ill, and was not able to join my companions in sitting with some who came from the country.

"15th. Though still much indisposed I was not easy to stay from meeting; therefore arose, and was made renewedly sensible, that when the creature is so reduced, as to know indeed that it can do nothing, He who is strength in weakness shows himself strong. I was helped to discharge myself honestly, to my own peace, and the meeting concluded in awful prayer and praise.

"16th. We left St. Gilles, and spent that night at Nîmes; here we experienced fresh conflict with respect to the way of proceeding; next day, however, our difficulties seemed to lessen, and the prospect of going to Alençon opened with clearness. We had a solemn part-ing with dear L. M., who felt very near to us, and to whom the language 'Be thou steadfast, immovable,' &c., was addressed in the fresh flowing of Gospel love.

"We travelled from Nîmes in a tedious manner, drawn by mules at the rate of about thirty miles a day, rising early, and late taking rest. The country abounds with vineyards, olive-yards, fig and mulberry trees; pomegranates growing in the hedges like our white thorn, and the air in some places rendered fragrant by aromatic herbs, springing up spontaneously in rocky ground. There is but little pasture land in these parts; a rudeness in appearance, with the want of neat fences, &c., renders the country less beautiful than ours: the houses are dirty, and the people slovenly; they seem chiefly employed in making wine and raising silk-worms, which give them profitable produce. There was neither a cow nor a milch goat in the village of Congenies.

"We got to Lyons fatigued and poorly on the 21st: here I was again very ill, and mostly in bed, till Second-day afternoon, when we set out in three voitures, and proceeded agreeably through a beautiful fertile country, richly improved, fine pasture and corn fields, and walnut trees frequently bounding each side of the road for miles together.

"We arrived at Paris on the evening of the 29th, and left it again the 2nd of the Seventh month, travelling post to Alençon; here our friend J. M. met us, and we went in his coach to Desvignes, his place of residence, about a league distant; we were kindly received by his wife, and being weak and weary, found this resting place comfortable.

"6th. A solemn sitting with J. M., his wife and little son, was graciously owned by Divine regard, and sympathy renewedly felt with the hidden seed in a state of proving, as in the winter. In a little conference among ourselves, afterwards, G. D. avowed his prospect of going to Guernsey; the idea of parting felt trying, but the belief that it is individual faithfulness which constitutes Christian harmony, tended to produce resignation.

"8th. With a savor of good, covering all our minds, we took leave of this family; and at Alençon under somewhat of solemn sadness, parted with our endeared companions, G. and S. D.; J. M. going with them to Guernsey, and the remainder of our little band proceeding towards Dieppe, where we arrived the afternoon of the 10th. We were called up at four o'clock next morning, got on board the Princess Royal packet about six, and through the extension of continued goodness, were favored with a fine, though rather a tedious passage of twenty-three hours, landing at Brighthelmston on Seventh-day morning. We went on that afternoon to East Grinstead, and thence twenty miles, on First-day morning, to Croydon; attended meeting there, and reached London to tea. In this great city our five-fold cord untwisted, R. and S. G. going to R. Chester's, A. B. to his own house, and J. E. and I to Bartholomew-close; where the company of dear M. E. and her children was a real consolation to my poor mind, feeling this hospitable mansion as a second home.

"14th. Attended the Quarterly Meeting for London and Middlesex, which was large and favored. We feel, I trust, humbly thankful at being once more indulged with seeing many near and dear friends, whose affectionate reception of us, seems a cordial to our spirits, after our various exercises. We attended many different meetings in the city, and on the 21st returned to the Morning Meeting the certificates received therefrom, and gave a little account of our movements in this arduous service, of which a record was made on their books.

"29th. Left London and got to Brentford to tea, where at the peaceful dwelling of our valuable friend T. Finch, we spent a pleasant, and, I trust, profitable evening. We attended meetings at Uxbridge and Amersham, on Fourth and Fifth-days, and on the evening of the latter had one at High Wycomb, which was large, and I think satisfactory. Some private opportunities in this place were graciously owned by heavenly regard: how do the preservation and the growth of the dear young people among us, excite earnest solicitude and breathing of spirit.

"Eighth Month 2nd. We reached Burford this forenoon, and went to the house of our friend Thomas Huntley, with whose scholars, sixty in number, we had a season of retirement, which was mercifully favored by the overshadowing of good. We proceeded to Cirencester, and remained over their forenoon meeting on First-day, which was deeply exercising to our minds, the pure life feeling in a state of imprisonment: but in a little sitting after dinner, at a Friend's house, where several were present, we felt some hope that this short tarryance might not prove altogether in vain. Having had a prospect of that little stripped spot, Painswick, we felt easy to leave Cirencester afternoon meeting, and go thither to one appointed for seven o'clock in the evening. A large number of Methodists and others attended, and I trust no harm was done to the precious cause. We were affectionately entertained at the house of our friend Davis. Next day we called on the few families of Friends residing there, and after several seasons of liberty and favor, went on Second-day afternoon from thence to Gloucester.

"4th. This morning we breakfasted with the only Friends residing here, and in a time of quiet afterwards, were enabled to discharge our minds towards the family. We proceeded to Monmouth, and thence to Pontypool, where we had an appointed meeting on Fifth-day."

My dear mother's account ends here, but there is reason to believe that she and her companions attended meetings at Swausea and Haverfordwest in their way to Milford, whence they sailed to Waterford, and she was favored to reach her own habitation in safety about the middle of the Eighth month, worn indeed in body, but with a relieved and thankful mind; and in alluding to her late engagement, she writes as follows:

"Under various deep exercises during this journey, the language 'Wherefore didst thou doubt?' has been so legibly inscribed on my heart, that I often think none has greater cause to depend on the Arm of everlasting help than I have; and the confirming evidence of a peace passing every enjoyment, has been as a stay in the midst of conflict, an anchor in times of storm; nor do I ever remember feeling a more abiding sense of this heavenly treasure, than during my residence with that dear little flock at Congenies, towards whom the current of Gospel love still sweetly flows."

(To be continued.)

"JESUS CHRIST, THE SAME YESTERDAY, TODAY, AND FOREVER.—Chancellor McDowell, of the University of Denver, informs us that a young man of that city, troubled with doubts as to the divinity of Christ, visited his pastor. One of the things that troubled him was the number of distinguished men who disbelieved in it. The pastor replied that an equal number of distinguished men in all spheres not only believed in it, but derived their inspiration in life and their hope in death from it, and concluded what he had to say by this question: "If Mr. Gladstone were to affirm his belief in Christ's divinity, what would you think?" "I should accept it," was the reply.

The pastor sent a note to Gladstone, and, as he was, he wrote the following letter to the Pastor of the First Baptist Church of Denver, which Chancellor McDowell writes us he has seen, and that it is written in Gladstone's own hand:

"All I write, and all I think, and all I hope is based upon the divinity of our Lord, the central hope of our poor, wayward race."

Address to Parents.

[A Friend suggests the publication in THE FRIEND of some advice to parents on the right education of their children, authorized by the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia, 1878. From it the following paragraphs are taken.—ED.]

The innocence and feebleness of an infant seem naturally to repel the thought of the possibility of evil, and there is so much in the first unfoldings of intelligence and affection that is pure and lovely, that parents are tempted to forget that there is any need of watchfulness. If they have kept their covenant with their God, He will not be unmindful of them, and will make them quick of understanding in his efforts to perceive otherwise unseen dangers. Dear friends, it is our great privilege to have been brought up in the belief of this immediate Divine guidance in the every-day walk of life; and blessed are they who put their trust in it; for the dealing in heavenly wisdom from the first appearance of evil in children may be of inestimable consequence to the future life. Knowledge of good and evil, and of the duty of obedience to parents, is often evidenced very early, long before there is any power of expression in words.

When they are able to talk, while requiring deference to the presence of older persons, and us, with ready and hearty sympathy, listen to their little recitals, guarding them against exaggeration in statement or in expression of feeling, or any other approach to untruthfulness. Let us teach them by precept, by example, and by shaping their duties in life for them, that denial, and not self-indulgence, is the appointed way to happiness. Let us be watchful over ourselves, that we do not, by our injudicious fondness or careless talking, sow the seeds of vanity, selfishness, or insincerity in their susceptible hearts.

Let us treat them with confidence, intrust them with responsibility suited to their years, and encourage them by appreciation of their efforts to do right; and let us not unnecessarily disturb the peaceful flow of what should be their happy lives, nor vex their spirits with unjudicious requirements, nor in any way provoke them to anger, or betray them into disobedience; for disobedience from any cause, and however slight or qualified in form, should always receive adequate correction. Permitted disobedience is followed by disrespect, and they together eat into the very heart of affection. There is a natural affection of parents which fosters selfishness in their children, and neglect of filial duty; and there is a natural affection of children which is not founded in respect accompanied by obedience; and either of them will prove but as a reed which will pierce the parent's hand that leans upon it.

And above all, let us seek to walk so closely with our God, that when they come to us with their questions about heavenly things, we may not have to call our spirits back, as it were, to the ends of the earth, and give a cold, unsatisfying answer to what may have been a craving for spiritual bread.

As no man can see the kingdom of heaven unless he realize that change of heart which our blessed Redeemer describes as being born of the Spirit; and as man in his natural state cannot comprehend the things of the Spirit of God, because they are foolishness unto him, it is evident that the very foundation of all true wisdom and happiness, both in parents and children must consist in a teachable submission to the grace of God that brings salvation through Him who died that we might live; and which inspires new desires, principles, and affections in those who receive with meekness the engrafted word which is able to save the soul. The parents who have thus realized a new heart and spirit to be given them are prepared, by a living experience, to commend their children to the word of that grace in their own hearts which convinces them of sin, causes them to feel their need of a Saviour, and will lead them to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world; and such a training in the school of Christ is felt to be the true qualification for the solemn duties of the parental office.

How many of us have had to feel, to our deep sorrow and condemnation, our inability to help our children on their heavenly way, because of our own unfaithfulness! Dear friends, it is good for us to feel it deeply; and we must dwell under the condemnation till it brings us back to the Father's house, where there is bread enough and to spare for us and our children. Our love for them is often a means of heavenly discipline to ourselves, in calling us home from our wanderings, for their sakes.

When we come to give an account of our stewardship, we cannot credit ourselves with having done our duty in the religious education of our children, because we have found some one to do it for us; nor will our want of qualification cancel the charge that will stand against us; nor can we claim that there has been deficiency on our Lord's part; for "if any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." If we are found "watching daily at wisdom's gates," our children, as well as ourselves, will partake of the promised blessing; and we will be quick to bear, and ready to follow, every Divine prompting for their spiritual good. Feeling our own helplessness to do them any good of ourselves, we will carry them oftener than the returning day, on our hearts, before the Throne of Grace, committing them to the Lord's keeping, and desiring to be made helpful to them under his hand.

If earthly mindedness, in its more refined or more sordid forms, has place in the hearts of parents, children will be quick to catch the same spirit. And when such parents come to desire better things for their children than they have for themselves, and endeavor to turn them from temptations or evil ways, they have but little influence with them, except by appealing to secondary or unworthy motives. But when children see that their parents walk humbly with their Creator, daily asking and receiving counsel of Him, there is a sense of delegated Divine authority accompanying their admonitions and injunctions which is seldom disregarded.

The faithful members of our Society, from generation to generation, have learned to wait, in the silence of their own reasonings, for the inshining of the light of Christ, who is their Saviour and Teacher; and in it they have seen and embraced the same spiritual views of worship, and of holiness of life, that its first founders held. They have been brought to see, as they did, that the rule of fashion and customs founded on the spirit of the world is wholly incompatible with the life which our Saviour's precepts call for; that it thwarts his gracious designs for the well-being of man, and opposes the spread of his kingdom in their hearts, and that therefore it is highly offensive in his sight.

We have consequently been called to withstand it for our safety, and to bear a testimony against it for the good of others. To do this, and to keep out of the way of the many pleasures and pursuits which tend to rob us of our true peace, requires of us a degree of non-conformity with the world, which it calls narrow-minded and inconsistent with our duty to our fellow-men. But that cannot be narrow-minded which is founded on eternal truth; and that must be the broadest view which He has given us to see, who is God of earth as well of heaven, who designs the good of all, and in his infinite wisdom knows how most efficiently to employ his instrumental means.

As we find need of watchfulness for our own preservation, so also is it necessary to guard our children from temptation to things which tend to alienate them from the Truth. Let us not be induced to think that, as they must one day bear their part in the world, exposure to it in their youth will give them knowledge of its evils and strength to withstand them. The more youth sees of what is good, true, and pure, the more repulsive to them is that which is false and impure. Weak human nature lies open to the influence of much of the evil of the world, because its deceptive presentations are outwardly beautiful, and clothed with refined associations; while on the other hand, familiarity with uncloaked vice deadens the sensibility, and at last destroys the perception of its hideousness.

Fearful will be the responsibility incurred by any of us, if by lack of sympathy, or any act of ours, we discourage or prevent our offspring from submission to the tender convictions with which they may be favored, in relation to bearing their testimony against the vain fashions and customs of the world.

And we must not forget that the good effect of our watchfulness against harmful association from without may be greatly weakened, or entirely undone, if we are not careful that our children are guarded against hurtful influences from persons of impure morals or irreligious character in our households, or workshops, and on our farms, as well as elsewhere.

Though we have to make the humiliating acknowledgment, that children less favored than those of our Society are sometimes examples to them of correctness and purity of conduct, these exceptions should not turn us aside from the general truth, that our home training makes our children, as regards morals, as well as for other considerations, the safest companions for one another. The more careful exclusion from demoralizing amusements and worldly ways which prevails among us than exists in general society, is a reason for placing them almost universally in association with and under the care of our own members, in order to keep them from temptation and unsettling example; and in so doing, we save them from a conflict of feeling arising from comparison with others, which we may well desire they should be spared.

Personal Prohibition.

We are told that High License will not stop the evil of liquor-selling and liquor-drinking; that prohibition does not prohibit; that Local Option is a failure, and that human ingenuity is not equal to the task of keeping men from stimulants so long as there are stimulants in the land. Grant all this for the time being, and still I have a panacea, and yet I have a remedy, a power which, when put into general operation, will drive this evil from the land, its every commonwealth, every county, every community! And it is a simple remedy, requiring neither use of money nor legislative interference, the passage of no new law, the repeal of no old one, the treading upon no man's personal liberty, the taking from no man's life a single pleasure worth the having.

Here it is, written in plain English, and not, as doctor's prescriptions so often are, in foreign language, so that even those who run may read, and the busiest of men can at a glance grasp and understand: Let all who call themselves Christians, let all who, though not Christians, are known as moderate drinkers, simply determine to stop, stop at once, stop altogether, enforce at least personal prohibition, and, my word for it, saloons will all close, and the sale of liquor become a thing of the past.

Why do I say so? Men who get drunk are generally poor, many of them very poor, and together, should they pool their stocks, bonds, lands, and ready cash, they would not be able to support the liquor-selling business. Let the liquor-selling business, then, cease to be a paying business,—that is, draw from its support the money of Christian drinkers, of moderate drinkers, whether Christian or not,—and, my word for it, men will not be found willing to sell it; and when there are none to sell, none can buy, and the result is that none will be foolish enough to make it.

Keep the wine from your mouths, ye moderate drinkers; banish it from your Christian homes; erase it from the bills of fare on state occasions; let it not enter into inaugural or centennial ceremonies, and the whisky-seller, waiting only on the drunken and the dissolute, will soon hear his own children crying for bread, and you will see him running from the bottle business as rats do from burning buildings and sailors from sinking ships. You, my friends, who take any wine anywhere, at any time, under any conditions (save when health and life are involved), in any place, can contribute to such a reformation, this most desirable of all revolutions. And will you not? Can you quit? Did you ever try to quit? Believe me, if you do try and find it hard to quit, that it costs a struggle to quit, you are in danger,—the chains are forging about you, and let me beg that here and now you will call upon Omnipotent Strength to come to your rescue ere destruction claims you as its son.

If it were to cost you a struggle to quit, do you not know some one man in your circle of acquaintances—it may be of friends, it may be of dearly loved ones—to save whom you would quit? And does not your neighbor know another, and his neighbor still another? Let each single out his imperiled one, and what's the result? A community of rescued ones! A commonwealth of saved ones! A country of rescued ones! The world saved from the untold evils of strong drink! Moderate drinkers, you can do it. God give you grace to?—R. B. Berkeley, in the S. S. Times.

PLANNED.

I was sitting with my knitting
At the close of day,
Watching bonnie little Bessie
Busy at her play.

Presently she came beside me;
"Look, dear auntie, please;
Let me put these seven letters
Here upon your knees.

"And," she begged, "please fix them quickly
So they'll make a word—
Just the very plainest, easiest
One you ever heard!"

So I laid aside my knitting
For my little Bess,
And, to please her, did my utmost
Her one word to guess.

E N P, A D, and L N—
There the letters lay.
First I turned and then I twisted
Them in every way.

Not a word could I discover,
Not a ray of light.
"Give it up!" said I; "now tell me—I'll not guess all night."

"Why?" said Bess, "how funny! Auntie,
Don't you really see?
Why, the word's just staring at me,
Plain as plain can be!"

* * * * *

In a trice the seven letters
By her little hand
Deftly then were readjusted;
There the word was—"Planned."

In the twilight, by the firelight,
Long I sat and thought
How my life with joy and sorrow
Strangely had been fraught.

As I wondered what the mystery,
What the need of pain,
I recalled how Bessie's puzzle
Seemed to her so plain.

"And," I thought, "my life so checkered
Likewise may appear,
In the eyes of Him who planned it,
With a meaning clear.

"Then I'll leave my dreaded future
In the Master's hand,
Knowing that to all life's problems
There's the keyword, 'Planned.'"

SPEAK GENTLY.

Speak gently! it is better far
To rule by love than fear;
Speak gently! let no harsh words mar
The good we might do here.

Speak gently! Love doth whisper low
The vows that true hearts bind;
And gently friendship's accents flow;
Affection's voice is kind.

Speak gently to the little child;
Its love be sure to gain;
Teach it in accents soft and mild—
It may not long remain.

Speak gently to the young, for they
Will have enough to bear—
Pass through this life as best they may,
'Tis full of anxious care.

Speak gently to the aged one;
Grieve not the care-worn heart;
The sands of life are nearly run;
Let such in peace depart.

Speak gently, kindly, to the poor;
Let no harsh tone be heard;
They have enough they must endure,
Without an unkind word.

Speak gently to the erring—know
How frail are all! how vain!
Perchance unkindness made them so;
Oh! win them back again.

Speak gently! He who gave his life
To bend man's stubborn will,
When elements were fierce with strife,
Said to them, "Peace—be still!"

Speak gently! 'tis a little thing
Dropt'd in the heart's deep well;
The good, the joy that it may bring,
Eternity shall tell.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Extracts from the Diary of Louis Taber.

Tenth Month 27th, 1837.—I am now at home, but still unable to do anything except a very little light work, and can neither read nor study much without injury. It is hard for one accustomed to both mental and physical employment to have to be idle. The afflictions of this life are overpaid by that eternal weight of glory which awaits the righteous. A consoling assurance is sometimes felt that all will work together for good. What are the few moments of this life in comparison with an eternity where it may be that the forms of beauty, the glories of Heaven and the Divine manifestations, as far transcend any earthly creation; as created intelligences are less than uncreated perfection. Oh might we be so girded and strengthened that when we are called to another state of existence it may be

"Even as the cheerful traveller who goes
A pleasant journey to a better land."

Eleventh Month 2nd.—We have had a favored Quarterly Meeting, and to-day—the second day of the meeting—Uncle Joseph Hoag was much favored.

Aunt Huldah also had considerable to offer. After Uncle J.'s testimony a sweet covering was over the meeting. My heart was much tendered, and the following passage was forcibly impressed upon my mind, "And when he had opened the seventh seal, there was silence in Heaven about the space of half an hour."

Fourth Month 5th, 1838.—Not having in some time written anything in my diary, I shall write from memory. Soon after Quarterly Meeting in the fall, it was proposed that a school should be opened in our house, to be taught by a cousin and particular friend of mine (Zeno Taber, who had recently returned from the West), and that I should assist so far as my health would admit. Arrangements were made accordingly, and a school opened. With our own family, we had 18 scholars, young men and young women, and a very pleasant school. I was able to assist in the arrangements, to construct some apparatus, and lecture once a week. Our time passed very agreeably to all, and particularly as to myself. The school closed some time since, and we parted with feelings of friendship and regret. My cousin has left, and I feel sometimes lonesome. I was much fatigued at the close of the school, and my health has not been quite as good a few weeks past. I have, the past winter, thought much of the situation and sufferings of the poor blacks, and have hoped that Friends especially might be encouraged faithfully to labor for their liberation from cruel and hopeless bondage. The subject of education being under consideration in our Quarterly Meeting in the winter, I was very much affected with a view of the state of our Society and particularly the younger portion of it, and I wish something more may be done. I have written an address to the young men of our Society, and sent it for publication in THE FRIEND, but do not know that it will be thought worth publishing.

The situation of our Monthly Meeting has sometimes lain with considerable weight upon my mind, and I have felt strength to give my sentiments in meetings for business, some who had been favored instruments having so far departed as to trample on the order of Society. I have recently had some very severe trials, so much so as to affect my health, but the cause has been unknown to my friends. My desires are to be resigned, but so strong are our wills, and so blind are we to our greatest good that it is hard to say in the sincerity of our hearts, "Thy will be done."

I am now in hopes to be able to attend both New York and New England Yearly Meetings, and to visit the Boarding School; lest I should be disappointed, dare only hope. It is a year since I was taken ill, and I have passed through considerable suffering both of body and mind; but if I am chosen in the furnace of affliction, may I be willing to abide patiently the day of trial.

I believe I do not forget to number my blessings and the sensible presence of the Good Master is often the greatest of them all. My future prospects are at last all closed, but whatever may be the issue of my sickness, it is still my desire so to live.

That when my summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan that moves
To the pale realms of shade, where each must take
His chamber in the silent halls of death;
I go not like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach my grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Fifth Month 18th.—My brother Silas left this morning for Ohio. It has been a great pleasure to me to have his company, and his parting with us forcibly revived the circumstances of my illness, which was the principal cause of my being at home and of his being there also. We were all at home last evening, and probably for the last time we all ate together at the same table.

Sixth Month 27th, Providence, R. I.—My health continues to improve, and I feel thankful that I am able to be again for a little time at the School, a privilege I have sometimes thought I should not very soon, if ever, enjoy. But how changed are its inmates! Few of my former friends and acquaintances are here. How truly are we sojourners and pilgrims upon earth, and therefore ought we to seek another city, that is, a heavenly.

Many disadvantages must I think, result from frequent changes of teachers. Yesterday, a cousin, whom I was very glad to see—Embree E. Hoag, from Peru, N. Y.—met me here. Previous to my leaving home my mind was much occupied with the unhappy situation of the Cherokee Indians, as also of the whole Indian race. I remember our obligations to them for their kindness to our ancestors and deplored the injustice of our government towards these red brethren of the wilderness. Where are the Woolmans and the Benezets among us? In company with my father and mother I attended New York Yearly Meeting, which was large and very interesting.

Much counsel and encouragement were given to the young men, of whom many were present. Very great sympathy was felt for the Indian in his suffering, which was gladdening to see, but can it be that the poor slave is too much forgotten? A proposition came from one of the Quarters requesting the attention of Friends in relation to the subject of slave labor produce, which elicited some expression of feeling. How long must our hands be stained with the blood of the innocent? A number of ministers, including Joseph John Gurney, from England, were present; the last mentioned had a meeting in the Tabernacle, and it is thought more than 7000 people were in attendance. I was also at New England Yearly Meeting, which was equally interesting, and attended by a number of Friends from other Yearly Meetings. Richard Mott had much to say at the meeting on First-day and at other times, particularly to the young. Do we not too easily forget the blessings showered upon us so abundantly by a beneficent Father? Considerable sympathy was felt for the Indian and for the slave, but Friends could not act upon the subject of emancipation: and how can they do so efficiently so long as they themselves are so deeply concerned in trade with the slaveholders? If we really remembered "them that are in bonds as bound with them," we should find we had a work to accomplish. But it is written and it will be verified "Ethiopia shall yet stretch forth her hands unto God." It does not yet seem right for me to attempt any business, and I can only continue patiently to wait and quietly to hope. Whomsoever the Lord loveth He chasteneth and it should be sufficient for me if I can be assured that unworthy as I am, I am still loved of my Heavenly Father.

Tenth Month 7th.—I remained several weeks at Providence visiting my friends, and my health not much improving, concluded to return home, which I did by the way of New York in company with Hannah Battey, who was returning from a religious visit to New England Yearly Meeting. In the Ninth Month in company with my sister I visited my connections in Lower Canada. While at Montreal I had an opportunity of observing priests, nuns and nunneries. The splendid buildings and religious ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church forcibly reminded me of the persecutions and sufferings borne by our fathers, in consequence of their testimonies against these outward rites, and to the spirituality of the Christian dispensation. When will our country and the world be delivered from the dominion of the beast? The ceremonies of the Church of England seemed but one remove from those of the Catholic order. But it is little better to be dead without forms than with forms. The true life of a Christian must be a spiritual one, and never have I felt more the necessity of an increased portion of it than at the present time. Surrounded by many discouragements, making little or no progress in the path of holiness, I dare not hope that I am among the truly poor in spirit upon whom was pronounced the blessing that they should inherit the kingdom of God. How much have I been wanting in true prayer! Our last Monthly Meeting was attended by Joseph John Gurney, also by Moses Beede and other ministering Friends from our own quarter. It was a very large meeting. Although my health is such that I shall be obliged to have an assistant, I think of opening another school at my father's in the winter now approaching.

FEES AND TEMPLE TAXES.—The half-shekel, which was one of the three classes of offerings received for the repairs of the temple (the other two being the gifts in performance of vows made to the Lord's answers to prayer, or such vows as the Nazarite's; and, secondly, absolute free-will gifts,) was called the half-shekel of the sanctuary, the shekel being twenty gerahs (Exod. xxx: 13,) a little less than three shillings English, or three-quarters of a dollar. These shekels were not currency or coined money, but pieces of silver,—perhaps stamped, but of no legal authority. These, as we read, were in every transaction weighed; and the shekel originally was a weight, not a coin. The same method is still in use in Africa. The writer has in his possession numerous shapeless pieces of silver which he received as money in the Sahara, all stamped with various devices, but always weighed in any business transaction, and all weighing exactly a Spanish dollar. Standard weights appear to have been kept in the temple.

A Goose with Two Heads.

One day, about three thousand years ago, in a famous town of Upper Egypt, a workman was cutting a granite image of the great Pharaoh Rameses II. seated on his throne. And that it should never be forgotten whose image this was, the order had been given that on the back and sides of the throne should be engraved the name and titles of the king,—“Ruler of Egypt,” “The Crowned Horos,” “The Mighty Bull, Son of Ptah,” and “The Son of Ra, Beloved of Amon and Ra.”

Now the Egyptians, when they wrote, used signs and pictures instead of letters, and one such sign was a goose, standing with its head to the right. But perhaps the sun was hot, or the workman rather careless: for when the inscription was all cut, the workman noticed for the first time that the head of the goose was pointing to the left. While he was thinking of something else, he had cut it wrong, and the statue was spoiled.

The cutter was in despair. “Alas!” said he, “I shall certainly be whipped when this is found out. The statue is ruined.”

But then a sudden thought struck him. The image was to be covered with paint, and it might be possible to hide the mistake. So he went to work again on the goose, cutting a new head, pointing this time to the right, and a new tail, pointing to the left. The goose now had two heads and two tails. But the workman took some plaster, and neatly filled in the first head and tail. Then he covered the whole statue with red paint, and the thing was done.

“There,” said he, “the old goose looks well enough,—and who will ever be the wiser?”

So the image was set up, with many others, in the great temple of Har-shefi, and was much admired. People came for miles to see and admire it, and they wore a smooth hollow in front of it, and finally, after many years, the temple was destroyed, and the image thrown down, to be covered up deep with the sand of the desert.

But two years ago, an exploring party, digging at this place, found the statue, and sent it to America, where it was set up in the museum of the University of Pennsylvania. While the attendants were cleaning the dirt from it, the plaster which the Egyptian workman had used to hide his fault, fell off,—and there was the goose again, with its two heads and its two tails! Thirty centuries had rolled away, and the statue had travelled five-thousand miles, but in the end the trick had been found out.

Perhaps that Egyptian stonecutter had never heard the saying, “Be sure your sin will find you out,” but when I saw that goose, a few months ago, it seemed to me to be pointing out an excellent lesson for those of us who say, sometimes, “Oh, pshaw! it doesn't matter.” Edward Munford, in the S. S. Times.

George Fox's Journal.

Through the kindness of our friend Daniel Pickard, we have received a copy of a new edition of the Journal of George Fox, a neatly printed work in two volumes. Copies of it are for sale at Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia.

Instead of preparing a review of the book, we copy from a notice of it by J. W. Graham in The British Friend, the following passages:

“The Society is to be congratulated on having once more in print an edition of this monumental work, its grand primary classic. He who reads with the spirit and the understanding also the first two chapters of the Journal, has laid open before him the original fountains of the Quaker faith, in the typical religious experience of the first Friend.”

“Not many of the sons of men have, in action and in thought, in suffering and in triumph, dared and done any considerable fraction of George Fox's day's work, nor done it with his single-minded purity of motive. “Tough as a tree and pure as a bell,” was the verdict at last wrung from the mocking soldiers at Scarborough Castle, on the man upon whose prison bed the rain had beaten through the roof, and the sea wind through the cracks; this, added to the choking smoke within, had destroyed his health, and swollen his fingers to double their size—he all the time being denied the precious society of his friends, but exposed often to the gaze of vulgar sight-seers. But whoso would form any idea of the sufferings undergone as year followed year, must read the Journal itself.

“His activity was as varied as it was ceaseless. We find him rebuking the wreckers at the Land's End, preaching against cozening and cheating through Lancaster market, against highmindedness and covetousness to the new Puritan Notables: to Indians he advocated monogamy, and common honesty to negroes. He tells of pulling in a man's neck by main force after an accident considered fatal; next of facing contentious spirits in the newly settled meetings, and subduing the dangerous influences “by the Lord's power;” then of sleeping in wet clothes all night in Virginian forests. He was ever ready any day to confound informers, to face a court of law, and conduct his own case with a combination of acuteness and unflinching principle. “How chauce ye do not imprison the book which forbids to swear?” he asked the court at Lancaster, while imprisoning him for refusing an oath. When broken down in health, he would return to Swarthmore to recover, and in convalescence occupy himself with a continuous output of epistles—letters of thunder or of consolation as the case required.

“For more than forty years, too, he was in the continued exercise of that most taxing gift, a powerful Quaker ministry. His would seem to have been of an intense and energetic kind, for he occasionally mentions that he had just come hot and perspiring out of meeting. Of its character we learn something from William Penn's Preface to the Journal:—

“As abruptly and brokenly as sometimes his sentences would fall from him about Divine things, it is well-known they were often as texts to many fairer declarations. * * As to man, he was an original, being no man's copy. And his ministry and writings show they are from one that was not taught of man, nor had learned what he said by study. Nor were they notional or speculative, but sensible and practical truths.

* * He had an extraordinary gift in opening the Scriptures. He would go to the marrow of things. * * But above all he excelled in prayer. The inwardness and weight of his spirit, the reverence and solemnity of his address and behavior, and the fewness and fullness of his words, have often struck even strangers with admiration, as they used to reach others with consolation. The most awful, living, reverent frame I ever felt or beheld, I must say, was his in prayer.

"His personal presence would seem to have been strangely powerful.

"God had visibly clothed him with a Divine preference and authority, and indeed his very presence expressed a religious majesty," says Wm. Penn. In Kendal, one market day, "the people flew like chaff before me into their houses." Under his preaching once, the priest fled, saying that the church shook.

"When his ship was pursued by a Sallee pirates, the captain and officers, thinking that the case of the Apostle Paul was a suitable precedent, turned to their benignant Quaker passenger for prophetic advice, acted upon it, and had a somewhat mysterious escape.

"Whenever danger threatened, George was at the forefront. When the Conventicle Act was renewed:—

"I went to Grace-church St. when I thought the storm was likely to begin." Again:—"Now were great threatenings given forth in Cumberland, that if ever I came there again, they would take away my life. When I heard it I was drawn to go into Cumberland."

"When the mob near London had maltreated eighty Friends by throwing them into ditches and daubing them with mud, George Fox was moved to go thither, and preached to them, standing on a table in the middle of a field.

"That all this strength was accompanied by remarkable sweetness and tenderness is clear from the atmosphere of loving regard in which he continually moved. It is always "Dear G. F. is coming." The early Friends exhausted upon him their vocabulary of affection. When Welsbmen stole his horse's oats, he comments:—

"A wicked thievish people, to rob the poor dumb creature of his food. I would rather they had robbed me." He was "neither touchy nor critical,"—says William Penn,—a most merciful man, as ready to forgive, as unapt to take or give an offence. Thousands can truly say, he was of an excellent spirit and savour among them, and because thereof, the most excellent spirits loved him with an unfeigned and unfading love."

"The two clearly printed and comfortable volumes are sold for five shillings by help of a bequest, being worth three times that sum in the ordinary bookselling market. The accuracy and completeness of the Leeds Edition by Wilson Armistead, has been scrupulously maintained by Daniel Pickard, the present editor. Every book lover will be grateful for the forty pages of indexes at the end. First comes a chronological and most eloquent list of the places visited by the author, a sort of Ariadne clue to every journey of his wandering life,—then a list of texts of Scripture quoted, with volume and page—then an alphabetical index of proper names—next a long and most useful index of subjects, in which one can turn up a heading such as 'Scriptures' and find at once a summary with references of George Fox's teaching on that subject. Last of all we have a Bibliography. These helps are especially necessary in a book so long and so miscellaneous as the Journal. The full and frequent biographical notes at the foot of the page make this a truly scholarly edition. We cannot but honor an editor who so honors his classic."

For "THE FRIEND."

Habits of Animals.

On the 18th of Eleventh Month, I paid a visit in Chester County, Pa., being met at Downingtown by a kind friend, who conveyed me to his hospitable abode. Wandering about the premises was a flock of pure white turkeys, numbering between forty and fifty. My host said that he had raised white turkeys for several years; his preference for that color being that they were so readily watched, when wandering over the farm. It was a pleasant morning, with a south-eastern breeze blowing—but the observant farmer was suspicious of the weather, for he had noticed the previous afternoon that his turkeys were very quarrelsome, and were continually getting into little fights with each other. This nervous, excitable condition of the flock was a forerunner of rains. It is a trait shown by many animals—even man himself. Cowper speaks of the unwholesome east wind and it is a well-known fact that persons affected with rheumatism, often have premonitory pains before a storm. Why it should be so is not a very clearly ascertained point. But these changes in the weather are accompanied with changes in the pressure of the atmosphere, in the temperature, degree of moisture, and the electrical condition of the air. All of these act on the physical system, and produce effects more powerful in some animals than others. A recent writer on natural history says:

"That searches every bone of the infirm,"

"Many animals are so susceptible to atmospheric influences that they are sometimes supposed to be gifted with a sort of prescience of coming weather changes—such as rain, wind, cold, heat or thunder. They are popularly regarded as a kind of weather-prophets, forecasters or prognosticators, superior in some cases, it is averred, to the barometer itself. Among sensitive animals of this kind are to be mentioned the common crow; robin, of England and Canada; the porcupine, South American cattle, dolphins and spiders; the swallow, duck, common fowls and other birds, &c. The prairie-dog, Gilmore assures us, is superior to a barometer."

A recent traveller in Buenos Ayres and Chili states that the cattle there are sensible of the approach of rain. In the course of his progress from Buenos Ayres to Mendoza, he had observed this quality. They had long been without water, and he had sent the negroes to look out for a spring, when the cattle began to stretch out their necks and raise their heads towards the west. At that moment not a cloud or breath of air was to be seen or felt; but in a few minutes the cattle began to move about as if mad, sniffing the air with most violent eagerness, and gathering closer and closer to each other; and before we could form any rational conjecture as to what could occasion their simultaneous motion, the most tremendous storm came on of thunder and lightning, and the rain fell in streams.

Charles Darwin states that the jaguar, of South America, is especially in the habit of roaring before bad weather.

My observant host gave me another item of natural history which was interesting. Near his home was a small stream, whose banks furnish a home for numerous musk-rats. These animals are fond of a species of water-grass which grows along the margin of a stream, and he had noticed that after digging up a bunch of this they took it into the water and washed it before eating it. Letter of Samuel Neale.

SPRING MOUNT, 14th of First Month, 1777.

DEAR FRIEND:—Our call is high and holy, the day calls for diligence, the supineness of professors in their own individuals in the general, makes it more absolutely necessary to cleave to that which multiplies our strength: we have few examples of dedication and devotion, too, too many minding their own, and not the things of Jesus Christ; and is not this obvious in those even in the station of ministers and elders, who have received gifts, have known the day-spring from on high, have felt the arising of the nether springs, and have been made to rejoice as in the time of harvest? It obstructs the pure running of the celestial stream of unity in our general meetings, and prevents the dominion of that life that in former days was as a diadem of beauty and a crown of glory. Thou hints to me, "Some of you have been honored with gifts which ye are called to exercise to the edification of others, I envy you not the honor, though I think it is great." Why was it not "us" instead of "ye?" Dost thou disclaim the favor when it is evident thou hast it, and hast been called and sent into the work, yea, and hast worked? Do not excuse thyself by any shelter of thy own creating, for it will not do, my dear friend, thou hast the talents, make the proper improvement; for all was to be left, house and land, wife and children, and even to hate the life, comparatively, that we have in this world to win a better, to stand approved of Him who had not where to lay his head, though the very foxes had holes, and the birds of the air nests so single He stood, and so glorious an example transmitted and diffused to his followers. And there are amongst the people professing righteousness who may be compared to the foxes that have dens, that prey and raven, and live upon the prey unto themselves, that are to be hunted by those the Lord has chosen for his own work and others like unto the fowls of the air, that have built their nests on high in lofty imaginations, that are to be brought down by skillful marksmen, such as thou; but if the lawful thing should interfere and interpose, and this work be neglected, at whose hands will this be required why those whom the Lord of light has anointed and chosen for his work.

If the appointed, and anointed and fitted be stir not themselves, the deluge will increase, and the standard of formality and unrighteousness will be substituted for righteousness and peace which were to kiss each other. Farewell, dear friend, may we be "the preserved" from the guilt of negligence in our day, that by overcoming every enemy, we may obtain the white stone and new name registered in the Lamb book of life, which is the earnest wish of the affectionate friend in sympathy, and I hope true friendship.

Secret Societies.—At the recent session of the Michigan Conference of the United Brethren in Christ (Radical branch), the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, We believe that organized secret societies are evil in their nature; and,
WHEREAS, Anti-Christian combinations are rapidly increasing and clearly demonstrating their anti-Christian character, endangering the peace and prosperity of Church and State; therefore,
Resolved, 1. That it is the imperative duty of all Christians to refrain from connection with such combinations.

2. That this is no time for us as a church to compromise with worldly secret associations.

3. That we, as ministers and members of the United Brethren Church, will seek through grace to overcome all such worldly conformity as would rob us of our peace, or destroy our usefulness.

The Amish Lend a Helping Hand.—Morgantown, W. Va., Eleventh Month 5th, 1892.—Evidence of the neighborly, fraternal feeling of the religious people known as the Amish, who live in this section of Berks and Lancaster counties, was witnessed near here yesterday. The wife, two daughters and two sons of David S. Beiler, a well-known farmer of the Conestoga Valley, have been sickly ill for over two months and unable to do farm work. Nearly one hundred persons, male and female, visited the Beiler homestead, set to work with a will, and before sundown over 2,000 bushels of corn were cut and husked and over 1,200 bushels of corn stored in the cribs. At noon a delicious country dinner was partaken of and in the evening they drove home, some fifteen and eighteen miles. Nearly every Amish family in the Conestoga and Pequea Valleys was represented in the party.

Noble Conduct.—Duke Karl Theodor, of Bavaria, and his wife have opened a hospital for the treatment of diseases of the eye on one of their estates in the Tyrol. Between two and three thousand people come there every year and are attended by the Duke, who is a skilful physician and surgeon. The Duchess is always present to assist her husband in his operations, superintending the whole establishment, going through the kitchens and laundries twice every day to see that all are in order. Her step-daughter and two young princesses assist her in her work, and the entire family is nearly idolized by the poor peasants.

Index Expurgatorious.—There is method in the madness of the Russian Baltic provinces in their execution of Protestantism. The latest step taken is the appointment of a commission who have made lists of books which can be read by the youth of the Provinces. It has been decided that all books in the school libraries not on these lists are to be removed at once. As the Commission consists of members of the Orthodox Church they naturally condemn all books that can be considered dangerous to the interests of that Church.

ten members to visit the Quarterly Meetings making the request; which in the following year reported that they had visited those meetings and many of their subordinate meetings, and proposed that the request be granted. This report was adopted by the Yearly Meeting, and the subject laid before the Yearly Meetings in correspondence with it, for their concurrence. Favorable replies having been received, it was decided to open the new Yearly Meeting in 1892, and it accordingly began on the twentieth of Eighth Month of the present year. The two Monthly Meetings of Green Plain and Cincinnati were retained by Indiana Yearly Meeting.

The statistical reports give the number of members as 5,321.

The Discipline of Indiana Yearly Meeting was adopted.

The delegates from the Quarterly Meetings [Representatives] were directed to nominate persons to act as Clerks—others as Trustees—others as Correspondents—to audit the Treasurer's account and propose appropriations for the work of the meeting.

The report on Wilmington College gave the whole number of students as 136, of whom forty-five were in the collegiate department. The statement that the musical department had been quite successful, shows that there as well as in many other places the ancient testimonies of the Society of Friends are being abandoned, and a door opened to the inroads of worldliness and dissipation.

Delegates were appointed to the Conference of Yearly Meetings, which has since been held at Indianapolis.

Standing Committees on Evangelistic and Pastoral Work, on Temperance, on Peace and Arbitration, on Home Mission Work, on Foreign Missions, and on Bible Schools, were appointed. The introduction into the deliberations of the Yearly Meeting of so many subjects not immediately connected with the care of its own members, their growth in grace, and the maintenance of our doctrines and testimonies, is an evidence that this Yearly Meeting is likely to follow in the footsteps of some others which have largely departed from our primitive ways and the doctrines which led to them.

The love which desires the spiritual welfare of all, and which preserves those who possess it from harsh judgment of others, is not necessarily blind to the tendencies which exist.

We are free to admit that there may be many in this Yearly Meeting who are sincerely desirous of promoting the Redeemer's kingdom among men. But if they teach, that the rest which the Holy Spirit gives "can be enjoyed nowhere else, except in the active service of our Master," as the Minute on the State of Society declares, is there not great danger that the minds of the young and inexperienced will be drawn away from that solid attention to the leadings of the Spirit of Christ, which is the only safe path to walk in, and that they will come to regard religion as practically the same as benevolent work, and thus lose sight of that "walking humbly with God" which is an essential part of its definition?

We should be truly rejoiced, if many of its members should so come under the government of Christ, and into an experimental knowledge and faithful support of the doctrines ever held by the Society of Friends, that Wilmington Yearly Meeting could be ranked among those churches of whom it may be said, as of one of the ancient churches, "Thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—According to the report of Treasurer Nebeker, the net ordinary revenues of the Government for the fiscal year were $354,937,784, a decrease of $37,674,663 as compared with the year before. The net ordinary expenditures were $345,023,330, a decrease of $10,319,351. Including the public debt the total receipts for the year were $736,401,296, and the expenditures, $684,019,289. The amount of the public debt is given as $1,588,461,144. According to the revised estimate, the total stock of money of all kinds in the country on Fifth Month 30th was $2,374,334,049, an increase of $150,000,000 in the year. The issues of United States paper currency during the year amounted to $376,727,583, exceeding those of any previous year.

The Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, speaking of the short cotton crop in the South and the consequent increase in value, says: "The present crop has been produced by about 2,500,000 acres less than was required to raise the crop of last year, and the immense acreage withdrawn from cotton is being cultivated for other crops. More corn, more wheat, more sugar and more rice are being raised in the South this year, which means more cash, by reason of less expenditure for food. With a cotton crop equal in value to that of last year, the South will gain the yield of $2,500,000 acres of additional food crops, besides a great increase in sugar and rice." This increase is estimated to be worth $87,500,000.

The full returns of the vote in California for members of the Legislature show that neither Democrats nor Republicans have a majority on joint ballot, and that neither can elect a United States Senator without the help of the non-partisan and People's members. The State Senate stands 22 Republican and 18 Democratic, while the Assembly stands 32 Republican, 38 Democratic, 3 People's Party and 7 non-partisans. The outsiders are divided on party allegiance, and no one can tell with which side they will act.

The official canvass of the vote of Choteau County, Montana, resulted in the giving of the certificate to one Democratic member of the Legislature, making that body Democratic on joint ballot and insuring the election of a straight Democrat as United States Senator. Three Populists hold the balance of power in the House, but the Democrats hope to get the organization of that body.

The electoral vote of Oregon will stand: Harrison, 3; Weaver, 1.

The Kennet Advance, of Penn'a., says: "With the results of the recent national election before us, and bearing in mind the predictions of the more sanguine Prohibitionists, it is worth while to study the Prohibition vote as it has increased in a number of States. Some of these figures are interesting, in view of the great losses sustained by the Republicans in States that have always been considered safe, as the following partial list will show. The round numbers only are given:

	1884.	1888.	1892.
New York.....	25,000	30,000	38,000
Illinois.....	12,000	21,000	26,000
Indiana.....	3,000	9,000	16,000
Ohio.....	11,000	24,000	30,000
Michigan.....	18,000	20,000	23,000
Wisconsin.....	7,000	14,000	16,000
Pennsylvania.....	15,000	20,000	25,000

"It is evident from the above figures that the Prohibition movement has been gaining in vitality from the commencement, and while it has not succeeded in electing candidates, it has possibly decided the issue in at least two national campaigns."

The Court of Errors, in Trenton, N. J., on the 25th of Eleventh Month, decided that the proposed election in Commercial township, Cumberland County, under the Werts liquor law, cannot be held. The election was to vote on the question of fixing a license fee of $5000, which would operate as prohibitive of the liquor business. The order for the election was certiorari to the Supreme Court by a local tavern keeper, but the Supreme Court dismissed the certiorari. The Court of Errors reverses the Supreme Court's decision, holding that the liquor dealer's appeal sets up objections of sufficient importance to entitle it to be reviewed.

According to a St. Paul despatch, the discovery has just been made that the wheat crop of Minnesota and the Dakotas is many millions of bushels above all estimates.

All the elevators and grain houses in South Dakota are full, and the "car famine" is such that thousands of bushels of wheat are left standing in farmers' wagons.

TWELFTH MONTH 3, 1892.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING.

We have received a printed copy of the Minute of this Body, from which we learn, that at the meeting of Fairfield Quarterly Meeting held on Eleventh Month 27, 1889, a Minute was adopted, addressed to Indiana Yearly Meeting, proposing that the three Quarterly Meetings in Southern Ohio be established as a Yearly Meeting, the first meeting of which should be held at Wilmington, Clinton County, Ohio.

The subject came before Indiana Yearly Meeting in 1889, which appointed a large Committee to deliberate thereon. This Committee suggested the appointment of a Committee of

The wild land in Maine is estimated to be worth at least $20,000,000.

It is said that a larger cave than the Mammoth Cave, situated in the Ozark Mountains, near Galena, Missouri, has been explored for a distance of more than thirty miles. In it have been found bones of recent and prehistoric animals, including the hyena and cave bear, and flint arrow heads, but no bones of man. A few animals of the usual forms found in caves are still living there, including a white newt.

Two agents of the Mexican Lottery Company have been arrested in New Orleans, at the instance of the Louisiana Lottery people, for selling tickets on the streets. The foreign company threaten to retaliate on the Louisiana, should any of its agents sell tickets openly.

The following remarks of the New York correspondent of the Public Ledger, should seriously impress the minds and hearts of all patriotic and Christian Americans: "If every seat at every performance in the twenty-five leading places of amusement was filled—and most of the managers report overflowing houses—over 260,000 persons went to the theatre in this city last week. This is a great number when it is remembered that few people go to the theatre more than once in any week, and when the high prices for seats are considered. There are only ten cities in the United States having a population larger than this aggregate of attendance at twenty-five theatres in New York in a single week. As the aggregate seating capacity of all the churches in the city is only 300,000, and as many of the churches are never filled at any service, it is not far out of the way to say that as many paid liberally to go to the theatre last week as went to church without price."

"A review of the current theatrical attractions in New York demonstrates two things, namely, that while the acting is polished, refined and effective, the plays themselves are for the most part light of texture, frivolous in plot, and often false in sentiment, and certainly they do not appeal to the highest intelligence of man. This is not altogether the fault of the managers. They do not run the theatres for fun, but for business, and they supply what the people demand. And the popular taste seems to run in the direction of light, airy farce and comedy. Over one-half of the New York theatres are now presenting plays and operas of this kind. There is little that will outlive, at the most, two or three theatrical seasons."

The deaths in this city last week were 402, being 23 more than last week, and 33 less than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing 217 were males, and 185 females; 54 died of consumption; 42 of pneumonia; 40 of diphtheria; 36 of diseases of the heart; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 16 of paralysis; 16 of apoplexy; 13 of old age; 11 of cancer; 10 of convulsions and 10 of marasmus.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 114½ a 115; currency, 6's, 117 a 118.

COTTON was firm and further advanced ½c. per pound, but trade in spot lots continued quiet. Middling uplands officially quoted at 10½c. per pound.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, spot, $15.50 a 16.50; spring bran, in bulk, spot, $14.50 a 15.50.

FOREIGN.—A cablegram from London, dated Eleventh Month 28th, says:—It is officially announced that Parliament will meet for business on First Month 31st.

The French Ministry resigned on the 28th ult., as a consequence of a vote of want of confidence by the Parliament.

A despatch from Paris of the 23rd ult., states that General Dodds telegraphs that the negotiations with King Behanzin were broken off on Eleventh Month 15th, the King refusing to accede to the full demands of the French. The French, therefore, on the following day, marched on Abomey. King Behanzin, being outmanœuvred, retreated, burning palaces and houses as he went, and issuing an order for all his subjects to follow him. The French entered Abomey on the morning of the 17th, and prepared for a formal occupation of Dahomey.

The long looked-for event of the present session of the German Reichstag occurred on the 23rd ult. The Army bill was introduced by Chancellor Von Caprivi, who made a most important speech upon the relations existing between France and Germany. He said that he did not intend to justify the bill by referring to a war in sight or by indulging in gloomy forebodings. He added: "I will disclose the whole truth. We are at peace with all nations, and encounter no difficulty in any quarter in maintaining the dignity of the nation. His Majesty the Emperor has justly remarked that Heligoland was the last piece of the globe we desired to acquire. Germany will not provoke war, for there is no prize to gain by victory, but neither will she undertake to prevent war any more than she did in 1870."

"This bill is, perhaps, unwelcome, but war—perhaps defeat—would be much worse. In the event of defeat we would have to pay a thousand millions in money for every million we are now expending. The Moloch of militarism is required only to preserve every German from the disaster of future defeat. After such a reverse it would no longer be a question of two years' army service. Our national commerce could not then be protected, German arts and sciences would decline, and a political-economic struggle would arise involving our very existence. Germany, if destroyed, will be replaced by no other nation. It is our duty to preserve Germany in memory of those who created her and died for her, so that it shall not be said that those who have gone before gave their blood, while the living are unwilling give even money. I appeal to the House to enable the nation to say in time of future war: 'Lieb Vaterland, magst du ruhig sein.'"

A dispatch from St. Petersburg, dated the 22nd ult., says: In eighteen of the Russian districts that are chiefly affected by cholera there were 3,313 cases of the disease and 769 deaths during the past week. Podolia, Kieff, Bessarabia and Kherson are the worst provinces, the fourteen other districts being affected in a lesser degree, the weekly mortality therein ranging from ten to twenty.

During the week there were 58 cases and 19 deaths in St. Petersburg, 45 cases and 32 deaths in Moscow, 170 cases and 71 deaths in Warsaw, and 52 cases and 27 deaths in Gtomir.

The London Times of the 25th ult. quotes extensively from an American Commission's report on the persecution of the Jews in Russia. An editorial article on the subject concludes: "The question of the persecuted Jews seeking refuge in America concerns only the American nation. But what concerns the whole civilized world, and revolts humanity itself, is the revelation thus afforded of a system of persecution sanctioned and sustained by the Russian Government and the personal authority of the Czar."

The wheat harvest of the colony of South Australia promises to be excellent, both in yield and in quality. There will be a large surplus available for export.

A new mineral has been discovered in Colombia in immense deposits, with properties not unlike those of asbestos. It is reported to be the color of amber, perfectly transparent and incombustible.

There has recently been an excessive rise in the prices of food throughout the Island of Cuba. Working men are so much affected by the increased cost of living that they propose to hold a meeting on First-day next to discuss steps looking to an amelioration of their condition.

A dispatch from Montreal says that the increasing interest in the question of political union with the United States is shown by the prominent place it is assuming in public discussion. La Patrie, an influential Liberal journal, comes out boldly in advocacy of annexation. The question is also being debated in political clubs.

DIED, Sixth Month 29th, 1891, THOMAS BARRINGTON, in his eighty-second year. He was born in Dublin, Ireland; came to America when a child; lived in Knox County, Ohio, where he married Elizabeth Townsend. Moved to Iowa in 1856. He was a worthy elder for many years, of Springdale Monthly Meeting of Friends, Cedar County. In 1883 he removed to Barclay, Kansas, where his wife's last days were spent. He returned to Iowa, where he became a member of the Conservative Body of Friends. He had always been a believer in and a faithful upholder of the doctrines of the Society, and at the time of his death was a valued member of West Branch Monthly Meeting Friends, Iowa.

—, Twelfth Month 22nd, 1891, at the home of a daughter Mary Hemmingsway, near West Branch, IOWA, JOSHUA COLLINS, aged ninety-three years, four months and nine days. He was born in Gloucester County, New Jersey, in 1798, removed to Ohio in 1835, and again to Iowa in 1851. He was an esteemed member of West Branch Monthly Meeting of Friends, Ia (Conservative). His persevering effort to attend meeting was a lively example for others to follow; after was over ninety-two years old he several times walked over one mile and a half to meeting, when the roads were bad for his team. His faculties were bright to the end (except his hearing was somewhat impaired). To believe when death came, he was ready for the heavenly garner.

—, Eighth Month 4th, 1892, DANIEL T. DYE, his eighty-fifth year, by falling from a train near Fairfax, Iowa. He was a highly esteemed member a minister of West Branch Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa (Conservative). Deceased was born in Madison County, New York, 1807. Moved to Lenawee County, Michigan, thence to Humboldt, Iowa. Since 1872 spent part of his time with his sons in Nebraska. I nearly forty years he had been a devoted, faithful minister of the Gospel, and his services have not been without marked results, as many can testify. His earnest and persevering efforts to fulfill the Divine command to him—"go work in my vineyard"—were lessons of deep instruction. The day but one before he left home he remarked, it mattered not to him where he laid his body down. His desire was to be found doing Father's will. He was returning from religious labors at the time of the accident, which so suddenly closed his long and useful life.

—, Ninth Month 11th, 1892, at College Park, N. J., SAN JOSE, CALIFORNIA, MAHALATH G. JONES, wife Benjamin H. Jones, aged eighty years, two months and seventeen days. During her last few days, fully conscious that the end was near, she had messages of love and fitting words of counsel for the members of her family, her friends, and for the meeting which had been precious to her. She emphasized the importance of Christian love, and her desire was for the wider extension of it throughout the whole world. Many were her expressions of firm trust and reliance in the blessed Redeemer. He had been her support in the trials and conflicts of life. Having faith in God as an all-sufficient Helper, it was her constant practice to turn to Him in secret, silent prayer, and she was strengthened to lay all her burdens, disappointments and trials at the feet of the Saviour—finding rest and peace in Him—so that in truth she could declare, I have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ. And was strongly attached to her family and friends, and in the enjoyment of many earthly blessings, she was enabled to welcome the summons to her heavenly home; her passing away seemed like a peaceful sunset, closing her day of life here upon earth.

—, at her residence in Philadelphia, Eleventh Month 9th, 1892, MARY P. GIBBONS, aged eighty years. A member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. This dear Friend had long been a consistent member of our religious Society, and as the infirmities of age, including a partial deprivation of sight, came upon her, her resignation and cheerful spirit gave evidence that, like Mary of old, she was in possession "that good part which shall not be taken away from her."

MARRIED, Eleventh Month 16th, 1892, at Buckham Friends' Meeting-house, Lahaska, Bucks County, Pa., DR. EDWARD G. RHODES, of Germantown, Philadelphia, and MARGARET ELY PAXSON, of New Hope, Pa.

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION will meet in Assembly Room at Friends' Select School, 140 N. Tenth Street, Philadelphia, on Twelfth Month 1st. The following program has been arranged:

2 P. M.—"Language Teaching," by Robert C. Metcalf, Supervisor of the Boston Public Schools. Questions and Discussion. Recess.

3 P. M.—"The Training of Friends' Teachers in England," by J. Henry Bartlett; "The Ideal Primary School," "How He Can Help His School," "How Can He Help His Teachers," by Supervisor Metcalf. Questions and Discussion.

All interested are cordially invited to be present.

In the Twelfth Month, 1788, being at her own arterly Meeting, held in Cork, my dear mother felt a pressure of mind to unite with Mr Robert Grubb and Elizabeth Tuke, in visit to the families belonging to that Monthly Meeting, but her affectionate attraction to home, urged her to attempt returning, without an alleviation of the concern she was under. Her afflictions on this account, and some particulars of her arduous engagement, are stated in letters to her husband, and the following extracts seem calculated to prove both instructive and encouraging to some, who may be able to trace their own feelings in the experience here detailed.

Cork, Twelfth Month 15th, 1788. It has passed out as I believe thou expected it would, I am once more in this place; after that time, I determined to proceed for meeting under our own roof this night, and even out for that purpose. On entering the carriage, I instantly felt darkness cover my mind, I went on, but I never remember being so much distressed—rebellious—rebellion, passed through my heart, and I grew so ill, I dared not proceed; so turned about and made a comparatively lightsome journey hither, my body and mind feeling gradually relieved. I reached E. Hatton's to dinner, but the confinement I had sustained made me require a little rest, so that I did not get outwardly banded in service till the evening, when a harmonious repose and labor were afforded, as a comfortable evidence of rectitude so far—perhaps a few words may relieve my poor mind; thou knowest how gladly I shall embrace the dawning of peace.

Thou wilt readily believe that our dwellings are not in the heights, though I trust we are sometimes so helped to ascend the Lord's holy mountains, as experimentally to know there is something there that can hurt or destroy; it seems to me when rather the invitations than threatenings of the Gospel are to be proclaimed, and I think there does seem an open door for communication, though it be sometimes sad, because of the things which have happened. I am far from being satisfied with myself, but I am truly united with my fellow laborers, and with my return to this city, even though bonds and afflictions await us in it. Why should we not suffer when the seed suffers? Where else would be our unity with this seed, which lies in a state of captivity? There are now about twenty-nine families got through, and I trust it may be humbly and gratefully acknowledged, that hitherto the Lord has helped.

"I may honestly confess that I am still bound to this arduous work, and through Divine mercy we are not only sustained, but have a little trust at seasons, that 'the labor is not in vain.' Some sittings have been graciously owned, but I know not any so much so, with the sensible gathering of that manna which falls from the heavenly treasury, as one this morning in the dwelling of that prince in Israel, Samuel Neale, whose outward man is visibly decaying, while the inward man is renewed day by day. The spring seemed to open on our sitting down, and the waters gradually rose as from the aneels, till the refreshing consolation truly gladdened the Lord's heritage, that in us which could own his planting, and by his renewed watering, glorify Him. It was truly encouraging and strengthening to hear this father in the church declare, that he had not flinched from whatever had been required of him, but had done it with all his might, and that, through Divine mercy, he now found support in the midst of infirmities, 'therefore,' he added, 'be faithful, follow the Lord fully, and give up to every manifestation of his will.'

"We received a note declining an intended visit. I confess such a repulse made me exceedingly low, having had a particular feeling towards this family, but I believe it safest to look from it; perhaps even this offer of ourselves may recur, and not be useless, though we see it not; we could do no more than seek an interview, and love still prevails towards them.

"Yesterday was the three weeks' meeting here, which we attended, visiting our brethren also; hope no harm was done. I am afraid of no one but myself, and I desire always to suspect that enemy self, lest on any occasion, it should take the lead; but under heavy pressures here, I have a degree of hope, that not going this warfare at my own cost, I may yet be helped to the end of it, which now draws nigh, having gone through about eighty-five families and only a few remaining."

The next religious service of which there is any account, was a visit to some part of Leinster Province, early in the year 1790, wherein her former companion, Richard Shackleton, was her kind attendant and helper, and her dear friend, Elizabeth Pim, united in a part of the work. During this engagement she visited the families comprising the Monthly Meetings of Moate, Edenderry, and Carlow, which she describes as a "service closely trying," yet, productive of solid peace, and near the winding up of this labor, writes as follows:

—"Many are my fears and doubtings before willingness is wrought in me to leave such endeared connections, and many my tossings and conflicts, in seasons of separation; but may I, with increasing devotedness, trust in the Arm of never-failing help. Through unmerited mercy, the Lord has not only given a degree of resignation to leave all, when the call has been clearly distinguished, but sustained under various laborious exercises, so that the promise is indeed fulfilled, 'as thy days so shall thy strength be;' and there is cause to trust with the whole heart, for future direction and support."

Towards the close of the year she had a long and suffering illness, as well as considerable anxiety through indisposition in her family, her eight children being in the whooping-cough at the same time; and the death of her beloved friend and companion, S. R. Grubb, in the Twelfth Month, was a heavy and unexpected affliction, which for a season sunk her very low. But in the spring of 1791, she believed it required of her again to leave her own habitation, and pay a religious visit to Friends of Ulster.

After attending the National Meeting in Dublin, she accordingly proceeded with her companion, Sarah Shackleton, and having sat at a meeting with the few Friends belonging to Timahoe, went on to Castle Freeman, whence her first letter to my dear father is dated.

"Fifth Month, 13th. We reached this place very agreeably, being favored in weather and roads. I felt in passing through part of Old Castle (where Friends' meeting-house is, though I did not know it), a spring of love towards the 'sheep not of this fold;' but said nothing about it till we got here, when I found that some inclined to be visited by having a meeting held in one of their houses, but it seemed best to attend to the previous intimation, and I ventured to have one appointed for nine o'clock to-morrow morning, with notice that it will be open to such as are disposed to sit with us. Thou knowest me well enough to be aware that this prospect tries my little stock of faith, which is indeed low, but it can be graciously renewed, and I trust will, from season to season, as singleness of eye and heart is kept to."

"Ballybay—Monaghan, Fifth Month 15th, 1791. Respecting the meeting at Old Castle, it may in commemoration of holy help be recorded, that those who trust are not confounded, but experience strength proportioned to the day of trial. I do not remember many assemblies of this sort, more owned with the covering of good, and the solidity of the people during the whole meeting exceeded what is to be often met with; at the close of the public sitting I felt a wish that Friends might keep their seats, and that season was also one of relief to my mind. We took a little refreshment in the meeting-house, and then pursued our journey, arriving at Cootchill, twenty-five miles, in the evening, tired and poorly, but humbly thankful for the assistance every way afforded.

"As there are no Friends in circumstances to accommodate travellers, we lodged at an inn, and attended meeting at the usual hour this morning, to which many came who are not in profession with us, and I trust nothing was said to discourage the honest inquirers after truth.

There was a little stop afterwards with the members of our own Society, perhaps not exceeding eleven or twelve, among them a widow and her daughter, who have joined Friends by conviction, and appear in a solid frame of mind; we spent a little time with these, and had a season of retirement with a young physician who was at our meeting, and to whom my mind was particularly drawn; he was invited to drink tea at this widow's, and in the prevalence of Gospel love I freely communicated what I felt to arise towards him, which I believe was well received, and we parted under feelings which were precious, and caused humble thankfulness of soul. We came on to this place to lodge, had a meeting appointed for eleven o'clock yesterday morning at Castle-Shane, with a small company of Friends, amongst whom very little life was to be felt, which they were, I trust, honestly told; and went on afterwards, through wind and rain, sixteen miles to our friend, Thomas Greer's, where we were kindly received, and concluded to stay a day, my poor body requiring rest."

Her getting to such a resting-place seemed critical, for she was almost immediately taken alarmingly ill, having been for several days afflicted with a heavy cold, and symptoms of inflammation, which required medical care. The judicious prescription of a physician, and kind attention of the family at Rhonehill, proved the means of seasonable relief, and on the 21st of Fifth Month she writes as follows:

"I am, through continued loving kindness, considerably better, which I ought thankfully to acknowledge, as my situation for some days past rendered so speedy an amendment very doubtful.

"Lurgan, Fifth Month 24th. Although my dear Friends and the doctor would have had me stay some time longer to nurse, yet apprehending my mind might obtain a little relief by endeavoring to fill up the line of duty, which while unaccomplished is an oppression to the body, I ventured yesterday afternoon to go as far as Berna, whither our truly kind friend T. G., sent me and my dear S. S., in his carriage; many Friends met us there, and we were favored after tea with the spreading of the holy Wing, in a manner that I believe tended to the gathering and centering nearly all present in a state of humble waiting, wherein an enlargement of mind was experienced, to dip into feeling with, and administer to, several states in the company; it was a season worth suffering for, and we returned to our lodgings relieved in mind.

THE spectacle recently presented in New York of Professor Bell, the inventor of the telephone, sitting at a transmitter in actually whispering a message to Chicago, 950 miles away, while a flash light photograph was taken of him in the act, was a scene that may fairly be said to be one of the most wonderful in the history of the nineteenth century. Here two of the greatest triumphs of science, the telephone and the camera, in their highest development, were brought into play at one time under circumstances altogether unprecedented. The scene was witnessed by over a hundred guests, who assembled in the telephone building in Cortlandt Street to attend the formal opening of the long-distance telephone line between New York and Chicago. Telephone messages have been sent between London and Paris, New York and Washington, Paris and Marseilles, and New York and Boston, but the line to Chicago is over twice as long as any other in existence, and it is to be operated commercially, with a charge of $9 for five minutes' conversation. The tests made in the presence of the guests of the Long Distance Telephone Company were perfectly satisfactory. The telephone has, in 15 years, grown into such universal use that familiarity has robbed it of its marvels, but it was indeed wonderful to see Mayor Grant sitting at a transmitter and carrying on a conversation, in an ordinary tone of voice, with Mayor Washburne, of Chicago.

"Strange," remarked a gentleman present, "that a sentence can be dropped in Chicago and be heard in New York."

"Oh, that's nothing," replied a wit, "by and by you will be able to hear a London cockney drop his H's in Trafalgar Square." Not a person witnessed these wonders who did not believe that one or two more steps of advancing science may make a telephone conversation with London possible. Professor Bell says, indeed, that it is only the question of a very short time when all the civilized world will be in telephonic communication. Formerly it has not been possible to get good results over a telephone for a longer distance than 500 miles. The wire tested extends 950 miles. Telephone communication between this city and Pittsburg has been successfully carried on for some time, but when an attempt has been made to talk to a city farther west than Pittsburg the result has been invariably unsuccessful. The wires in use between New York and Pittsburg are about an eighth of an inch in diameter. They weigh 180 pounds to the mile. It was concluded to put up a wire between New York and Chicago twice as large as the one in use on the 500-mile circuit. The new circuit is therefore made of wires one-fourth of an inch in diameter, and the wire weighs 435 pounds to the mile. The circuit is what is known as a double metallic circuit, containing two wires for the entire distance. To make the wire, 826,500 pounds of wire were used. The circuit runs west through Easton, Harrisburg and Pittsburg, Pa.; Youngstown and Toledo, Ohio, and South Bend, Ind. Souvenirs were given to the guests, consisting of a section of copper wire, such as is used in the line to Chicago.—Selected.

The Office of a Mother, by a Mother.

"What a delicate office is that of a mother! How wary should be her footsteps, how spotless her example, how uniform her patience, how extensive her knowledge of the human heart, how great her skill in using that knowledge, by the most vigilant and strenuous application of it in every variety of occurring circumstances, to enlighten the understanding and reform the heart! Legislators and governors have to enact laws, and compel men to observe them; mothers have to implant the principles, and to cultivate the dispositions, which alone can make good citizens and subjects. The former have to exert authority over characters already formed; the latter have to mould the character of the future man, giving it a shape which will make him either an instrument of good to the world, or a pest in the lap of society. Oh, that a constant sense of the importance and responsibility of this station may rest upon me! that grace may be given me faithfully to discharge its difficult duties."

"I have had much solicitude for my children this evening. At one time, such a sense of the everlasting consequences of the trust committed to me, in reference to their immortal souls, rushed upon me, as literally made me shudder. I wonder I do not realize this more habitually. Oh, that God would make me faithful, and crown my efforts with his blessing!"

"After all, education is only an instrument, and the little ones must be borne in the arm of faith, to that compassionate Redeemer, who has given parents such abundant encouragement to trust in Him; committing them always in his hands, believing that, if they do so, He will direct their steps."

"The helps which God has afforded us, ought to make us more useful in our maternal capacity. They certainly call for gratitude. But, after all, if we were better Christians, we should be more likely to make good mothers. Consistent ardent piety, is the most essential qualification in a mother, for the proper education of her offspring. Children are more influenced by example than by anything else; and were our behavior before them, at all times circumspect, Christ-like; did not the ebullitions of passion, the spirit of worldly-mindedness, and the love of selfish gratification, so often appear in our conduct, and utterly defeat our well-formed plans and good intentions, we should not so often have to complain, that we labor in vain, and spend our strength for nought. Alas! in correcting the faults of our children, how many faults do we find to correct in ourselves! We do it not that it is God who showeth mercy, that we would be little encouragement indeed. Blessed be his name! there is encouragement sufficient to stimulate to the most unwearied exertion. And those who diligently sow the seed in humble dependence on his blessing, shall doubtless, sooner or later, reap an abundant harvest. God may be pleased to withhold his blessing till the season of labor is over. 'The seed may spring up,' as one says, 'after the hand that planted it, and the eye that watered it, are at rest in the grave.'"

"We can never too earnestly press upon ourselves the conviction, that education is not only what we teach our children in detached periods of time, when we are giving them special instruction, or explaining to them revealed truths; but what we teach them by the silent, but ever-influencing language of our general example. The mother who recommends religion, in a formal instruction to her children, as a thing of the first importance, while, in her own case, she is habitually driven into a corner; who insists on her children, the supreme desirableness of laying up treasures in heaven, while her own dearest ones are evinced, by her conduct, to be on earth; who insists on the excellence and importance of meekness, patience and charity, while she is no way remarkable for the exercise of these graces herself; who descants on the vanity of the world, while she is sure to be a slave to its opinions and fashions; can hardly expect much success from her labors."

[Near the close of this pious mother's life she died at about the age of thirty-two years—she pathetically writes:]

"I had hoped to have been spared to my darling children; to have used my humble exertions to guide their infant minds in the path of truth and holiness; to have watched over their early associations, and directed those propensities which a mother best understands, and in the judicious management of which so much of their future usefulness and happiness depends. I had hoped to have directed their early studies; to have put into their hands such books as I knew to be useful. I had hoped to have given them over the instructive pages of history, have drawn their minds from an undue regard to riches and worldly endowments, by inting them to the noble and virtuous conduct of statesmen and others taken from the tttage and the plough. I had hoped to have own them, that ambition is not always successful, that pride is never productive of happiness, that outward greatness does not always involve ignominity. And, above all, I had hoped to have shown them, from the history of past ages, that the lusts and passions of men produce wars and fightings, turmoil, and misery, and death; and to have drawn them to behold the difference manifested in the spirit of the Gospel of Christ, from this picture of wretchedness and sin; and thus to have taught them to cultivate the dispositions which that Gospel requires, and on which the happiness of individuals and of society depends. Oh, how many ways may the mother ze, to teach the offspring of her love the way of Truth, which no one else can perceive."

"Oh, my God! thou knowest the earnest, the times, almost heart-breaking desires I feel for the conversion of my children. What shall I do, at this end may be attained? Lord, teach me what thou requirest of me in this particular! specially, make me scrupulously watchful over my own example. O God! do I not choose thee for their portion, above all other portions? and wilt Thou not give me as I have desired? hasten, hasten the time of their union, by a living faith, to the Lord Jesus Christ."

Imprisonment for Preaching.

William F. Davis was arrested in Boston for preaching without a license on the "Common" that city, and sentenced to imprisonment for violating a city ordinance. This imprisonment lasted for twelve months. He addressed a letter to the editor of the Cynosure, defending his position, and justifying himself for the course he had pursued; from which, the following paragraphs are taken. Imprisonment for such cause seems to take us back two hundred years to a period when persecution on account of religion was much more common than is now the case.

MT. WASHINGTON, CHELSEA, Mass.,
Seventh Month 26th, 1892.

Editor of the Cynosure:—Wilt thou kindly permit me to use thy columns for stating the case concerning our relation to the courts on the subject of free public preaching of the Gospel? We are not prosecuting, nor putting others up to prosecute, the persecutors of God's Gospel. But surely it is proper for us to show the illegality of the course of the prosecutors of those who freely preach the Gospel. It is right to show this in court when we are summoned into court. True men will welcome the light, and the light proves the utter impossibility of suppressing free public preaching. "Freely ye have received; freely give." (Matt. x: 8). "And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations." (Matt. xxiv: 14). "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, unto the end of the world. Amen." (Matt. xxviii: 18-20.)

"For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." (I Cor. i: 21.)

"Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind. And the servant said, Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room. And the Lord said unto the servant, Go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled." (Luke xiv: 21-23.)

These and many other passages prove that the free public preaching of the Gospel [is justified by the precepts of the Bible.] Civil governments are also ordained of God. To the Romans Paul wrote in the spirit: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be, are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil." (Rom. xiii: 1-3). The Holy Spirit, writing to Christians through the Apostle Peter, says: "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the King, as supreme; or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil-doers, and for the praise of them that do well." (I Peter ii: 13, 14.)

In these passages we have the distinct recognition of civil governments as existing by God's ordination. But the Scripture passages first quoted prove that the free public preaching of the Gospel is also ordained of God. What, then, must we conclude, in case the civil government opposes, or tries to suppress, the free public preaching of the Gospel? Would it be reasonable to infer, when men employ the machinery of civil government to suppress the free publication of the Gospel, that this is a case of God's ordinance fighting against God's ordinance? Oh, no! God is not the author of confusion. His appointments are not a house divided against itself. Because human governments are ordained of God, it does not follow that every act of every human government is approved by Him. The assumption that God can be held to be the author of any human legislation aimed at abolishing or hindering the free publication of the Gospel is blasphemous.

But, admitting the wickedness and folly of any human by-laws or ordinances, which assume to prohibit or check the free public preaching of the Gospel, do the Scripture precept and example allow a true Christian to disobey such a by-law if it is passed by a legislature, enforced by the police, and approved by a human court? Certainly. The precepts and examples of Scripture precedents on this point not only allow true Christians to disobey such by-laws and ordinances, but require them to do so. An attentive study of Isaiah viii: 9-20; Jer. i: 6-10, 17-19; Eze. iii: 4-11, 17-21; Dan. vi: 4-23; Luke xiii: 31-35; Acts i: 8, ii: 14-47, iii: 1-26, iv: 1-31, and Rev. vi: 9-11, prove beyond a doubt that when human ordinances forbid public testimony unto Jesus, that is unto God our Saviour, we should obey God rather than men, and set at naught such ordinances. But, if we disobey such an ordinance, do we not disobey the injunction, "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake?" No. Unless we draw a sword, or pistol, or take a gun, or club, or other carnal weapon, with which to fight against the officer who attempts to arrest us. We "submit" to a wicked ordinance, forbidding free public worship in the sense which Scripture requires, when we disobey this ordinance, and then submit to false arrest, false accusation, mock trial, and false imprisonment in consequence.

But is it right to use the service of a lawyer in replying to the false accusation in a court of law? If a Christian lawyer volunteers his aid to secure a just, instead of an unjust trial, and a righteous, instead of a wicked issue to the trial, we ought by all means to welcome his aid. For if the jury and judge will heed his presentation of the truth from a legal point of view, and give a righteous vindication of the Gospel preacher, they will by these means clear themselves from the awful woe which God visits upon the persecutors of his ambassadors. This service Patrick Henry once rendered to the witnesses of Jesus under false arrest in Virginia, and saved the court from a great disgrace, and from the judgments of God.

In 1887, the courts of Massachusetts heeded not the to-this-day-unanswered argument of one of the best Constitutional lawyers in our country concerning a free Gospel, and condemned a poor but conscientious preacher to imprisonment twelve months in Charles Street jail, for preaching four sermons freely to the common people on their own Boston Common. Before the minister of Christ had served out four months of the sentence imposed upon him, the judge who imposed that sentence, the district attorney who moved it and two of the principal aldermen responsible for the by-law framed to destroy free public preaching, had suffered the death penalty at the bar of the Judge of all the earth, and no acts of habeas corpus, issued by, or returnable to human courts, nor skill of man-made doctors, could deliver these officials from the grasp of the death-angel.

The general law of the land is right on this subject, saying, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The fundamental law of our several States is equally clear and strong in proof of the inviolability of free public preaching. Thus the supreme written law of our Massachusetts Commonwealth opens with a preamble which declares the "objects of government," defines the "body politic," and closes with a renewed appeal unto God. (See Public Statutes of Mass., 1882, p. 18.) This pious preamble points to the Massachusetts Bill of Rights as the first integral part of "the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts." Look a moment at this Bill of Rights. Its first article is a brief recapitulation of the National Declaration of Independence:

"Art. I. All men are born free and equal," etc.

"Art. II. It is the right as well as the duty of all men in society, publicly, and at stated seasons to worship the Supreme Being, the great Creator and Preserver of the universe. And no subject shall be hurt, molested, or restrained in his personal liberty or estate, for worshipping God in the manner and season most agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience; or for his religious profession or sentiments: provided he doth not disturb the public peace, or obstruct others in their religious worship."

The law of our country is freedom in the public exercise of religion. But no one under cover of this legal liberty is permitted by the law to "disturb the public peace," or to "obstruct others in their religious worship."

The Boston gag by-law, and New York city ordinance, therefore, are framed in direct opposition to both the letter and spirit of national and State Constitutions on this subject, therefore are utterly void of legal authority.

Sincerely thy servant in Christ,

WM. F. DAVIS.

FOR COMMON MERCIES.

Dear Lord, are we ever so thankful,
As thankful as we should be to Thee,
For thine angels sent down to defend us
From dangers our eyes never see;
From perils that lurk unsuspected,
The powers of earth and of air,
The while we are heaven-protected
And guarded from evil and snare?

Are we grateful, as grateful we should be,
For commonplace days of delight,
When safe we fare forth to our labor,
And safe we fare homeward at night;
For the weeks in which nothing has happened
Save commonplace toiling and play,
When we've worked at the tasks of the household,
And peace hushed the house day by day?

Dear Lord, that the terror at midnight,
The weird of the wind and the flame,
Hath passed by our dwelling, we praise Thee,
And lift up our hearts in thy name;
That the circle of darlings unbroken
Yet gathers in bliss round the board,
That commonplace love is our portion,
We give thee our praises, dear Lord.

Forgive us who live by thy bounty,
That often our lives are so bare
Of the garlands of praise that should render
All votive and fragrant each prayer.
Dear Lord, in the sharpness of trouble
We cry from the depths to the throne!
In the long days of gladness and beauty,
Take Thou the glad hearts as Thine own.

O common are sunshine and flowers,
And common are raindrop and dew,
And the gay little footsteps of children,
And common the love that holds true.
So, Lord, for our commonplace mercies,
That straight from thy hand are bestowed,
We are fain to uplift our thanksgivings—
Take, Lord, the long debt we have owed!

THE TOUCH OF FAITH.

BY J. E. RANKIN, LL.D.

She knew not his person, knew not his face,
She knew but his mercy, his wonderful grace:
She knew that He came, by the hum of the crowd,
She knew He drew near where the voices were loud.

She stole there in weakness, alone and forlorn,
Her bosom with passions conflicting all torn;
No rush of the crowd her progress could stem;
"Could I touch," was her thought, "of his garment the hem!"

Made bold by her faith, her despair, her distress,
She feared not to meet the rude scorn of the press,
But, timid and trembling, behind him she stole,
She touched but his robe, and was instantly whole.

"Who touched me?" said Jesus, and paused in his way,

Alas! must she now her life's sorrow betray?
Reluctant, confessing, yes, forward she came,
Her heart beating quick, her cheek lit with flame.

"My daughter, my daughter, oh, be not afraid!"
'Twas this that the Master in tenderness said;
"The touch of my garment, which gave thee release,
Was the touch of thy faith. Go, daughter, in peace."

Your chief profit consisteth, not in committing the word of doctrine to memory, but rather that the effects of the doctrine and words remain in you; that is by this doctrine to get an internal purity, and a ready mind to fulfil the commandments of God.—Lewis Blossius.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Extracts from the Diary of Louis Taber.

Second Month 2nd, 1839.—Agreeably to my prospect in the Fall, I have been for the last three months engaged in teaching a school of young men and young women, in which I am assisted by my cousin Eliza Hoag; being willing, if it may be, to make myself useful to my fellow beings in some little degree. My health however is not quite so good as when my school commenced. I find it difficult to perform my part, and should be disposed to close were it not the wish of some of my friends here that it should continue. I do not think that I shall again engage in the occupation of teaching as my health will not admit of the care and confinement attending the business. The right education of the youth of our Society is a subject which has much and often occupied my mind, and with reluctance am I compelled to relinquish an employment, which had my health been sufficient I had thought of pursuing through a part or the whole of my life.

Yesterday was our Monthly Meeting. It had been for some months brought into suffering on account of the open disaffection of some of its members, and the disownment of a public Friend who tried to evade the operation of the discipline and trample the good order of society under foot, similar to some anciently among Friends who apostatized from the Truth. Uncle Joseph Hoag was in attendance and spoke from the text, "Ephraim is a cake not turned." In his clear and cogent manner, he showed how the material passes through the threshing, winnowing, grinding, kneading and leavening process, and that last of all it is submitted to the action of the fire. But if the fire have not fully passed upon it, the preparation is unfit for food and nourishment, and that which is not well and fully prepared soon spoils the flavor of the rest, and the whole becomes a sour and mouldy mass. Thus he divided the word aright, to the strengthening and comfort of his friends.

Fourth Month 23rd.—My school closed the 20th of the month. Many of the scholars were affected at our parting, and although my health had suffered from attending the school, I could not take my leave of those who had been so uniformly kind to me without regret.

It affords me much satisfaction to believe that the time has not been lost, and that I have embraced every suitable opportunity to inculcate feelings and habits of propriety and virtue.

Fifth Month 7th.—I have to-day solemnly reviewed my past life, and my covenant with my Maker. Under the reflection that I am again soon to leave the paternal roof, and of my continued ill health; of my many little omissions and commissions, my want of patience and resignation in my trials and disappointments, and of faith, through all to trust in God, with whom are the issues of life and death, my spirit has been renewedly broken. I have been willing humbly to acknowledge my transgressions and to ask forgiveness. Again renewing my covenant with my God, I have resolved through the assistance of the Holy Spirit, henceforth fully and unreservedly to devote my whole heart to the honor of God, the cause of my Redeemer, the happiness of mankind and the salvation of my soul. And in order that I may never again be so forgetful of my duty and of my Maker, or repine at the consequences of my own or other's neglect, or at the dispensations of Providence; I have framed for frequent review certain resolutions, praying that through Holy Help I may become an example of patience, meekness, forbearance, resignation, temperance, benevolence, piety and every Christian virtue, and (thus) finally attain the perfection of the saints of God.

Second Month 16th, 1840.—To-day I have attended Short Creek Quarterly Meeting, which was an interesting and favored meeting. I was again visited by the heavenly incomes of the Holy Spirit, my heart tendered, and my faith which has sometimes almost failed—was a little strengthened. The language of my spirit was "If I die, let it be waiting at the feet of my Redeemer." "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

Farmington, Sixth Month 20th.—The prospect of a Manual Labor School, which I came to this place to assist in establishing seems pretty much closed. At Caleb Macomber's reading D. Wheeler's Journal, my heart was tendered, and in considering his firmness and devotion desires were raised that I might be willing to surrender into the hands of my Redeemer. At Hartland felt much sympathy with my aunt in her bereaved situation.

Raisin, Mich., Seventh Month 27th.—At some of the meetings of our friend Christopher Heath, who was on a religious visit, my poor tried mind was visited in mercy and a little strengthened. Oh for a firmer trust in the Divine arm.

Extract from a letter Mount Pleasant, Twelfth Month 9th, 1840. Dear Brother.—For in a little of that love, boundless as the universe, knowing no circumference, can I most fully and feelingly respond to thy affectionate address. Thy thrice welcome epistle has just arrived, a rich treat. Thy brother is come, a cup of cold water to the longing and thirsty traveller through the arid wastes and pathless deserts of this world towards the new Jerusalem, the glorious city of our God.

Dear brother, let me speak freely; it will be good for thee to know one can appreciate thy friendship. The thought comes up in my heart for utterance; "Come home to the little afflicted, yet consoled flock and family of the dear Son. Seven thousand are yet reserved in Israel. I must leave thee to thy Maker, but believe it is my place to sustain those sacred principles vindicated by our forefathers' sufferings, imprisonment and death. Thankfully cherish this visitation, as a special proof of thy Saviour's love. Should it be neglected thou mightest again be blessed. Canst thou bear the thought of being alienated from so good a Redeemer, losing such a glorious inheritance? Soon after I last saw thee, I met with a trial which I believe for the sustaining arm of my God would have proved my ruin. Casting all at his holy feet, I could only say, "Save, Lord, or I perish, for if I die it shall be at thy footstool, imploring mercy."

It rejoices me to hear thee say, "I mean to resign myself wholly to the guidance of the Spirit of God, to keep near Him, and hearken to the 'still small voice.' That is the rock upon which is built the true spiritual church, the church militant upon earth, the body of Christ, of which He is the holy and spiritually leading Head. Without the Spirit, preaching is only religious rhetoric, it is not the Gospel, the power of God unto salvation." Thou art right, and would I were more worthy in the name of a disciple to bid thee "God speed," in thy journey to our home in heaven. Give my love to J., though I know he will not feel with me. Can his own arm save him? The blood of Jesus only cleanses from sin. The pride and strength of the human heart and the human will must subdued. Yes, Shakespeare and Byron and most of authors whose names are high upon the rolls of fame, must be abandoned, for they rank at other fountains than those which are pure, living and healing.

And shall we pore days and nights over exploits of heroes, and the fictitious creations of Athenian bards, admiring the finely wrought figures of their pagan gods? Let us learn rather to love that blessed book, in which for instruction are penned the sublime and holy pourings of holy men of old who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. Give up, remembering the promise to the Church, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

First Month 28th, 1846.—William Kennard was here last night, and this morning had an opportunity with us, having much to communicate mostly of an encouraging nature. He commenced by alluding to the miracle of the draught of fishes, after the disciples had fished all night and taken nothing, and we were counselled to cast the net on the right side of the ship. He also spoke of Peter meeting Jesus in the water, and that he was sustained until faith began to fail in consequence of "his holding the raging and rolling billows around him ready to swallow him up;" with much more, applicable to our situation, all of which served to remind me of the many favored opportunities we had in our journey together, and to re-assert my attachment to him, and to that Truth which I believe he still lives, in the greenness of the true living Gospel ministry. I was comforted and instructed. Such opportunities are rare marks in the often toilsome pilgrimage of Zion's travellers. William is still standing only against those innovations in doctrine, and some respects in practices, introduced by the use of the great and the learned of our day, which are fast laying waste the harmony of our once favored and united Society. He visited most of the families in this Monthly Meeting, but met with some opposition. His religious communications were solid and instructive.

28th.—No account of the Yearly Meeting has been kept. Many of the circumstances which occurred at that time should be buried in forgetfulness. May I never witness such a scene! A few weeks since we received an account of the death of Uncle Joseph Hoag. He has been a faithful servant in the vineyard of his heavenly Master, and has been gathered in good old age to his eternal rest, as a shock of wheat fully ripe.

May here record a remarkable prediction which was made several years since at Ferrisburg at the Yearly Meeting. In the course of a very powerful testimony, he alluded to the Hiesite vision, and then added, "I have seen in that vision never deceived me, that we shall be again led as from sieve to sieve, and greater trials will come upon us than any through which we have passed. We may not live to see it, but there are those who will, and if you please, you may pen it down, and it will come." We have now abundant cause to believe his prediction will prove to be the truth. And "who shall be able to stand when it appeareth?"

(To be continued.)

PRAYER is the desire of the heart begotten by the Spirit of God, which breathes upon the soul, giving life and begetting petitions and thanksgiving unto God, who is the author of every good and perfect gift.—Selected.

The Boers of South Africa.

The Boer is a farmer, or, more correctly, a dweller on the veld—he loves solitude and cares nothing for the outside world. I had frequent business relations with one, which occasioned almost weekly visits, and as we became fairly good friends, this farmer may be taken as a typical example of the Boer. This man possesses a tract of 20,000 acres, which is called a farm. Scarcely any of this domain is cultivated; it embraces part of a range of hills which forms a boundary, and contains several isolated eminences as well, whilst in most places its level ground is strewn with rocky debris. These hills are sparsely wooded, and it is from them that he obtains the firewood he sells at Pretoria and Johannesburg. He lives in a small and wretchedly kept and furnished house, the most conspicuous articles of which are a small Dutch organ and a large family Bible, for he is a conventionally pious man. He cultivates a very small patch of his farm, and leaves the rest as nature gives it, to grazing purposes, and relies on his flocks and herds. Towards the end of the winter he fires the veld, the withered and dried grasses of which readily burn, and thus allows to the new shoots that will rise after the rains, light and air to commence growth. At that time of the year the illumined horizon almost nightly denotes the process of this primitive farming, and day reveals dismal black areas which tell the same tale. The young grass soon starts, and in a fortnight from the conflagration I have seen scattered and small patches of bright green even before the rains have commenced. But these continuous fires help to keep the country in its present treeless condition, for nothing but a few stunted trees of the hardest wood can withstand the ravages of the flames, whilst young seedlings have no chance of surviving their first season's growth. I believe the Government have to an extent prohibited these burnings, but as the practice is carried on by the Boers, who are a law unto themselves, the enactment is more honored in the breach than in the observance.

The Boer farmer usually passes his time in riding about or sitting in his house smoking and drinking coffee. His vrow sees to the housework, his sons drive the ox-wagon. The living is wretchedly poor and vilely cooked, but the Boer has few wants, and is happy if left alone. Kafirs do the farm work, which is principally attending to the cattle, who neither require food nor water, as the veld provides the first, and they are always kept where some small stream can be found. The people retire to bed about 7 P. M., but rise early. Illiterate and uneducated to a greater extent than our own rustic population, they possess a keen and intelligent grasp of the government and politics of the Transvaal, and in this respect are intellectually superior to our own men of the shires. They have won their position by hard fighting and hard living.

Forty years ago they had to wage war with lions and leopards on their farms, where now scarcely a buck is to be seen, and not only did they struggle against wild beasts, but sustained sanguinary Kafir fights. They showed no mercy to one or the other, but fixed their boundaries and protected their farms. They are the nearest present approach to the old Hebrew patriarchs; like them they value wealth in flocks and herds, and away from the world in almost lonely wilderness, worship God, and often possess the same strong and unruléd passions as were exhibited by some of the biblical personages. Wild tales of wild doings are sometimes told as having occurred in far away farms; but I incline to the view that these are often exaggerated, and that the average Boer is according to his lights, a citizen pioneer, and a rough, God-fearing, honest, homely, uneducated philistine.—A Naturalist in the Transvaal.

Joseph Hoag and Family.

[The following remarkable narrative of the coming forth in the ministry of Joseph and Huldah Hoag and their family, was given by Huldah to Elizabeth Robson, of Charlotte, Vermont, and was written down by her Ninth Month 26th, 1826. It is probably familiar to several of the older readers of THE FRIEND, but will be new to many others.—ED.]

At Joseph Hoag's, his wife Huldah gave the following extraordinary account of her family. She and her husband were married in 1782, being each about twenty-one years of age.

Both appeared in the ministry, and were afterwards acknowledged by the Monthly Meeting. They were in low circumstances, but industrious; after they had two children their house was burnt down at Nine Partners, where they resided.

After this they had two more children, and concluded to remove to this place, on uncleared land, not one tree having been cut down. They had about $70 worth of cattle. After this her father died and left her some property, with which they hired the clearing done, and paid the purchase money as they could spare it. Her husband had poor health for some time. She was a worsted comber, and combed worsted in addition to taking care of her children, which procured her a little money to buy bread with; her husband was too unwell to cultivate the land. During this time they both occasionally travelled in the ministry, and attended some Monthly Meetings.

She carried her daughter Elizabeth on horseback 350 miles before she was four months old.

She was the first Friend who held a meeting in Peru, having with her their daughter Hannah, a little more than a year old; she had to cross Lake Champlain with two young friends, without a man; they had to lay out all night on an island in the lake in the latter part of the year.

As their children grew up they evinced much seriousness, and their oldest daughter Phebe began to appear in the ministry when she was twelve years of age. At the same meeting their son Nathan appeared in the same line, being about ten years old; and about twenty months after, Martha appeared, being eleven years, and Hannah at nine years. The next was Elizabeth at the age of twenty, then Jemima at nineteen years, the next Joseph in his seventeenth year, and Ludley M. their youngest, in his sixteenth year; the three last not yet recommended, the other five acknowledged. Their daughter Phebe, deceased, leaving five children; she had seven. Her surviving husband, Valentine Meader, is a recommended minister.

Of Joseph Hoag's children, six are now living who are married, and two of their husbands are recommended ministers, and two more appeared in the ministry, but are not yet acknowledged. Joseph and his wife have travelled a great deal in the cause of Truth. Joseph has been absent nine, ten, fifteen, twenty and twenty-one months from home together.

Huldah's journeys have not been so long, not having been more than nine or ten months absent at any one time. A friend who had travelled with Joseph, said he had been acquainted with him for twenty years, and he thought he had been from home nearly half his time. For awhile after coming to Charlotte they had no meeting, but sat in their family, some of their neighbors attending; several joined by conviction, and others moved into the settlement and now two meetings are settled there. The first at Ferrisburgh. They had to walk for a time five miles, and sometimes without shoes to put on. Once she was appointed as representative to their Monthly Meeting, at the distance of seventy-five miles from them, when she had no shoes to wear, but a friend lent her a pair.

They are now on a nice cleared farm, and live comfortably, the situation is beautiful, they have been blessed in every way, and are a blessing to their friends.

Amy Hoag, daughter of Nathan and Abigail Hoag, of Charlotte, began to appear in the ministry in her twelfth year; in the beginning her voice was inaudible, but it gradually became clear and distinct, her manner collected.

Her grandmother Hoag repeated one of her exhortations to me which was nearly if not quite, in these words: "My mind has been deeply impressed with this language: 'If ye will open your hearts, I will come in, and ye shall be my people, and I will be your God.'" She was naturally of a lively disposition, but became serious and solid in her behavior previous to her appearing as a minister.

"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise."

Taken down by Elizabeth Robson.

Copied by Eliza H. Varney, from the one Elizabeth Robson wrote and gave a friend in New England.

John and Ezra Meader were the husbands referred to. They were brothers. John married Elizabeth, and Ezra married Martha.

I was well acquainted with them all, and they were truly nursing fathers and mothers to me the five years I lived in New England.

THE officer who in his ambitious thirst for honor and glory prematurely rushes forth to attack the foe, and so precipitates the battle, disarranging all the plans and calculations of the commander-in-chief, and bringing defeat upon the army,—wherein is he wiser or stronger than the business man who in his undue haste for riches will not wait for the legitimate growth of his fortune, but rushes into speculation and gambling that ruin his manhood even sooner than his business and reputation? The unwillingness of both to wait is essentially akin to the childish impatience of the little maiden who planted her flower-seed one day, and dug it up again the next to see why it had not yet produced any flowers!

Indeed, there have been pastors and Sunday-school teachers whose mode of procedure in the spiritual garden of the Lord was as foolish as that of this little girl. In not a few churches, and as many schools, there is fully as much harm done by impatient zeal as by lack of energy. The rage for immediate results is as strong in the spiritual realm, and as fruitful of evil, as in the temporal. There may be such a thing as "forcing" a crop of tomatoes, berries, or peas to an early harvest; but souls cannot be treated thus without injury or death. Patient waiting is the inevitable condition of reaping a genuine soul harvest. We may now sow and water the seed and the plant, but for the fruit thereof we can only wait; for it is God that giveth the increase. And even analogy should teach us that, as a rule, the time of waiting must be long. In general, the more important and enduring the result, the slower will be the process by which it is attained. It is so in nature. Weeds spring up almost in a night; the mighty oak scarcely matures in a quarter of a century. In the animal kingdom, the longer and more complex the life of the animal, the longer also will be its period of gestation and infancy. In man, the most highly organized and most enduring, the time of waiting for maturity is longest of all. It is but natural then that for eternal results in immortal human characters, the work must be slower still, and the time of waiting longer.—S. S. Times.

[The following extract from a letter to the Editor, by a Friend in North Carolina, revives an instructive passage from the life and experience of John Woolman.—Ed.]

NORTH CAROLINA, Ninth Month 25th, 1892.

"I have been much pleased with 'Wordly Compliance' in a late FRIEND, from the pen of the late T. Evans; it is worthy of thy calling special attention to its contents.

"John Woolman says in his Journal: 'From my early acquaintance with Truth, I have often felt an inward distress, occasioned by the strivings of a spirit in me, against the operation of the heavenly principle; and in this circumstance have been affected with a sense of my own wretchedness, and in a mourning condition felt earnest longings for that Divine help, which brings the soul into true liberty. Sometimes in this state, retiring into private places, the spirit of supplication has been given me; and under a heavenly covering, I have asked my gracious Father to give me a heart in all things resigned to the direction of his wisdom.' Were we all as watchful and concerned now, I believe Divine help would be extended to aid us to live up to the requirements of the present day."

Natural History, Science, etc.

Danger in Running.—Dr. Hammond, of Washington, has collected seventy cases which have occurred in that city during the last ten years, of men dying suddenly from running after street-cars.

Salt-Mines.—The salt-mines of Nevada throw into the shade all others known in the United States. One bed alone covers 15,930 acres, and no bottom to this salt has ever been discovered.

A Tame Partridge.—This bird was found one morning in the neighborhood of Edinburgh, Scotland, lying on the road-side, after a heavy down-pour of rain, drenched and benumbed with cold. It was taken home and placed near the fire, when it began slowly to revive. In a few days, with careful attention, he became all right. At this time he was little bigger than a sparrow, and was very timid. This timidity gradually wore away as he became acquainted with his surroundings. From his peculiar cry he was named Jockey. He soon learned to answer his name; whenever it was cried he would look to see what was wanted. If he was out of sight when his name was called, you could hear the patter of his feet on the wax-cloth as he came running, and with a look of enquiry, pause, as if to say, "well, here I am, what do you wish?"

Jockey was particularly attached to my mother, following her through the house like dog, keeping close beside her as she went about the house. It was most interesting and amusing to see his anxiety when she disappeared from his sight. Jockey would search through the whole house, crying all the while, until found her, when he would cease, and be contentedly picking at anything near.

In the morning when the door-bell was being cleaned, Jockey was to be seen hopping about. Sometimes a passer-by would stop to look at the strange sight of a tame partridge, and make enquiries about him. Jockey objected strongly to such intruders, ruffling himself up and cing loudly at them, which, of course, or added to their surprise. He knew the tingle the bell, and whenever he heard it he was the door to see who was there, and if it was stranger he hurried inside.

When mother had occasion to go out, Jockey was in much distress, running to the door and crying plaintively until she reappeared. His wild nature was very apparent, for he was ever eager to fight at the least provocation; to hold down your hand to him was enough for him to begin the attack, which he could vigorously with his beak. The more fight that was shown the more determined would Jockey become. It was most amusing to see him, if you tried to catch him, run away, and then, if you turned and fled from him, Jockey would wheel round and chase his pursuer, challenging him to combat. On such occasions, with his feathers ruffled and puffed out, and with his majestic strut, he appeared like some game-cock on a war-path.

We had a court-yard, around which there was a flower-border, and here Jockey was at liberty to bask in the sunshine and take exercise, which he occasionally did, running and flapping his wings vigorously.

In order to prevent his flying away, his pin feathers were cut on one side, which made him lop-sided if he tried to fly. Jockey was always on the alert when outside, keeping a sharp look-out for the cats, popping inside the house as soon as they came near, and only venturing out after having satisfied himself that the coast was clear. He had several narrow escapes. Twice he had the misfortune to lose a claw through being accidentally trampled on. Sometimes Jockey was shut in a room unintentionally, when he made himself heard by pecking at the panels of the door, until he was released.

Mother just spoke to Jockey as to a child. At night she used to say to him, "Come and see Jockey, my man, to your bed." If he was in good humor, he obeyed at once, and if not he would dart under a stool, remaining there until he was coaxed out. In the morning, when he heard any one moving about, he would begin pecking at the side of the box which formed his nest. This was the signal to remove the box and let him out. It was surprising to observe what a good memory for people he had—some he liked, and others he as strongly disliked. One little girl, who was a regular visitor at the house, had the misfortune to incur the enmity of Jockey. She no sooner appeared than he began pecking her legs, and latterly, when she came in, she had to be held up on a table, where it was even still a difficult task to guard her from his attacks. It was shrewdly suspected that she had incurred the enmity of Jockey, by giving him an occasional kick. — F. Keddle, of Edinburgh, in his Friends in Wood and Field.

Red Man's Temperance Lecture.—In the densest along the banks of Black River, in Northern Michigan, foxes and wolves are numerous, and occasionally a bear or deer may be seen.

One day a sportsman, after a long chase, succeeded in shooting a deer, and as he was a long way up the river, he decided to call at the nearest Indian hut and borrow a boat to take his game to Sbooyan. He found an Indian working in the woods peeling birchbark, and, thinking to ingratiate himself, he drew from his pocket a flask ofiskey.

"Me no drink whiskey," said the Indian.

"Don't drink whiskey," asked the sportsman, in punishment; "I thought my red brothers all liked iskey."

"Yes, me like it," said the Indian.

"Like it, and don't drink it?" exclaimed the sportsman. "If you like it, why not drink?"

"Me like it, and drink little; brother drink little; he want more; bimeby, heap drunk Injun. Me no drink any," said the Indian.

The sportsman looked at the Indian, then at the iskey, and finally dashed the flask against a stone, making it and emptying the contents upon the ground. He stood gazing at the broken flask, while exclaiming: "Wherefore, if meat make my brother offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth lest I make my brother to offend." I have been rude, but the red man's lecture shall be remembered."

He then told his errand, and the Indian rolled his bark, went to the river with the sportsman, and helped to get the deer into a boat, and took them to Sbooyan.

At parting, the sportsman grasped the red man's hand, and said: "Thank you for your temperance lecture: I shall drink no more."

The Indian smiled, seated himself in the boat, and rowed back to his hut.—Nina Tripp.

The Home Mission Conference of London Yearly Meeting.—From the British Friend we learn that the Conference (provided for by London Yearly Meeting at its last annual session) met in the early part of the Eleventh Month. Much uneasiness had been felt lest the course pursued by the Home Mission Committee should ultimately lead the Society in England into the adoption of the paid pastor-system which now prevails in some parts of America.

The following Minutes were adopted by the Conference, after much discussion:

"This Conference has been engaged in a very serious and deliberate consideration of the subject referred to it by the last Yearly Meeting, and there has been a general desire to affirm our continued adherence to the views ever upheld by us on the subject of authority, right exercise, and freedom of the ministry of the Gospel; to the Headship of Christ, the priesthood of believers, and the nature of spiritual worship. We have had largely brought before us the work carried on under the care of the Home Mission Committee, and the consideration has focused our attention whether it has interfered with or tended to lower the testimony of our Society in these respects.

"Many Friends have stated that the action of the Committee has not been satisfactory to them in many particulars, although the Conference feels assured that it has been their earnest concern to uphold the views of Gospel truth which have distinguished our Society.

"The question of the best constitution of any future Committee, which may be appointed under the direction of the Yearly Meeting, has received much attention. It has been felt to be highly important that the Quarterly and other Meetings throughout the Society should be brought into closer relations with the work, and be thus led to take their fair share of the responsibility and privilege attaching to it.

"This Conference agrees to make the following suggestions to the Yearly Meeting:

"That a Home Mission committee be constituted under the direction of the Yearly Meeting, by appointment of a few men and women Friends, each of our Quarterly Meetings and the General Meeting for Scotland, the names to be reported to the Yearly Meeting; the number from each Quarterly Meeting to be fixed by the Yearly Meeting.

"(2) That it be distinctly understood that the committee so constituted is to act in harmony with our Meetings for discipline throughout the country; and that any Friends who may work in connection with the committee shall seek the sympathy and counsel of the Friends amongst whom they labor, as if they were ordinary members of the meeting, so that they may be kept in their right place, and preserved from the tendency to constitute a separate class.

Despotism of Secret Organizations.—It is a well-recognized principle among Masons that the Master of the lodge wields a power that is absolute over the other members; and any, even the least, disobedience of this authority subjects the offender to punishment. The same despotic authority is exercised in the labor lodges; except that in these this absolute power is exercised, not by a single individual, but by a small number of superior officers. For example: A company of men are working quietly in a factory. They are all satisfied with their employer, and with their wages. They have no grievance whatever. Suddenly a "walking delegate" of the labor lodge to which they belong makes his appearance among them; and, at a sign from him, without a spoken word, they are all compelled by their lodge obligation to lay down their tools and leave the shop. They have sworn to do this, without asking for any reason other than the arbitrary will of their leaders. The power of these leaders is quite as arbitrary and irresponsible as that of a general over his soldiers, in a time of actual war. It is, I think, safe to say, that there are more than one million men in the United States, members of labor organizations, who have surrendered to their superior officers all right of private judgment, in reference to matters vitally affecting themselves and their families, to say nothing of their employers and the community at large. Their slavish submission to their masters is quite as abject as that of the members of a Masonic lodge to their Master. How far this spirit of despotism may prevail in other secret societies, I am not prepared to say; but we have good reason to suspect that there is more or less of it in them all. Certainly, they all very often show a spirit of despotic intolerance toward their fellow-citizens who do not belong to the Lodge.

Now, the true Christian religion is unalterably opposed to despotism, in the church, in the state or in social life; and no Christian can consistently have any affiliation with tyranny of any kind; therefore, the church of Christ should have nothing to do with such secret societies, or receive their members to her fellowship.—Jos. W. Morton in the Christian Cynosure.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 10, 1892.

In the Friends' Review of Eleventh Month 10th, the editor mentions that when attending the recent Conference held at Indianapolis, an influential delegate, in the station of a minister, one who for several years was Clerk of a Western Yearly Meeting, said, in the course of a private conversation, "The religious Society of Friends has ceased to exist; and Friends' Church is inevitably moving in the direction of Methodism." He added, "that the only thing which he saw for him to do was, to accept this movement as inevitable, and to conform himself to it."

Is this the outcome of the movement which has been held up to the view of Conservative Friends as the panacea for the evils that have affected the Church? We have been told over and over, that the way to stop the decline in the number of our members was to adopt the methods of some of the Western meetings, establish Bible schools and resort to revival meetings and similar means for making converts. In those places where these things have been extensively used, we are now told there has arisen an inevitable drift towards Methodism, and that the religious Society of Friends has practically ceased to exist!

That such has to a large extent been the case, is confirmed by the position taken by some of the preachers who were active agents in effecting these results. Many of these were brought up as consistent members of our Society, but becoming imbued with the spirit of change, they laid aside one after another of our testimonies and our doctrines. Plainness of dress was one of the first things they discarded. Plainness of speech soon followed, and then the testimony ever borne by faithful Friends against flattering salutations and ceremonial tokens of respect. When these testimonies were rejected, the way was made easy to give up our system of worship and to rely on the study of the Bible and other intellectual preparation in preaching, instead of waiting on the Lord in pure submission and dependence on his renewal of light and life as the alone qualification for the exercise of the ministry. To many of these who profess to be ministers of the Gospel, the language of Paul to the Galatians is applicable—"If I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor."

The Society of Friends was raised up to be a standing witness to the truth and importance of certain religious principles and the practices which flow from them. If we depart from these, there remains no reason for our continued existence as a separate Body. We freely admit that the Lord has other servants, which are not of this fold; and we can rejoice at any evidence of the Divine blessing resting on their labors. But our usefulness as a branch of the militant church depends on our faithful adherence to those convictions which the Spirit of the Lord has taught us.

It need not cause much discouragement, that comparatively few converts join our ranks. The requirements of true Quakerism are severe. There are many who shrink from the denial of self, the bearing of the daily cross, the full surrender of themselves to the government and guidance of Christ, and the rejection of the worldly spirit, which are the marks of a real Quaker. Nothing but a fresh outpouring of Divine Grace can so change the hearts of the people as to prepare them to undergo these humbling experiences. In the meantime, it is important that those who have themselves come under the government of that Grace which bringeth salvation, should heed the advice—"Whereunto ye have already attained, walk by the same rule and mind the same thing;" and not be induced to enter upon doubtful expedients or schemes to promote religion, which may react on themselves and cause them spiritual loss.

Yet we would not encourage any to slothfulness in the Lord's cause. Our holy Redeemer exhorted his disciples to pray that the Lord would send forth more laborers into his harvest field. George Fox, when near the end of his earthly career, wrote an epistle to "Friends in the ministry," in which he said: "All Friends in the ministry, everywhere, to whom God hath given a gift in the ministry, and who use to travel up and down in the gift of the ministry, do not hide your talent, nor put your light under a bushel; nor cumber yourselves, nor entangle yourselves with the affairs of this world. Stir up the gift of God in you, improve it, and do not sit down, Demas-like, and embrace this present world, that will have an end; lest ye become idolaters. Be valiant for God's Truth upon the earth, and spread it abroad in the daylight of Christ." This advice to ministers may well, in substance, be extended to all who are friends of religion.

May all such, in their several lines of service, "Be valiant for God's Truth upon the earth, and spread it abroad in the daylight of Christ."

A body of one thousand believers in the spiritual principles of our religion, who faithfully maintain the doctrines and testimonies given to our Society in the beginning, are of more value as representatives of Quakerism than twenty thousand who are drifting into some other form of profession.

If any explanation were needed of the causes which have led to separations in several of the Yearly Meetings in the West—such as Western, Iowa and Kansas, it is furnished by the statement quoted by the Review that "the religious Society of Friends has ceased to exist, and Friends' Church is inevitably moving in the direction of Methodism." In such a state of things it can be no surprise that those who retain their attachment to Quakerism, should be impelled by the instinct of self-preservation to get out of the current of degeneracy, and endeavor to sustain meetings held after our ancient order and in harmony with our doctrines and testimonies.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Both Houses of Congress met in Washington on the 5th instant.

The United States Circuit Court at New Orleans, on the 3d inst., decided that the suits for damages against the city government, growing out of the Italian lynchings, must now be tried on their merits. The city filed exceptions to the testimony, as improperly taken in Italy, and alleged that the Court lacked jurisdiction. The exceptions were overruled, whereupon the city filed its answer to the suits. It is believed that the matter will be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States on the question of jurisdiction. The city contends that most of the victims were citizens of Louisiana, and that the suits must be heard in the State Courts.

The public debt statement for Eleventh Month, shows a decrease of about $1,000,000 in the Treasury cash since Eleventh Month 1st, when it was $31,000,000, including subsidiary silver coin, and national bank deposits.

During the fiscal year ending Sixth Month 30th, 1892, 579,663 immigrants arrived in the United States, of whom 2801 came in violation of law and were returned.

A Sioux City despatch says that the Commissioners who have been for some time at work securing signatures of Indians to a petition for the opening of the Yankton Reservation, in South Dakota, have reported that they have secured the requisite number of names. By this 600,000 acres of the most fertile land in the State will be thrown open to the homesteaders.

The plurality of Harrison over Cleveland in Ohio, as officially announced, is 1072. S. M. Taylor's plurality for Secretary of State is 1029. The vote of the Presidential candidates is as follows: Harrison, 405,187; Cleveland, 404,115; Bidwell, 26,012; Weaver, 14,852.

The official returns of the vote in Colorado for Presidential Electors is 93,275, of which the Populist Democrats received 52,982; Republicans, 38,614; Prohibitionists, 1677.

A Providence, Rhode Island despatch says that John Blodgett, United States District Supervisor of Elections, is reported to have found on the voting lists of that city some 2000 names which had no right there. They are those of dead men, mythical persons, minors and non-residents, and have undoubtedly been voted on many times.

A Charleston despatch says it is understood that the liquor men throughout South Carolina have organized an "immense combine" to fight the Childs' prohibition bill, reported favorably by the committee of the State Legislature, "if it becomes a law, which seems now exceedingly likely."

Jay Gould died at his home in New York city, on the 2nd instant, aged fifty-seven years. His vast wealth is estimated at somewhere between $60,000,000 and $100,000,000.

Anthracite coal has been discovered in Hamilton County, Indiana, at a depth of but a few feet below the surface. The find is thought to be in paying quantities, and an organization will be effected to develop it.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 353, which is 49 less than the previous week, and 57 less than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing 203 were males and 150 females: 46 died of pneumonia; 40 of consumption; 35 of diphtheria; 26 of disease of the heart; 14 of marasmus; 12 of apoplexy; 11 of convulsions; 10 of Bright's disease; 10 of bronchitis; 10 of cancer and 9 of scarlet fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, reg., 113 a 114; coupon, 114 a 115; currency, 6's, 104½ a 115.

COTTON was dull and weak on a basis of 10½c. for middling uplands.

FEED.—Sales of choice winter bran at $16.50 per ton, quoted at $15.50 a 16.50 as to quality.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.15; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.75; Western winter, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do., do., straight, $3.75 a $4.00; winter patent, $4.00 a $4.35; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.15; do., patent $4.25 a $4.50; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour is quiet and unchanged. We quote choice Pennsylvania at $3.45 per barrel. Buckwheat flour is in small supply and firm, at $1.80 a 1.90 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 74½ a 74¾ cts.

No. 2 mixed corn, 49 a 49½ cts.

No. 2 white oats, 40½ a 41 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ a 5¾c. good, 5 a 5½c.; medium, 4½ a 4¾c.; common, 4¼ a 4½c.; culls, 3¼ a 4c.; fat cows, 2½ a 3¼c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5¾c.; good, 4½ a 5c.; medium, 4¼ a 4½c.; common, 3¼ a 4c.; culls, 1½ a 3c.; lambs, 4 a 6¼c.

HOGS.—Extra Western, 8½ a 8¾c.; other Western, 8¼c.

FOREIGN.—A despatch of the 3rd instant says: The interest in Europe centers on Paris, where the Government has just been overthrown by the Panama scandal as it is called, which resembles, but surpasses in magnitude, the Credit Mobilier scandal in our own country. It has resulted in unseating the Loubet Ministry, and it has now caused M. Brisson, on whose motion the overthrow occurred, to desist from his attempts to form a new ministry.

A despatch of the 5th says: The French Ministerial crisis is over. To-day President Carnot summoned M. Ribot, at present Minister of Foreign Affairs, and held a long conference with him, asking him to form a Cabinet. M. Ribot asked for time to consider the matter, promising to make his decision known tonight. He kept his promise, and was able to inform President Carnot that he had been successful in forming a Cabinet.

A great meeting of Berlin's unemployed was held in the Friedrichstein quarter on the afternoon of the 2nd instant. The police had taken precautions to preserve order, as a similar meeting preceded the last winter's riots. A number of speakers used incendiary language and were warned by the police. As no heed was paid to the warning, the assemblage was ordered to disperse. All present then formed in procession and marched back to the city. At the Koenigs Thor a slight disturbance arose, which was quickly suppressed.

The Pope has declined to sanction the marriage of Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria to the daughter of the ex-Duke of Parma, because in asking the Papal consent Prince Ferdinand stipulated that the issue of the marriage should be trained as members of the Greek Orthodox Church. The ex-Duke has, therefore, refused to assent to his daughter's marriage to Prince Ferdinand.

The Russian Government, says the Vienna correspondent of the Times, has declined the offer of a French syndicate to finish the construction of the Siberian Railway. No foreign capital or engineers will be employed in furthering the enterprise. The work, owing to the lack of capital, is badly managed and is making very slow progress.

The New York Times correspondent says: The news of the discovery of the Greek text of the Gospel of the Apocalypse of St. Peter, mentioned in these despatches a few weeks back, has created such an interest here that some Cambridge scholars have hurried through an English translation which is now published, with commentaries by Robinson, Fellow of Christ's, a James, who is Dean of King's. This is sharp work since the Greek text only arrived in Cambridge November 17th. There are also the first 30 chapters of the pre-Christian "Book of Enoch" in this find, and these are being edited at Oxford, a slower task, because versions exist in Ethiopic and Church Slavonic, with which they are being compared. St. Peter's Apocalypse is only a fragment of the original work which has been known about so long and is said to have been in circulation as late as Dante's time, and to have given him ideas of the "Inferno." James describes it as being quite the earliest Christian description of hell in the Gospels. A somewhat larger fragment begins abruptly after the account (given alone in Matthew) of Pilate washing his hands. The first sentence says that none of the Jews washed their hands and gives vivid archaic pictures of the ensuing scene with the end much like that of St. Mark. It differs curiously from the other Gospels in the account of the crucifixion. It relates that darkness fell on the cross that many went about with lamps, supposing night.

Christ is described as crying out: "My power, power, thou hast forsaken me!" This confirms what was previously understood from the allusion in St. Paul's Epistle to the Rhossos, that St. Peter's Gospel was written in the interest of the early sect of the Doce who held that Christ only seemed to suffer on the cross. The tale of the resurrection also differs widely from accepted versions. It ends with a personal statement that "I, Simon Peter, and Andrew, my brother, to our nets and went away to the sea." These altogether new discoveries afford a weird kind of pabulum for Scriptural scholars, of which the world will hear great deal for months to come.

The Times' correspondent at Rangoon, British Burmah, says that there is a famine in Kiangmai. The American missionaries are feeding the starving people. The Siamese Government is doing nothing to relieve the distress.

DIED, Tenth Month 27th, 1892, at his residence in Elam, Delaware County, Pa., HARVEY THOMAS, in his eighty-fourth year of his age. A member of Concord Monthly Meeting. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord."

—, Eleventh Month 11th, 1892, LEVI B. STONE, aged eighty-six years and eight months. He was a consistent and esteemed member of Germantown Meeting of Friends. A diligent attender of meeting, and even when unable to do so by reason of disease, he expressed his sorrow that he could not sit with his friends. His mind was exercised during his last illness, that he might be enabled, even through suffering, to occupy one of those mansions of eternal joy prepared for those who love the Lord. We have reason to believe that he entered into the joy of his Lord.

—, Eleventh Month 20th, 1892, at the residence of John Canby, Gwynedd, Pa., JOHN BOUTSEAD, in his eightieth year of his age. A member of Gwynedd Monthly Meeting of Friends.

Rathfriland, 26th, 1791. Attended the usual meeting at Lurgan yesterday, and this morning at Moyallen, both proving seasons of deep-exercising feeling, the doctrine which opened up of a very close nature, and trying to der-, but assistance was graciously afforded, to humble admiration.

In getting so far through this province, it is to me that no superficial work will avail, anything short of a willingness to get down deep feeling with the seed, in its imprisoned oppressed state, and administering as ena- to its wants; in this exercise none can, I ave, have an adequate idea of what conflicts t the poor mind, but those who are thus duced into them. I know my capacity for t understanding, is far inferior to many of rethren and sisters in the work; but it seems uch as body and mind can at times bear, to in my small measure for the hurt of the ghter of my people, too many of whom feel for themselves, and I fear come under the iption of the whole who need not a phy- n; so that though there is abundant balm ilead, they remain unhealed; though there sovereign Physician there, they are unre- d. Among such as these, if anything be ed, it must indeed be a plaintive song, a age of mourning and bitter lamentation, many are falling before the enemy, and car- away captive as into a strange land.

The meeting at Rathfriland on Sixth-day, attended by most of the members and pro- s, a small company, and one, among whom k there was less of the moving of spiritual an in any other spot we have been at. eed of the kingdom felt to me in a state, e it could not be ministered to but by Al- ty power;* the struggle for its arising was, ver, mercifully continued, and through best victory so far experienced, that supplicathe state here opened by Mary Dudley—a state as she represents, "could not be ministered to by Almighty power"—reminds of the Scripture: "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us." Also of the descriptive lines of a Christian poet: "A still small voice is wanted. He must speak, whose word leaps forth at once to its effect; who calls for things that are not, and they come."

tion could be vocally poured forth to the Fountain of light and life: blessed be the name of Him whose throne of grace is ever accessible to faith.

"We returned to our lodgings, and after a season of honest plain dealing with the heads of the family, and feeling with and about the large flock committed to their charge in the wilderness of this world, we felt clear of this trying spot, and proceeded to Stramore.

"Lurgan, 31st. We attended Ballinderry meeting on First-day, which, like all others we have here, was an exercising season; we returned hither, and in an evening sitting in this family, were, through unfailing mercy owned by the overshadowing of the holy Wing.

"Yesterday afternoon we went to see Mary Ann Clibborn, who appears near being removed from a family of eleven children. After a time of religious retirement with the afflicted Friend, we sat awhile with the children and their father in another room, which proved a season of merciful condescension, in not only opening the Gospel spring, but causing it to shed a softening influence, so as to excite a consoling hope that the bread cast upon the waters may not be lost. These visits produced real relief of mind, and indeed our feelings while in the house, tended to renew an humble confidence in the leadings of unerring Wisdom, at the same time bowing in that abasedness of self, wherein the heartfelt language is, 'not unto us, O Lord, but to thy name be the praise, when any little ability is renewed to labor for the promotion of thy blessed cause.'

"I had from the period of our first being in Lurgan felt inclined to return, and though the visit already mentioned was one attraction, there was a further exercise, even the prospect of another meeting, which I wished the inhabitants might attend; but faith was very low, and it was accompanied with, I trust, some little knowledge of myself, so that though I did intimate it, I requested the notice might be confined: the meeting was largely attended by Friends, and many not in profession with us were there also, but an inconsiderable number to what might have been, had faith been strong enough; however, I may thankfully acknowledge it was a season of renewed instruction, and life did in degree triumph over the death that seemed to threaten.

"Gracious regard hath again been manifested in a season of retirement with some young people, and heartfelt satisfaction experienced. Thus we get on in a hobbling way, yet I trust are in our right places so far; a hope which reconciles to difficulties, and helps in a measure to surmount them.

"Maze, near Lisburn, Sixth Month 4th. On Fifth-day morning we went from Lurgan to Ballinderry, sat a meeting there, which was

And

'Till thou proclaim thyself. Theirs is indeed
A teaching voice; but 'tis the praise of thine,
That whom it teaches it makes prompt to learn,
And with the boon gives talents for its use."

rather large, though a widely scattered settlement in a country place; life was exceedingly low, but I thought rather increased towards the last, liberty being felt to deliver close doctrine among them; we took a cold repast in a little cottage near the meeting-house, and Louisa Conran joining us, returned home with her and lodged. Went next morning to the Monthly Meeting at Lisburn, that for worship was passed in silent suffering; the women's meeting was rather a relieving one to my mind. At six o'clock in the evening we attended the Select Meeting, wherein a little light graciously shone, and something of Christian fellowship was witnessed.

"Lurgan, 8th. On First-day I was confined at John Conran's by indisposition, and on Second-day we went to Lisburn and called on a few of the families, which proved a means of relief from some painful feelings. Being so inclined we passed one night under the roof of our tried friend Jonathan Richardson, who lately lost his lovely wife in a consumption. The Monthly Meeting here occurring, we attended it; that for worship rather low, the succeeding one more open, and the Select Meeting in the evening favored in the unity of life, and a time wherein the liberty of the Gospel was felt.

"Lurgan, 13th. We arrived at Rhonehill on Fifth-day, and met as before a truly cordial reception. Next day was the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders, which held long, and was a very exercising season; some circumstances being unpleasantly handled, caused a cloud to darken our hemisphere, but through favor this measurably dispersed, and before our separation a degree of light and life spread over us. The meetings for discipline on Seventh, and those for worship on First-day were very large, and mercifully owned: my faith was low, but access being granted to the throne of grace, ability to labor was experienced, much to the relief of my poor mind, and I trust not to the injury of the precious cause.

"On hearing of the death of Mary Ann Clibborn, I found it best to return hither, though sixteen miles additional riding, to attend the burial; a very large number of Friends and others were assembled on the occasion; we went to the house before meeting, and felt inclined to go again in the evening, which some of us may be thankful we did, from the renewed conviction that it is better to go to the house of mourning than to that of mirth. The bereaved husband and ten children were present at a solemn season, which was marked by feelings of near sympathy, and closed with supplication for support in the day of trouble. The interment this day is the fourth from that house in two years, three children and their mother! These are indeed deeply instructive dispensations.

"The usual meeting at Lurgan on Fourth-day was well attended by the members, and though we had wanted to push forward, we had at this time, cause for adopting the old proverb 'a stop is no let' or real hindrance, believing that our detention was in best ordering, this meeting proving the most relieving to my mind, of any we had sat in this place. Next morning we resumed our journey, and travelled to Antrim, seventeen miles from Lurgan, where only a few Friends reside. We concluded to sit with this poor little flock in their meeting house at six o'clock in the evening; there were several present, who through one means or other had forfeited their right to membership, though we knew not hereof, nor aught about them until after meeting; the line of reproofing doctrine ran closely, while the honest hearted were, I trust, encouraged to hold on their way, and though a suffering season, it closed with renewed cause for humble thankfulness to our Almighty helper.

"Sixth-day, the 17th. We went to Ballymena, near which one family under our name resides. It had been usual for this family to meet Friends who were travelling, at one of the meetings, but I felt an unusual inclination to go to them, though it cost us a few more miles riding, and as soon as we entered the town I thought I understood why the impulse was so strong to visit it; but I kept the pressure my mind was under to myself, and no meeting-house being there, nor Friends residing in the place, felt discouraging. However, on going up stairs at the inn, I observed two rooms with folding doors, which being opened made the whole pretty large; so I gave way to the impression, and had notice circulated of a meeting, to which, besides the few Friends, about forty persons came, who sat in much quietness and solidity during the time of silence. A solemn covering was evident, to the humbling of our spirits, and in the prevalence of Gospel love the testimony of Truth was a little opened, gracious help being afforded beyond what I could have asked or expected, so that I could renewedly say it is good to trust in Thee—yea, none ever trusted and was confounded.

"This morning we set out after breakfast, and a few miles from the town, our guide informing us there was a settlement of Moravians at a little village he pointed to, I inclined to call on them: so we turned off the road and went up to the house of the single sisters, where we were kindly received; and finding that I had been acquainted with many of their people in Germany, produced additional attention to us. They took us over their chambers, chapel, &c., and showed us the various works they wrought, and afterwards requested us to take a bit of bread; we did so in the matron's apartment, who appeared a religious, feeling woman, as was the case with several others of them, and this little visit seemed mutually satisfactory and pleasant. We got here to tea, and purpose remaining over meeting to-morrow.

"Toberhead, Sixth Month 21st. We left Ballinacree Second day morning, and reached this place in the evening, where we met a truly kind reception in the garb of simple hospitality, and feel very comfortable in the humble dwelling of our dear friend Gervas Johnson, attended by his two daughters, who, with their parents, endeavor to make our little tarriance here pleasant, and indeed it is much more so than many superior habitations would prove. At the meeting here this day the house was nearly full of Presbyterians, the preacher, his wife, and the clerk of their meeting amongst them; it was a season of liberty.

"There seems an invitation in these parts, as well as others, to those not professing as we do.

Oh! that all may be gathered to the teaching of Christ Jesus the true Shepherd. Since tea we have been favored with a solemn season together in this family, where the precious life cemented our spirits, and under its prevalence a little of the oil ran through some vessels towards the beloved youth.

"Lurgan, 23rd. We arrived here this evening to tea: we have travelled since this day week about one hundred miles, had five meetings, and several family sittings; the last meeting yesterday at Grange, whence we proceeded to Antrim, nine miles, to lodge. We intend to rest here feeling to require it after this journey, which has been truly exercising every way, but accompanied with a little of that peace which is worth suffering to obtain.

"Maze, Seventh Month, 4th. I was painfully confined more than a week at Lurgan, and feel considerably reduced in strength by this attack, but was enabled to get to meeting there on Fourth-day; My body suffered so much from the exercise which then fell to my lot, that though we had concluded to leave Lurgan the same afternoon, we gave up to rest a day or two longer. On Seventh-day we proceeded hither, and yesterday morning went to meeting at Lisburn, where, as in one I before sat in this place, my mind was deeply pained and oppressed from the prevalence of a spirit which was thirsting for words, and sustained itself on the labor of others, without any exercise of its own, after that food which can alone nourish unto everlasting life. I was strengthened to get some relief by an honest endeavor to deliver what I apprehended was the counsel committed to me, and being out of debt felt a comfortable poverty, very different from what is brought on by withholding what is called for.

The Mir.

In the minds of most persons, who think on the subject at all, there is great confusion about the workings of the Russian government. It is one of the marvels how so many people, of such different ancestries and environments as the Russians, can be corraled and made comparatively satisfied in their several conditions of life.

Another surprise is that the peasant classes are not the conspirators, and are not even dissatisfied with the government. The conspirators are found among the aristocracy, the civil service, the university people and the military. The peasant classes are loyal, and, considering the difficulties in sustaining life in Russia, and the meagre revenues from agriculture and the trades, they are moderately happy. They are not conspirators, because they do not care for any authority beyond their own town or neighborhood. The troubles at Moscow and St. Petersburg do not concern them, so long as they do not touch them. As many in great cities are so accustomed to the cry of fire, that it does not startle them, and the most they do is to feel if the wall next to their beds is hot; so the alarms of Nihilists at Moscow and St. Petersburg concern only those that live there, the peasants having no more interest in them than in volcanic explosions in the moon.

The tillers of the soil in Russia do not belong to the revolutionary classes; they are traditional in sentiment, and live on the past. The Czar is still to them a beautiful and real ideal, the creature of their own creation, and if he has not done all for them that could have been desired, it is because he has been overpowered or thwarted in his purposes. They believe that he will ultimately gain for them the concession from the land-owners that they need, and much desire. They are the most religious people in the world, and believe that the Czar is God, and that God works by him in his own most sovereign way; for, to the Russian peasant God is only a benevolent and omnipotent Czar. It must be known in order to an understanding of the case, that, with the exception of a few abuses, the Russian peasant classes have as much local liberty as have the cantons in Switzerland.

The town meeting, so supreme and well suited to the New England spirit and opinion, in the early days of the colonies, is not a temporary expedient among the common folk of Russia, but an institution which has never been disturbed in all the centuries of Russian autocracy. The town meeting devises and executes all local government. It is composed of all adult males free from paternal authority. This meeting decides all questions of local or municipal government, and from its decisions there is no appeal.

Since the emancipation of 1861, the Czar Alexander has been obliged, in the new conditions which emancipation brought, to change in two or three particulars, the methods of rural self government. It created a special village court, consisting of ten judges, elected by the assembly. Before this necessary innovation, the Mir, or town meeting, was the sole legal tribunal.

The second interference of the imperial government was more hostile to the long-possessed liberties of the people through the town meeting. This was the power bestowed upon a Slovosta, the town mayor, to give legality to certain meetings, and to prohibit others, rather, to discriminate and legalize only such as he convened.

The Mir of Central Russia, and in Southern Russia the Gromada, is the peasant's conception of supreme authority, and the bulwark of the entire community against official intermeddlings. It may be convened by the humblest citizen, and at any time and place, and the communal authorities must respond respectfully to the summons. For failure in duty or respect, the assembly will dismiss them in disgrace, without notice, and deprive them for a time of their citizenship.

The town meetings are held in the tent "not made with hands," and decorated by a canopy of blue, bespangled by star dust, the part of it occupied must be just before the starosta house, or if this is not attainable, then before a tavern or some other convenient place. The meetings are as wild and clamorous as a congress of rooks. There is no presiding officer, and the debates are carried on with the wildest screechings, pullings and shoutings to get attention. The man who has called the meeting rises to explain, and is heard with patience, and probably with respect, for a time, but he is the only one so heard; the rest have to run the gauntlet to be heard or heeded. When the reasons for the meeting are stated, a scuffle ensues, after the order of a cane contest in college. Some are run over in the grand melee; some are shut up because they cannot make noise enough to rise above the din; but all have a chance, for the vote will never be taken until they have talked themselves breathless. If a man has just wind enough to protest, the meeting will wait on him until he has had his say. If the meeting gets a little too boisterous for progress, it divides into smaller groups, which keep on discussing. But this is the froth on the surface; real progress is being made all the time. The town-meeting comes to a satisfactory nd, as it is bound to do, for everything is discussed until it is unanimous.

No such process is known as voting. The town-meeting can end only in unanimity. One side, and then the other, raises a little, or pares the subject down until all are satisfied; all interests are conciliated, and the Mir is of one mind. When this is reached there is no appeal; and all submit. The town-meeting in Russia does not force the views of the majority on the minority. Everybody must make concessions for the general good, and majorities are too wise and generous to take advantage of numerical strength.

The Mir is more a parent than a master—it is everybody's father. This makes the town-meeting so sacred; its discussions are everybody's; and the Russ believes vox populi est vox dei. The people say nobody but God can judge the Mir, and for it each one is ready to fight, suffer and die. In this town-meeting there is not only liberty, but license of speech. The tizens criticise every body and every thing, from the Czar down, but never in the spirit of disloyalty. They treat boldly the burning agrarian question, and often express opinions about the Sacred Imperial authority itself, which would make the hair of a well-bred townsman stand on end. But the peasants never shrink that in expressing their minds on public questions they are breaking the law. The government never interferes.

Nothing is more surprising than the radical differences in the institutions which prevail in the peasant classes of Russia, and the institutions which regulate the lives of its upper classes. The former are essentially republican and democratic; the latter are based on imperial despotism, and organized on the strictest principles of bureaucratic control.—The Presbyterian.

English Hedges.

The aspect of the Midland Counties, the Merca of the Heptarchy, and indeed that of all the land counties of England, differs greatly from that of any part of the United States of America, even from Pennsylvania, that most English-looking of the States. What is more, it differs enormously from the aspect of the interior of any of the countries of Western Europe, from that of France, of Spain, of Italy, each of which has its own peculiar facies. It is not alone in the people, their dress and their houses, that these differences reside. Place yourself in a position where a square mile of country is visible, though not a house or a human being is in sight, and yet, if you have visited all these countries, you can at once feel certain whether you are in the interior of Pennsylvania, England, Gaul, Spain, or Italy. I say the interior, because between rocky coast and rocky coast, sand-dune and sand-dune, there is considerable similarity all the world over, just as there is between any two large cities, the inhabitants of which live in flats. Neither does the difference reside in the geological nature of the country viewed, since all the countries named are endowed with a most varied geological structure. The scenery around Warwick and Worcester does not bring to mind that of the Triassic district north of Philadelphia, nor do the chalk districts of France, except near the sea-coast, vividly recall those of England. There is no botanical contrast, the flora of Western Europe, that of England plus a few additional species. Between the latter and the Eastern United States there is a greater difference in this respect, yet not the contrast that exists between the Pacific and the Atlantic slopes.

In all civilized countries man has had power to impress his national peculiarities upon the face of the earth itself in so unmistakable a way that not even an almost identical flora and a similar geological structure will bring about resemblance. Even though the clothing and the residences of the country people may be absent from the picture, their modes of cultivation, their fences, their roads, even their foot-paths, bear witness to the nationality. Nowhere out of England can a hedge be found resembling an English one. A privet-hedge, a box-hedge, a holly-hedge, even a hawthorn hedge, may be imitated, but none of these will be a successful copy of an English hedge. Hawthorn is its basis, but into its composition enters every bush and shrub that tenants the kingdom, besides herbaceous plants in most complicated variety. Moreover, an English hedge is not complete without an English ditch, in the bottom of which there is often running water.

Upon the bank of the ditch grow violets and primroses in the early spring, and later on a little forest of umbellifers and composites intermingled with trailing convolvuli and leguminous plants. For the body of the hedge the basic hawthorn is frequently in the minority, overwhelmed for considerable stretches by unruly elm and aspiring ash, by privet and oak, by blackthorn, even by rose-briars of such dimensions as to constitute an integral part of the hedge. It is in these hedges that the English maple abounds, trimmed into thick bushes by the bill-hook of the hedger, for, though maples are not as conspicuous in the English woods as they are in the American, there is such a thing as an English maple, and in the southern counties it often grows into a handsome little tree. Its leaves are small and five-lobed, dark-green in color, and with a tendency to a coppery tint. The hedge is the last refuge of the blackberry-briars that, hunted mercilessly from pastures and well-kept roadsides, manage to perfect among the friendly covert of the hawthorn the fruit so highly prized by the truant school boy. Over and through the bushes, often in close proximity to the innocent, mis-called berries of the briar, the trailing, sickly-green foliage of the bitter-sweet (Solanum dulcamara) is abundant, and its pretty red berries hang in tempting bunches.

There are orderly hedges and disorderly, and every stage between, from the trimmed hedge around a garden, where interloping shrubs have but little chance, to the field hedge trimmed once a year, and the neglected one that has been allowed to grow at its own will for a succession of seasons. Such a hedge as the last named is a paradise to the botanist, though it is a curse to the unlucky farmer who leases the long-uncared-for farm, for not only have such components as oak, ash, and elm increased into small and untidy trees, but the bank and ditch are a tangled mass of meadow-sweet, blackberry-briars, sweet-scented willow-weeds, red lychnis, ragged-robin, bladder catch-fly, meadow-rue, tall rag-worts, mallows, and big red thistles.—*W. "THE SPEECH OF LYCAONIA."—We know from other sources that there was a strange medley of languages in this part of Asia. Many different races had in turn taken shelter under the roots of the Taurus Mountains, and the name of the adjacent province, Pamphylia, signifies a mingling of races. Greek, in which, doubtless, the apostles addressed them, would be perfectly understood only by the educated and the traders. The multitude stood in mute astonishment till they saw the miracle. They burst out with exclamations of amazement in their mother-tongue, and inferred that the gods in human form had revisited the earth. An old legend of Lycaonia would justify this belief. It is preserved by Ovid in the story of Baucis and Philemon, who, in this very region, when Jupiter and Mercury had come down, in human disguise, as poor men, to visit the earth, and had been refused admittance by all the inhabitants, received them in their lowly hut. The gods punished the land by overwhelming it with a deluge, when all perished save Baucis and Philemon, whose hut remained above the flood, and was transformed into a magnificent temple. We have evidently in this tale a distorted tradition of Noah's flood. It was very natural that this simple people, to whom the legend was familiar, should at once, on seeing the miracle, accept this as a second visit of their deities. Recent researches have enabled us to ascertain with some probability what language was the speech of Lycaonia. It is clear that Paul and Barnabas did not understand it, for it was only when victims and garlands were about to be presented to them as gods that they became aware of the mistake into which the simple, idolatrous people had fallen. They had partly understood Paul when he addressed them in Greek, as a gathering of Welshmen might understand English, but they expressed their own excitement in their native dialect. Now at Ibrez, north-east of Tarsus, and not far from the site of Derbe, where stand three ancient Christian churches now in ruins, has been recently found a colossal sculpture of two human figures in relief, with Hittite inscriptions, something after the fashion of the Assyrian sculptures. The inscriptions have not yet been deciphered, but their origin is undoubted. Other inscriptions of the same character have been discovered in Cappadocia, on the road which leads from Iconium through the pass called the Cilician Gates. They are certainly long anterior to the introduction of Greek art, and must belong to the period when the Hittites, whose monuments have now been found all through Eastern Asia Minor, ruled the country. This language possibly continued to be the vernacular of the people down to the time of Paul.

"OXEN AND GARLANDS."—The ox was the special sacrifice to Jupiter, the king of the gods; and the victim was always bedecked with garlands and long wreaths of flowers twined round the horns and neck before the sacrificial knife was inserted. The officiating priest also wore a wreath of the flowers or leaves of some plant sacred to the deity to whom the offering was to be made. That the populace of Lystra should so soon afterwards be persuaded to turn from worship of the strangers to stoning them is in accordance with what we know of the character of the Lycaonians, who are said by the scholiast on Homer, as well as by Cicero, to be a fickle and perfidious race. But the stoning was doubtless suggested by the Jews from Iconium, as this was exclusively a Jewish mode of punishment. As we find no mention of a synagogue, the Jewish inhabitants were probably few, though among them was the family of Timothy, who now for the first time heard the Gospel message.—H. B. Tristram, in the S. S. Times.

FROM THE "BRITISH FRIEND."

FAITH, HOPE AND CHARITY.

SEWELL'S HOMELY BALLADS.

A gallant ship went out to sea
From Scotland's rocky shore,
And with her sailed one hundred men
To dig for golden ore.

The anchor rose, the sails were set,
And steady blew the breeze;
And merrily the vessel went
Across the tossing seas.

From morn till night her course she kept,
The land was still in view,
And passengers upon the deck
Oft sighed a long adieu.

The second day was at an end,
And night came slowly down,
But still upon the distant coast
They saw a lighted town.

Then darkness settled on the ship,
And o'er the ocean crept,
And, ere the middle of the night,
All but the seamen slept.

Oh! many went to sleep that night,
On whom no morn shall rise;
And many closed their eyelids then,
To waken in the skies!

And many hearts beat true and warm,
For those they ne'er would save;
And many hopes were buried then,
Beneath the green sea wave.

A heavy fog came stealing down,
And o'er the waters spread—
So thick, the steersman scarce could see
A dozen yards ahead.

There was a moment, and no more,
No warning crossed the sea—
An Indianman, with crowded sails,
Bore down upon their lee.

No time to tack, to give her room,
No time to wake the men;
The mighty vessel ran them down,
Then bore away again!

The eddying waves closed o'er the wreck,
Then rolled on as before;
And that ship's company went down,
To sail the sea no more!

A fisherman upon the beach,
At early break of day,
Observed an object on the tide
That rolled within the bay.

'Twas not the seaweed's heavy mass
Which clogged the billow's swell;
'Twas not the wood of rifted wreck
That floated on so well.

The fisherman strode boldly in,
And, ere it reached the strand,
He seized upon a floating form,
And bore it to the land.

It was a child—a little girl—
Of some ten years or more,
That here the cold, remorseless wave,
Was casting on the shore!

And pitiful the look he bent
On that young form so fair;
And tenderly he wiped the face,
And wrung the heavy hair.

"I'll take her home to Margaret,
And see what she can do;
If life is in the body yet,
She's sure to bring it to."

Within his dwelling on the beach
He laid the body down;
And every means the good wife used
That she had heard or known.

The youthful limbs were barely hid
By clothing for the night;
And heavy lay the closed lids
On eyes that once were bright.

The soft round cheek was cold and blue,
That erst was like the rose
That opens in the early dew,
When morning zephyr blows.

The sweet young mouth was tightly closed,
As if 'twere closed in pain;
Oh! will the warm blood ever tinge
Those livid lips again?

But Margaret's patience wearied not:
She feels the warmth return,
The little heart begins to move,
The breath she can discern.

And do we say—"Thy cares forego,
And let the floweret die;
The tender bud, though blighted now,
Will blossom in the sky:

"The storms of life may beat it down,
And sin may yet prevail;
Or poverty, with cruel hand,
May crush that flower so frail:

"Oh! let it die?"—but so said not
The heart of Margaret;
Her cheerful hope, like jewel bright,
In simple faith was set.

Life was to her a sacred gift,
A high and priceless thing,
To which the blessed Son of God
Did free salvation bring.

That grace came not to her in vain;
She heard the heavenly voice,
That often now within her soul
Said, "Margaret, rejoice!"

The living stream that healed her heart,
Descending from above,
Left not a barren soil behind,
But rich in fruits of love.

The weeping stranger told her tale
To no unfeeling ear,—
Her little brothers all were drowned,
And both her parents dear.

And she had no relations left—
Now they were in the sea;
They all had left their pleasant homes
Upon the banks of Dee.

"Fear not, my lamb," said Margaret,
"I will your mother be;
And you shall be as merry here
As on the banks of Dee.

"Here's Marianne, and Isabel,
And John, and little Jane;
And you shall be their sister dear,
And think 'tis home again."

The little orphan raised her lips
To kiss good Margaret's cheek;
But grief lay heavy on her heart,
And words she could not speak.

But ere that many weeks had flown
Her sorrow died away,
And little Jessie sang as blithe
As merry birds in May.

Down to the fisher's lowly cot
The busy neighbors came—
"If you take in that friendless child,
I think you'll be to blame.

"I'd send her to the Union House,
And there I'd let her be."
Said Margaret, "The Lord has sent
That little one to me.

"I should not, of myself, have thought
A thing like this to do;
But if God laid it out for me,
Why, He will bring me through."

"You know," another kindly said,
"You have already four;

And though you're decent, honest folks,
Still you are reckoned poor."

"And we are poor, and very poor,
I know," said Margaret;
"But God can show my husband where
To cast his fishing net.

"For He who made fish, you know,
Can guide them as they swim;
The widow and the orphan child
Held promises from Him."

"Well, you must please yourself, of course;
But, in my humble thought,
You're taking on yourselves more care Than working-people ought."

"It may be so—I know," she said,
"But still I am content,
I have a feeling in my mind
That we shall not repent.

"If your sweet darling little Bell,
Should ever have the lot
To be shipwrecked and cast away,
And no friend near the spot—

"Would you bless with all your heart
The man who took her in,
And made a father's home for her
In this sad world of sin?"

"Well, neighbor, that is very true;
It makes my feelings stir,
To think that such a cruel fate
Could ever come to her.

"No doubt the gentlefolks would help,
If you would state the case;
She is an interesting child,
And has a pretty face."

A cloud passed over Margaret's brow,
But still her voice was kind:
"I'd rather not ask charity,
It always hurts my mind;

"And 'twill be time to think of that
If we should get too poor;
I think that He will bring her bread
Who brought her to our door."

And so the neighbors went away,
And many shook their head:
They said she was a feeling soul,
But wofully misled.

And Margaret—she sat down to read
The Book that gave her light;
And as she read, she strongly felt
That she was doing right.

In fact, it seemed as clear to her
As noonday in the sun,
That they would ne'er repent the thing
Which they in faith had done.

The fishing-boat went out to sea,
The fishing-boat came back,
And whichever way it went,
The fish were in its track.

When raging tempests roused the sea,
And sailors found their graves,
Unharm'd the little fishing-boat
Lay rocking on the waves.

For He who walked upon the sea,
And chose his dearest friends,
From poor and lowly fishermen,
The fishing-boat defends.

No harm can ever touch the thing
Committed to his care;
Nor can a million voices drown
The voice of earnest prayer.

And He repaid the simple trust
Of faithful Margaret,
And daily taught her husband where
To cast the fishing-net.

The fishing-boat went out to sea,
The fishing-boat came back,
And whichever way it went,
The fish were in its track.

Extracts from the Diary of Louis Taber.

1851.—I left home in the Fourth Month to pay a visit to my dear mother. She had been suffering for many months with a cancer in her right breast, and there was no prospect of her recovery.

On my way I attended Philadelphia Yearly Meeting for three days, with pleasure and profit. I thought that the promise to the church of Philadelphia formerly would be verified to them. Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth." Through the cupidity of railroad agents I met with some attention on my journey, but arrived at my destination with improved health. Mother was not expecting me so soon, and was much overpowered by our meeting. I found her suffering patiently most excruciating torture from her disease.

She often slept but little if any at night, and through the day would be afflicted with most acute suffering. Her patience and fortitude were truly very remarkable. She was able to be about her room, and had intervals of ease and would be quite cheerful. We could then visit her, and spent most of my time with her. It was truly distressing to witness her sufferings without the possibility of affording any relief.

During the time of my stay, I attended a Monthly and a Quarterly Meeting of the little number who stand for the law and the testimony.

I thought the good Master was with us, and loved them, and their work, and that if circumstances should require it, it would be my place to stand by them and to stand with them. Faith and true Friends will yet own them. I met here with my brother and his wife, Silas and Anna Taber, who came to see "mother." Two days before I intended to leave, I received telegraphic despatch from Mary Ann, saying, that Rachel had been sick for two weeks, and she wished me to return. I took my last leave of mother. At our parting opportunity she spoke tenderly and beautifully to us, and the loved accents of my dear mother lingered with me like the voice of an angel from the land of the blessed. She said in substance that we must not think too much of her sufferings; she trusted strength would be given her to bear her allotted portion of affliction. She was very glad we had come to see her once more in this world, and if now we must be finally parted she trusted it would be well with her, and that we might be permitted to meet in those blissful mansions above, where there would be no more parting or suffering or sorrow, but rivers of gladness, and pleasures at his right hand for evermore.

Mother continued to fail and to suffer through the summer. Her left breast became affected and her left arm swollen, inflamed and painful. She could not lie down for a number of weeks and required two and three attendants, yet she did not repine or murmur. She said, "Give love to all my friends and tell them when I am gone it will be well with me."

She died Ninth Month 21st, 1851, aged sixty-three. Her close was calm and peaceful; her funeral large and solemn. She is resting from her labors and her works follow her. It was a season of thankfulness and rejoicing rather than sorrow to know she was released from all her earthly conflicts, and that her redeemed and purified spirit was sweetly reposing in one of those blessed mansions prepared (by the Lord) for his children from the foundation of the world.

My mother's mother, Hannah Carpenter, died of the same disease, and at the same time of life, in the sixty-third year of her age.

From an early period of life, even from a child, my soul was frequently broken and tendered before the Lord, and in some of these seasons when it was shown what would be required of me, and the lamp of the Lord shone around me, came the voice of the Holy Spirit, "Follow Jesus," "Love and trust thy Heavenly Father and He will be with thee through all, and thou shalt be a child of his and He will care for thee!" Ah! had I so loved and trusted and been faithful, how much of mental conflict would have been spared me, and how much farther might I now have been on my spiritual journey towards the land of promise? But I have not been sufficiently watchful and prayerful, and my mind has been frequently too much occupied with the things of this present life. My religious duties have been, I trust, measurably performed. When able, I have regularly attended meeting, but often in a cold and indifferent state, which I believe is now prevalent amongst us. A few times my Master has opened my mouth in a few words, and subjects have often presented without any command to break the bread and hand to the multitude.

I often fear, even if my life should longer be given for a prey, that I shall never attain to much usefulness. But God knows best what is best for his children, and how to accomplish his own purposes. My petition often is, as that of Moses, "If thy presence go not with us, carry us not up hence." Nothing is to me more painful than lifeless and unsanctified offerings, or more refreshing than a living baptizing ministry. Since the death of my mother, when this language has been revived, "Our fathers where are they? and the prophets do they live forever?" it has been sealed upon my spirit, that if I will be faithful, her mantle will rest upon me! Oh! might I be but as humble, as little, as lively, as faithful in my gift, then could the one talent be returned with thankfulness, and doubled to my hand.

MOUNT PLEASANT, Ohio, First Month, 1852.

(From a letter to M. H. B.)

Ninth Month 20th.—Dear Brother: While we were assembled to pay the last sad rites to our dear departed sister, I felt that it was a fearful and solemn thing to break the silence of so deeply interesting an occasion. Yet may I truly acknowledge my spirit was bowed down in sympathy and in sorrow with thee, my bereaved brother, and with thy lonely and stricken daughter Lydia. For I afresh remembered how in years long gone by, and far away in another land, we followed to her last resting place here below, the remains of one beloved by us all, but a sister dear to thee. In the morning of her existence and while she was prepared and waiting to become a chosen bride on earth, she was taken by the Bridegroom of souls to become the companion of angels in that celestial city whose Builder and Maker is the Lord.* And I felt that the tear of sympathy for the living and of sorrow over the dead might be forgiven us, when I remembered that on a similar occasion our great Example, even Jesus wept. And now that thou hast been called to leave the remains of the chosen and cherished and faithful companion of thy life as with strangers in a distant land, the hearts of many who have known the depths of sorrow are prepared to sympathize with thee and with you. But we have cause to believe that through the merit and mercies of our Redeemer, her purified spirit (with that of my own dear mother) is now sweetly reposing in one of those mansions prepared for his followers from the foundation of the world.

* Her funeral was the day on which she would have been married.

First Month 18th, 1853.—After retiring last evening, we were called up and informed of the sudden death from apoplexy of our dear mother Rachel Hill. My dear M. A. went immediately to father's and I staid with the children. Fervent were my supplications to the throne of grace that we might be sustained under this great and sudden bereavement. When we reflect upon the shortness of life, and the suddenness with which we may be called, how transitory, how worthless appear all sublunary things! A few more mornings and evenings, of day stars and twilights, and the shadows of death will close around us. It has been a long and lonely day with me.

On the 20th her remains were interred in Short Creek burying ground. Many of her neighbors and friends were in attendance. We had a sweet and solemn but mournful opportunity. The silence was unbroken except by the utterance of these few words, "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints," and "Be ye also ready for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh."

Seldom has it been required of me to present an offering in our meetings, and I have often been under discouragement almost fearing that through unfaithfulness I had grieved away the good Spirit of Grace. With some of my dear brethren and sisters I have often had to be clothed with sorrow when unsanctified offerings have been laid upon the altar of the Lord.

First Month, 1855.—Oh! how does a ministry in the mixture and out of the pure Truth wound and afflict the best and true life.

We have passed through a painful separation in our Yearly and subordinate Meetings. I find it to be my place to stand very much alone in our family here, being separated in religious communion and fellowship from some of my nearest and dearest relatives. This is a sorrow none can fully know who have not felt the keenness of such a separation. I feel that I must travel much alone in my spiritual journey towards the land of promise. Nothing but the sustaining hand of my Heavenly Father could have supported me through the changes and trials which have been allotted to me in my earthly pilgrimage.

At our little comfortable meeting, since the separation the assurance has been mercifully felt, and has been expressed, that the Lord does know his own children wherever they may be scattered, up and down through the land, and whatever men may say unto them, and do unto them, as they continue faithful, He will preserve and keep them even unto the end. And as their abiding continues to be in the everlasting patience, and in the faith which was once delivered to the saints, they will know an overcoming, and be permitted to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Fear not little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." All the faithful and obedient will finally be gathered. But most fully do I believe that it was in the ordering of Truth though it may have been too much in human weakness and infirmity that a stand has been taken against the innovations amongst us. Painful as is a separation, no decision of any, or all the other Yearly Meetings can convince the faithful standard bearers among us here that it could be right to have submitted to the course pursued by those who have separated from us. When time has been given us to prove our allegiance to our Divine Lord and Master, and the storms and tempests which now assail our beloved and once peaceful Society shall have passed over, it will be made more fully manifest to our brethren and sisters of other Yearly Meetings, and the world at large, not only that we have not departed from the principles and practices of Friends, but that we have been endeavoring to contend for the faith of our forefathers, the same as that once delivered to the saints. My earnest desire and prayer for Israel—all that are of the true Israel—is, that they may be saved. May I be numbered among the faithful who like good old Daniel will be found standing in their lots at the end of the days.

At our last Monthly Meeting, the desire of David was brought before me, "Oh, that one would give me to drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem." My heart was made glad in believing there were not a few among us whose spirits desire to partake of those living waters clear as crystal, proceeding from the throne of God, and to eat of the fruit of the tree of life, which had twelve manner of fruits and yielded her fruit every month, and the leaves of her tree were for the healing of the nations,—which, with much more was expressed, and Friends seemed satisfied.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Condensed Food.—Coffee may be prepared so that a small lozenge will make a cup of the beverage. After roasting the bean, an infusion of it is made in large vessels, holding 240 pounds at a time. The liquid is drawn off into an evaporating tank. The air is withdrawn by an air-pump, and the liquid rapidly evaporates under the heat of steam-pipes. When it is reduced to the consistency of molasses, it is drawn out of the tank and poured into trays of enamelled ware, in which the coffee is reduced to a dry solid. This is scraped from the trays, ground into powder and moulded into lozenges.

Eggs are sold in a shape resembling sawdust. The whites and yolks are evaporated to dryness, and then scraped from the pans and ground.

When condensed milk was first introduced, the inventor carried the daily supply for New York city in a ten-quart pail. It has now grown to be an enormous business. The inventor died worth $7,000,000, made out of the business.

We have now concentrated apple-juice, jellies, cocoanut and other preparations.

Sea Volcanoes.—Volcanic disturbances at sea have been quite numerous of late. One of the most interesting reports is that given by Captain Seward, of the schooner Dora Seward, who reports the following experience in the neighborhood of Atkha Island:

"The sea itself I have never known to be so disturbed. The roll of the waves was broken, and the water hissed and seemed to boil, while at a little distance away, not more than a half-mile, it appeared to us, a light steam vapor spread itself over the surface of many hundreds of yards. I could hardly keep my feet, and the men were holding to the rigging, their faces very pale. They couldn't comprehend the mystery, and, in fact, I felt a little queer myself. The mate tried to hold the wheel steady, but it was a sorry effort. He said the spokes seemed like the handles of an electric battery, from which a succession of sharp shocks was produced. At the time there was not more sea than one would expect from the wind, and there was no land in sight. Pamice and other evidences of subaqueous eruption were found a few hours later floating in quantity, and I congratulated myself on the fact that we had escaped a more severe experience. Volcanoes have been active in that region since 1796, but I never heard of anyone before passing over an active one."

From several portions of the South Pacific Ocean similar reports have been received. They indicate more than usual volcanic activity beneath the ocean, and stimulate scientific research in regard to phenomena as yet but imperfectly understood.

Poaching for Birds.—The net that is used on such occasions for winged game, is the most destructive of all appliances. It is generally made of silk, and measures about fifty yards in length, and forty yards in breadth.

The mode of working the net is very simple. When the moor is reached, a light bull's eye lamp of the smallest size is firmly fastened on the head of a well-trained pointer dog. The ends of the net are fixed to two poles twelve feet in length. When the poachers are ready to start, the dog is unloosed, and the two men follow up, dragging the net along the ground.

The zig-zag movements of the dog are easily watched, and when he makes a sudden stoppage, this is the certain signal that he is in the neighborhood of a covey of birds concealed in the heather. The poachers proceed rapidly to where the dog has taken up his position, and make a semi-circle with the net. The dog leaps forward, the unsuspecting birds rise, and the chances are fifty to one that they will rush into the upraised net, which is at once let down, enclosing the whole covey. The men strike them down by means of a hazel cane. A good haul is from twelve to forty, sixty, eighty. I have known expert poachers bag seventy brace before dawn of day. — Friends of Wood and Field.

The Homing Instinct.—A farmer of the name of James lived for some at Severn Farm, Quedgeley, and had a terrier dog that was specially attached to his wife, and always slept at the foot of her bed. Two of the sons of the old couple determined to try their fortunes in another land, and started for America, taking the terrier dog with them. They took ship at Bristol for New York, and then continued their journey upon a canal with many locks. At one of these locks, about one hundred miles from New York, they lost the dog. They wrote home telling of their misfortune, and greatly deploring it, as the dog was much valued by the whole family. Before the letter arrived, "Jock" was found one evening in his old place at the foot of — James's bed. It was proved that he somehow missed his young masters at the lock, and had returned to New York, and there had sought out the vessel in which they had come over from England. Fortunately for the intelligent little creature, it was still in harbor, and was soon going back to Bristol. "Jock" it was found, had insisted on being taken on board. Arrived at Bristol, he smelt out a Severn barge, and succeeded there also in inducing the boatmen in charge to take him as a passenger. He evidently knew that these barges passed the door of his old home on the river bank. When the barge he had chosen arrived at a spot opposite Severn Farm, "Jock" jumped overboard and swam ashore. In this way he arrived home some time before the letter from America telling of his loss.

English Buzzard.—Buzzards have been kept as pets. M. Fontaine makes mention of one that was brought to him. It was—Cassell's Natural History tells us—very wild at first, but soon became tame enough to eat out of its master's hand, and to walk about the garden, coming to be fed when called upon. It was now given complete liberty and flew away. Of course it was given up for lost, but in some hours he rushed into the house in great haste followed by four or five other buzzards.

Its fidelity was now no further disturbed, it came every night to sleep on its owner's window, and grew so familiar as to take singular pleasure in his company. It attended constantly at dinner; sat on a corner of the table and very often caressed him with his head on a bill, emitting a weak, sharp cry, which, however, it sometimes softened. This privilege was peculiarly its master's; and one day it followed him when he was on horseback more than two leagues, flying above his head.

Although not the least afraid of dogs and cats, it had to them a strong aversion, and often had tough battles with them, in which it came off victorious. "I had," says M. Fontaine, "four very strong cats, which I collected in my garden with my buzzard; I threw to the cat a bit of raw flesh; the nimblest cat seized the rest pursued; but the bird darted upon her body, bit her ears with his bill, and squeezed her sides with his talons so forcibly that the cat was obliged to relinquish her prize. After another cat snatched it the instant it dropped, but she suffered the same treatment, till the buzzard got entire possession of the plunder. He was so dexterous in his defence, that when he perceived himself assailed at once by two or four cats, he took wing and uttered a cry of exultation. At last the cats, chagrined with the repeated disappointment, would no longer contend.

This buzzard had a singular antipathy to covered heads. He would not suffer a red cap to be worn by any of the peasants; and so aloof was he in whipping it off, that they found their heads unaccountably bare. He also snatched away wigs, but without doing any injury.

He carried these useful articles to the nearest and tallest trees, where he hung them up.

Skepticism vs. Credulity.—It is an observation that has frequently been made, that some persons who are skeptic in matters of religion, frequently believe in things that most men of sense reject. Lowell says: "I have observed that many who deny the inspiration of the Scripture hasten to dress their balance by giving a reverend credit to the revelations of inspired tables and camp-stools."

New Hebrides Superstitions.—On going out one afternoon I observed a number of natives quietly a commotion at the garden gate; it was evident that some subject of unusual interest was engaging their attention.

One of the village teachers from a district five miles down the coast then came forward with a curious basket in his hand, holding it almost arm's length, and holding it tightly as if it had been a slimy fish that would escape from his grasp. The contents of the basket were turned out and re was the ordinary stock in trade of a sorcerer ought and laid at my feet.

Carefully wrapped up in some leaves was a section of bamboo filled with a substance the composition of which is wood charcoal and a burned card, powdered up, and in evil hands said to have the power of bewitching women, stealing their arts, and leading them into evil ways; then there is a quantity of red pigment used, then another object of a different character was brought out, this is a sacred stone or idol. These stones are supposed by the natives to be inhabited by certain spirits, and, by propitiating them, wind or rain may be made or enemies may be destroyed by disease and death.

It is hard to root out in a single generation these perstitious notions. The suspicion that there may be truth and reality in these dark doings lingers long in the native mind, even after religious truth has apparently been received. But, on this occasion, the force of public opinion had got too strong to further tolerate this sorcerer's doings. He had been compelled to give up his bag; and after a concave of head men had talked the matter over, a man was expelled from that district for three years; at the end of which time, if he has given up his evil doings, he may return to his own tribal lands. Not many weeks afterward another of my five assistants brought two flattish round stones about the size of duck eggs. These stones had been given up by one who had long withstood the Gospel call. They had been in the possession of the family for three generations, which must have been over a hundred years, and used to be of considerable importance in connection with heathen ceremonies.

For many years these two stones had been hidden; the general public knew nothing of their whereabouts as the island had become professedly Christian; but the chief of that district, who was once a wild savage, underwent a saving change; not suddenly, but by degrees the temper of the lion became the comparative meekness of the lamb.—The Independent.

Religious Disputes in Germany.—How great the division is in Germany between Protestants and Roman Catholics can be seen from the fact that a papal crusade at Treves was carried out some months ago, brought suit against a Protestant student of theology, Wilhelm Reichard, who had published a brochure criticising the whole affair. The best talent was engaged on both sides, and the young man was condemned to imprisonment for six weeks and his publisher to three. The case has now been appealed, and will undoubtedly reach the Supreme Court of the Empire at Leipzig.—Independent.

Prohibition in Des Moines, Iowa.—The following testimony in regard to the practical workings and effects of prohibition is from the pen of John J. Hamilton, editor of the Des Moines Daily News. He says: "In my own city of Des Moines, I have seen prohibition, though poorly enforced, do that which, if generally accomplished in American cities, would make this republic a model. In ten years a city of twenty-three thousand people, ruled by a corrupt, corrupt and powerful municipal ring, and a sad extremes of wealth and poverty, has been transformed into a city of seventy thousand and orderly, contented and prosperous people; with almost no business failures; with savings banks piling up large deposits; with last week's bank clearances only two hundred per cent. greater than those of the corresponding week of last year, and this gain going on constantly; with the workingmen, once the engine of misrule, now a reliable power for honesty in public affairs; with the better elements in control at all times and carrying all city elections, almost without effort; with the worse elements discouraged and submissive; with churches and schools dominant, and with nearly three thousand students enrolled in colleges within the city limits.

This did not come without fierce opposition, rioting, and even assassination; but it has come, and it is what America needs everywhere, even if it must involve martyrdom here and there."

We recently received a letter dated Eleventh Month 4th from a Friend in a distant city, where there are very few persons resident who belong to our religious Society; and who, in consequence, sits down at stated times and holds meetings for Divine worship with his own family and the few others who incline to sit with them. The letter thus describes an incident that happened the day he wrote:

"A man not a Friend, but a minister, called on me to-day, having heard that the 'Friends' Church' had no pastor. He offered his services for the position, and agreed to stir us up and build up a church, as he had assisted in other Friends' Meetings, in neighboring States. Salary could be left to later consideration, after we had ascertained his value. He seemed a good man, but very vague about Geo. Fox's notions regarding worship and the ministry.

"I assured him that those who sat with us must be satisfied with their present way of doing, and gave him some information as to how conservative Friends did in such matters, and our belief regarding them. After some discussion, this would-be-pastor of a Quaker Meeting, in search of a job, moved on, fully persuaded that I was not enterprising; and I think with lingering hopes that some Friends here would find a place for him. But I anticipate no trouble as far as he is concerned. He has last been employed in Stirling, Kansas."

This simple incident illustrates one of the features connected with the pastorate system. Among Friends, the members all pursue their outward business on which they depend for the support of their families. If the Head of the Church requires any one of them to publicly advocate his cause, He furnishes them with the message to be delivered, and with the necessary authority and ability. They are not required to spend the intermediate days in study and literary preparation; and so sacred does this holy office seem, that they shrink from associating any idea of pecuniary compensation with it. Freely they receive their message from their Divine Master, and freely they communicate it to others. But when a man undertakes to preach at stated times to an audience, he must necessarily prepare himself beforehand, for he knows not that the Lord will give him a message when he wishes it. This previous preparation carries with it, in a general way, the need of pay, so that he may have the means of supporting his family.

We may well pity this poor preacher, disappointed in his hopes of obtaining a job which would pay his family expenses; yet we must approve of the course pursued by our friend and correspondent. Far better for him and his fellows to sit down in silence and wrestle with God for a spiritual blessing, than to sit as mere listeners to the ideas collected together by a man paid for the purpose.

We have received printed minutes of "Western Yearly Meeting of Friends" (Conservative Body) of which some account we believe has already appeared in our columns, and of Western Yearly Meeting of Friends' Church, the name assumed by the Progressive branch of the Society of Friends in the part of Indiana occupied by it. While we doubt not there are among its members some honest hearted Friends who mourn over the departures from our ancient principles, yet it appears evident that important changes in our doctrines and the practices growing out of them are favored by those who have a controlling influence in the conduct of its affairs; so that there seems a propriety in its adoption of a new title, which may distinguish it from those who are endeavoring to walk in the footsteps of their forefathers in the Truth.

In the Report of the Committee on Bible Schools, it is stated that the universal acceptance of the Bible School "would abolish war, and labor strikes, and saloons and prize fights, and every abomination." Experience shows that while "the commandment is holy, just and good," yet something more than a simple knowledge of the Divine commands is required to reform mankind. The Grace of God, which brings salvation, not only teaches what is right, but gives strength to walk in the way of holiness. The Apostle Paul wrote to his beloved Timothy, that the Holy Scriptures "are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus." But if we do not possess that living, operating faith, which is the gift of God, we may study the Bible year after year, without making a single step towards Heaven.

We do not make these remarks to discourage a familiar acquaintance with those valuable writings, but to caution against the dependence on a knowledge of them, without submission of heart to the converting, regenerating power of the Spirit of Christ, which alone can cleanse from all unrighteousness and prepare us for admittance into that blessed kingdom where nothing that is impure or unholy can ever enter.

The Report on Earlham College gives the whole number of students during the year as 334, of whom rather more than one-half were in the College department. Of these, 77 were studying music, a fact which shows that the Yearly Meetings controlling this institution have laid aside the ancient testimony of Friends against music as an indulgence promoting a worldly spirit, and otherwise objectionable.

The Report of the Evangelistic Pastoral and Church Extension Committee, speaks of the large number of meetings held under its auspices, and gives an estimate of the number of "conversions" and "renewals" which were the fruit of those meetings. But little reliance can be placed on such estimates; for we believe most religiously-minded people can refer to periods when their feelings were touched and desires after good raised in their minds, which for want of watchfulness and faithfulness soon passed away and left them still in bondage to sin. Such temporary emotions of good cannot properly be regarded as evidences of a change of heart—of "being washed, sanctified and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." "By their fruits shall ye know them," said our Saviour; and time must be allowed for the development of fruits, in order to tell who are converted (or changed men and women), for we cannot read the hearts of one another.

The Committee reported that 33 of the ministers were stationed as pastors; and they evidently favored the extension of that un-Quakerly system, saying, "Nearly all of our Meetings, whether old or new, demand a regular minister;" and they urge the Yearly Meeting "to organize plans and carefully execute those already employed in bringing about a thorough system of the distribution of our ministers, so that no Meeting shall be left uncareed for in this respect."

The statistical tables give the whole number of members as 13,923.

The absence from home of the Editor for two or three weeks, is the excuse he offers to his contributors for any apparent neglect.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 6th instant President Harrison's message was read in the United States Senate. A large part of the document recites the growth and prosperity of the country, which the President ascribes mainly to the system of protection adopted by the Republican party. He anticipates national disaster by the adoption of the policy of the incoming Administration. The finances of the Government have been honestly administered, the advantages of reciprocity are mentioned, also the mutual charges of fraud by the leading political parties.

On the 6th instant Senator Peffer introduced a bill forbidding the collection of special liquor taxes from persons other than those who are authorized by State laws to traffic in intoxicating liquors.

The Postmaster General on the 7th instant issued an order providing that from and after First Month 1st, 1893, the fee for registering mail matter shall be eight cents, instead of ten cents for every separate piece registered.

It is estimated that the value of the honey and wax produced in this country during the past year was $20,000,000.

New York saloon keepers are no longer, it is stated by enemies of Tammany Hall, to treat with police captains, but to make their political contributions direct into the treasury of Tammany Hall. As there are 8000 saloons, and as two dollars a week would be a small contribution for such, to make the aggregate even on this basis would be $800,000 a year. If this were true, what a fund Tammany Hall would have, in addition to its other income, to use in maintaining its power in the city.

The will of Jay Gould was offered for probate in New York on the 12th instant. The executors, in their petition, said that the property in New York State consists of $2,000,000 in realty and $70,000,000 in personalty.

A bill has been introduced in the Alabama Legislature to amend the Constitution so as to allow women the right to vote and hold office. A strong fight will be made in the Legislature against the bill placing restrictions on the use of cigarettes.

A deed has been recorded at Salem, Massachusetts, by James H. Carlton, who recently purchased the Whittier homestead in Haverhill, conveying to a board of nine trustees the homestead, to be held in trust forever as a memorial of the poet, and to be at all times open to the public, subject to such conditions as the trustees may impose.

A Friend in Massachusetts writes: "The Supreme Court of R. I. has decided against the claims of the Trustees in the Joseph Green will case—one Judge dissenting. It is hardly likely the Trustees will carry the case further, but abandon the property to the heirs. The grounds taken by the two Judges were that the bequest was for a hospitable, but not for a charitable purpose. Well! if all hospitality was banished from the world, how much charity would be left?"

The process of engraving on glass by electricity is exhibited at the American Institute in New York.

A rich vein of nickel ore has been discovered near Keokuk, Iowa.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 416, being 63 more than last week, and 84 less than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing 210 were males and 206 females; 53 died of pneumonia; 43 of consumption; 35 of diseases of the heart; 29 of diphtheria; 18 of cancer; 17 of bronchitis; 15 of apoplexy; 16 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 14 of old age; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of scarlet fever; 11 of paralysis; 10 of casualties; 10 of marasmus.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, reg., 113 a 113½; coupon, 114 a 114½; currency, 6's, 105 a 115.

COTTON was quiet, but steady, on a basis of 10½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, spot, 16 a 17c.; spring bran, in bulk, spot, 15 a 16c.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.15;

Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.75; Western winter, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.00; winter patent, $4.00 a $4.35; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.15; do., patent $4.25 a $4.50; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour was quoted at $3.45 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania. Buckwheat flour was scarce and firm at $1.90 to $2 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 75 a 75½ cts.
No. 2 mixed corn, 40½ a 50½ cts.
No. 2 white oats, 40½ a 41½ cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ a 5½c. good, 5 a 5½c.; medium, 4½ a 4½c.; common, 4½ a 4½c.; culls, 3½ a 4c. fat cows, 2½ a 3½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5½c.; good, 4½ a 5c.; medium, 4½ a 4½c.; common, 3½ a 4c.; culls, 1½ a 3c.; lambs, 4 a 6½c.

HOGS.—Extra Western, 8½ a 9c.; other Western, 8½ a 8½c.

FOREIGN.—The London Chronicle says that the British Government has practically decided to adopt penny postage throughout the Empire.

A dispatch from London dated the 11th inst. says: Silver became a trifle steadier after a relapse in the middle of the week. There is now apparent a general conviction that the Brussels Conference will close without arriving at any practical arrangement. The India Council's refusal on Tuesday to accept low tenders for bills, especially when it became known that only a quarter of the amount offered was applied for, greatly contributed to depress silver, and this depression in turn adversely affected all silver securities and depressed Stock Exchange business generally.

The Conservatives have lost another seat in Parliament.

The latest member to lose his seat is Horatio David Davies, Conservative, who was returned from Rochester by a majority of 407 votes over Frederic Brunning Madison, Gladstonian. The Liberals sent in a petition under the Corrupt Practices act against the election of Davies, and the Election Petition Judges handed down a decision depriving him of his seat on the ground of bribery, which consisted of treating electors.

The election in the Eastern Division of Aberdeenshire to fill the vacancy in the House of Commons caused by the acceptance by Peter Esselemont, the Gladstonian who was returned at the last general election, of the salaried office of Chairman of the Scottish Fishery Board, has resulted in the return of Thomas Ryburn Buchanan, who received 4,243 votes against 2,917 cast for Colonel Russell, Unionist. The Gladstonian majority at the general election was 1,624. Buchanan's majority was 1,326.

On the 7th inst. the Spanish Premier Canovas asked the Chamber for a vote of confidence on the Government's action in the municipal scandals. The Chamber rejected the request by a vote of 129 to 121. The Silvela party were in the majority. The Liberals abstained from voting. The Cabinet immediately resigned. A new one has been formed, with Sagasta as Premier.

The new French Cabinet is generally approved by the moderate section of the public, although they assert that the Ministry must fall before long. A more general opinion is that Ribot will retain his post until the election in Sixth Month.

The New York Herald's special correspondent at Berlin announces positively that the Military bill seems likely to be defeated.

The following interesting statement has been received from London: "In the midst of the cry for work raised by the genuine professional unemployed, comes the announcement that two thousand Russian Jews are on their way to London from Odessa. As there is no outlet to America, they will have to find lodgement there and join the ragged, unkempt throng of paupers who are making day and night hideous on Tower Hill.

"The Secretary of the Jewish Unemployed Committee makes the astonishing statement that there are already fifteen thousand unemployed in the East end of London. Nearly two-thirds of the number are men of family, thus swelling the list of the distressed and starving of this class to more than double the original figures.

"The Jews form a comparatively small number of those who are clamoring for work or its equivalent—bread. Now comes this solid phalanx of Russians from the Black Sea to add to the misery of the unfortunates.

"Politicians are becoming alarmed at the situation. They know that something must be done, and all agree that the only logical conclusion is that which is arrived at by the United States Government. The prompt restriction of immigration and the closing of the American ports to undesirable foreigners has served to widen and make more attractive the road to London. Once here the foreigner becomes an immediate charge upon the community, for there is nothing for him to do save shout himself hoarse and hungry at Tower Hill."

There are reported to be 950,000 persons imprisoned in 875 jails in Russia.

DIED, Eleventh Month 6th, 1892, at his residence in Pleasantville, N. Y., JOHN B. FOSTER, in the eightieth year of his age, after an illness of several months, the evident result of age, and a general breaking down of the system, by reason of which, his mental faculties were at times somewhat affected also, though possessing naturally a strong and vigorous constitution. From early life he manifested earnest, religious feeling, and a lively conscientious conviction of the pure doctrine and principles ever held by Friends. He was careful in their maintenance and practice in his own particular, and solicitous to see others doing the same, and never swerved from a love of their silent worship and their practice of a living Gospel ministry. Consequently he became greatly grieved with the flagrant innovations upon them, especially of latter times, and by some of those whose more especial duty it was to support and maintain them. This caused him great trial and suffering of mind during his latter years, even to the extent of partially absenting himself from meetings, when indeed, it had been given him to see in that light which makes truly manifest the utter want of spiritual life in the ministrations thereof. The painful recourse however, with its consequent increment of the breach of unity, could not prevent grief and sadness from overspreading his mind, when anxiously thoughtful about the future of our beloved and so highly favored Society. Under date of Fourth Month 5th, 1892, he writes, "My last letter to thee was scarcely out of my reach when I feared I had not been sufficiently guarded in some expressions; anything like exultation I never could bear, and I have always felt, and now more than ever, that 'it is the humble Lord will teach of his ways,' and I can assure thee that I feel myself to be a poor creature, utterly unworthy to do anything of myself, and I am often humbled to it were into the very dust, until it appears to me that my well being depends upon this humility. Perhaps we can scarcely feel too strongly that we are by nature utterly undone and have no merit of our own, and that it is only through the merits, mercy and grace of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, that we can have any well grounded hope and trust in acceptance." This humble dependence upon the Lord continued with him to the end; supporting him in quiet, loving, reverent and childlike state of mind.

—, Twelfth Mo. 29th, 1891, in the eighty-seventh year of her age, ABIGAIL HAWLEY, a member of Bedford Monthly Meeting, Pa. All the days of her appointed time, did she patiently wait and quietly hope for the salvation of the Lord.

—, On Tenth Mo. 16, 1892, at the residence of her grandfather, Joseph Hobson, in Monrovia, Montgomery County, Ind., MARY T. HOBSON, in the twenty-sixth year of her age, a member of West Union Monthly Meeting of Conservative Friends, daughter of William and Mary Hobson (the latter deceased). She was invalid from infancy. In the fifteenth year of her age she was brought very low and enabled by the life of Christ to see her lost and undone condition. She sought a place of repentance with many tears and prayers, and found the atonement Christ made on the cross, and in time witnessed a reconciliation with God. She then she has lived a consistent life, closed peacefully, and we hope is enjoying the presence of her Redeemer.

—, suddenly, of heart disease, on the fifth of Eleventh Month, 1892, JOSIAH L. HAINES, in his eight-second year. Although not a member of the Society of Friends he was closely united to that Society in religious views, and for many years regularly attended the meetings for worship at Sixth and Noble Streets. Notwithstanding he was called hence at a moment's warning, his friends have the comforting belief that his lamp was trimmed and burning.

MARRIED, Ninth Month 29th, 1892, at Friends' Meeting-house, Ackworth, Warren County, Iowa, OLIVIA MORFITT, daughter of William A. and Mary Morfitt, to LEWIS L. ROCKWELL, of Paulina, Iowa, son of Hubert and Ellen Rockwell.

"Milecross, Fourth-day 6th. A meeting at Milsborough on Second-day evening, was attended by a tolerable number of Friends and hers, and though there was less of the dominion of pure life than in some other opportunities of this sort, we had cause for renewed thankfulness; and yesterday morning, before leaving our dear friends J. and L. C., we were favored with a precious cementing season, our spirits being baptized under a feeling of that unity herein 'the Lord commanded the blessing, even for evermore.' We arrived here in the evening and met a friendly reception from Thomas and Sarah Bradshaw: a meeting is to be held in their parlor, no meeting-house, and but few in profession with us being here. Which way we all move from hence is not yet fixed. I am earnestly desirous to feel and see the right path, and if that be towards my tenderly beloved connections, it will indeed be deemed a favor.

"Lurgao, Seventh Month 9th. I am once more in this place, after being not only permitted, but apprehending it right for me, to seek at rest from close and deeply trying exercise, which I may find in my own habitation. My frame is exceedingly shaken, and according to human judgment, unable to bear much more at present; and though I think, I was favored to perceive, (during the conflict I have passed through to obtain Divine certainty,) a degree of willingness to spend and be spent, in that path wherein light shone, I believe that a gracious Master has mercifully withdrawn, at least for the present, the view of crossing the water, and caused peace to rest on the conclusion to return home, without which I hope I should feel afraid to do.

"Our closing visit at Milecross, was on several accounts remarkable, different religious opportunities in the family being so owned by the tension of Almighty help as to produce the thankful acknowledgment, 'Thy mercies are every morning, great is Thy faithfulness and Thy truth.'

"Dublin, Seventh Month 16th, 1791. I told thee of my exercise respecting Scotland, and present release from the prospect. At Belfast our minds were renewedly dipped into the baptism of the cloud, and we had to be still while remained; when a little light sprung up we discovered there was something required, which being strengthened to give way to, we left that place comfortably, and proceeded peacefully to Moyallen, where we were sensible of Gospel love to the sheep not of our fold, and had the afternoon meeting postponed from four to five; the attendance was large, and I trust the season was productive of no injury to the precious cause of Truth, solidity being evident. A large company supped at our lodging, and I think the covering we were favored with constituted a feast indeed, and felt like a sanction to a separation from some truly beloved Friends.

"On Fifth-day morning, after a solid cementing opportunity, of renewed feeling with and for each other, we parted in near affection with several endeared friends, and travelled very agreeably to Dundalk that day; twenty-seven miles further yesterday, and this day arrived here, under I trust some little sense of numberless undeserved favors received from boundless mercy. May I be so preserved as not only diligently to inquire what shall I render? but resignedly to follow the answer, which, from season to season a gracious Master may see meet to return, in entire dedication to his will."

She returned from this journey much exhausted in body, and was considerably indisposed for a long time, but her mind became strengthened for increasing exercise, and further religious service soon opened to her view. That upon which she next entered was to the city and western parts of the county of Cork, where she was engaged to hold meetings for those not in profession with herself. When on the point of leaving home for this service, she wrote as follows:

—"I am going very poor and low in mind, but hope not without knowing whom I have believed, and whom I trust I desire humbly to follow, as his pure will is graciously revealed; if I return with renewed experience of his preserving power and in peaceful poverty, it will be enough."

The chief account of this journey is contained in letters from which the following extracts have been taken.

—"In humble gratitude to the author of all our mercies it may be acknowledged, that the meeting at Bandon was a time wherein holy help was afforded, and not only a door of utterance but one of entrance opened, by his power who opened the heart of Lydia of old. The people were attentive, solid, and I believe many of them thoughtful; not only inwardly inquiring what is Truth? but willing to receive the answer as there was strength to explain it; and the consoling hope attended, that some for whom our spirits then travailed, would be everlastingly inclosed in the true sheep-fold. This opportunity of feeling and laboring in the ability afforded, left solid satisfaction on our minds, with desire to commit the issue to Him, who ordereth all things according to the purpose of his own will. In the evening we sat with the few Friends there collectively; the labor here was abundantly more difficult, the work harder, and the hope less, because it seems indeed, when our little church is felt with, and ministered to, it must be as in a state of sickness, and alas! may it not be feared that this sickness is not deeply enough felt? therefore health is not in the sure way of being restored, which it otherwise might be.

"We held a meeting at Skibbercen, which was very largely attended, and mercifully owned by holy help, to the humiliation of self and exaltation of that name which is above every name, and whereto I trust some present bowed in reverent thankfulness of soul. Next day we went to Baltimore. * * * No suitable place could be obtained for a meeting but the public worship house, which we were glad to accept, the feeling of Gospel love being strong to the people here. We filled one of the pews, and I believe all the others were nearly full: the company were quiet and solid in the time of silence, and very attentive during the communication of those Truths we had to declare amongst them: indeed, soon after sitting down, the covering of solemnity was beyond what is frequently witnessed on such occasions, and I have a consoling hope that the labors of that day will not be altogether in vain. Thou hardly expected thy poor trembling wife would ever be strengthened to move in such a line, much less reason with the people in such a place; but it seemed no matter where the Gospel was published, if given to publish, and indeed it added to the thankful feelings of my poor mind, that Divine mercy had enlightened my eyes to distinguish truth from error, and substance from shadows.

"Castletown has been our head quarters, and we are now going to hold a meeting in the Custom-house, which is preparing for the purpose: my heart is heavy at the prospect, and every fresh exercise of this kind ought to feel weighty.

The winding up of this service was rendered memorable, by its furnishing an opportunity for visiting Samuel Neale, in his last illness, and also of attending his burial. He had long been an intimate and much beloved friend of my dear mother's and her companion; and manifested near sympathy and concern for them in the commencement of their journey; inquiring, when very weak in body, how they were getting on, and what assistance they had, in the affectionate terms, 'who is taking care of these good women?' On returning to Cork they found his complaints had made rapid progress; and it may not be uninteresting to such as knew and valued this devoted man, to peruse a few particulars of his state, and her own feelings in witnessing it, as related in a letter dated the 27th of Second Month.

—"It was awful to enter the chamber of our venerable friend, and to behold one who had been so often the messenger of consolation to me and to many others, so reduced as to be almost unable to drop one collected sentence, without immediately rambling to something different, though all perfectly innocent and sweet as a child. He looked at me and said, 'Thou hast great burdens,' adding that it was long since he saw me. I sat about an hour by his bed-side, assisted in moving him, &c., but he manifested little sign of distinguishing one from another; I scarcely expected the change would be so great in eight days; his breathing was hard, and by many corroborating symptoms it was evident that the termination drew near. The situation of this beloved Friend has seemed to cloud any little prospect my mind may have had, so that it seems best to stand still until this trying dispensation is full. Yesterday evening, after taking tea with dear Sarah Neale, I came to my lodgings, where many Friends assembled, and a solemn season ensued, wherein the prospect of the removal of this Elijah brought an awful covering, and renewedly raised the inquiry, 'Where is the Lord God of Elijah?' who condescended to draw near unto the minds of some, and own their sad communications. This evening I have been again at the house of mourning, and waited until the last conflict terminated in everlasting peace, of which I thought it a great favor to be permitted to feel such an evidence; that instead of lamentation the language of praise might be uttered, while on account of the church this renewed loss is certainly grievous."

On the 28th, my dear mother and her companion resumed their important engagements by going to Kinsale, where a meeting was appointed for the next day; respecting which and subsequent religious service she writes as follows:

—"The appointment of this meeting had been an object of considerable weight, and was given up to much in the cross, but through continued mercy it was memorably owned by our unfailing Helper. The number collected was very large, and it seemed to us as if more than a few were inwardly gathered, and like thirsty ground, prepared to receive such Gospel communications as there was ability to impart. Our stay in, and departure from this place, were rather singularly marked by feelings of peace and thankfulness, an abundant recompense for any little service; and what a favor it is that the sacrifice of our wills is graciously accepted, that our deficiencies are mercifully made up, and our transgressions pardoned: surely we may well say, worthy is the Lord to be served and fully obeyed!

"Fifth-day we had a meeting for the youth belonging to Cork Meeting, which was large and solemn; it felt comforting to be among our fellow professors, and renewedly to believe that the extension of heavenly love is towards the children.

"Fifth-day, 2nd of Third Month was the interment of our honorable friend, S. N.; the meeting was very large, and great numbers assembled at the ground.

"We had a solemn season of retirement at Edward Hatton's in the evening, and apprehending that light shone upon our return, we set forward on Seventh-day morning, and I was favored to find all in good order at home that evening. Next day commenced our province meeting, and on the following First-day we had a public meeting at Carrick, which was graciously owned by the covering of good, and left us in possession of peace. This step had been long in prospect with me, but a sense of my childhood, and the greatness of the work kept me from avowing it, until encouraged by the experience of Divine help in late engagements."

Hickory Grove Quar. Meeting Boarding School.

At the suggestion of an interested Friend, the following account of the origin of the concern, and the establishment of Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting Boarding School, located near West Branch, Cedar County, Iowa, in 1890, has been prepared for insertion in THE FRIEND.

In the latter part of the summer of 1873, two valued Friends, members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, paid a religious visit to Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting, and the Meetings constituting it, and became much interested in the religiously guarded education of the children of that Quarterly Meeting, which numbered at that time about three hundred of school age.

They agitated the subject of a boarding school, not only amongst Friends here, but after returning home, amongst their own friends, and it resulted in a donation of about $5,000, which was thankfully received by Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting, for the purpose of assisting that Meeting in purchasing a plot of ground, and erecting buildings thereon for the accommodation of a boarding school.

The subject took a deep hold on the minds of Friends here, and subscriptions were opened up in the different Meetings to the amount of several thousand dollars, and a committee was appointed by the Quarterly Meeting to take the subject under consideration in all its bearings.

The committee purchased twelve acres of land adjoining the meeting house lot at Hickory Grove (which has been cultivated ever since), but reported that way did not open to recommend proceeding to erect buildings and establish the school at this time.

The meeting accepted the report, and most of the subscriptions returned to those who gave them, and the money on hand after paying for the lot was put at interest until the spring of 1890, when the principal and interest amounted to above $9,000, and at that date the Quarterly Meeting decided to proceed with the erection of a building which will accommodate fifty or sixty pupils, besides other out buildings necessary for the accommodation of the school, which was completed in time for a winter term of school.

The main building is 40 x 40 feet, with an east wing 24 x 24, and so managed that if it should be needed in the future a wing on the west the same size can be added to the main building.

It is a good substantial frame building of three stories (including a basement under the whole building), which is built of an excellent quality of stone. It is heated by the hot water system, and lighted with lamps.

The funds were all exhausted in erecting and furnishing the buildings ready for use. There have been five terms of school taught which have been self-supporting, and one in progress at this date, of forty-three pupils.

Feeling the need of a benevolent fund, subscriptions were opened amongst our members, and obligations were given for the annual payment of a sum equal to the interest on $1,000 (each individual preferring to keep the principal, but pay his stated amount into the hands of the Boarding School Committee, to be applied at its discretion.)

If there are any readers of THE FRIEND enough interested in the work to contribute to that fund it will be gratefully accepted, as there are a number of children within our limits whose parents are in limited circumstances and unable to educate them at the Boarding School without some assistance.

S. E. Morris and J. E. Rhoads' Travels in Japan.

[The notices that have appeared in THE FRIEND of the journeyings of our friends Samuel Morris and Jonathan E. Rhoads, have been taken from the letters of J. E. R. to his family. They do not enter much into the religious labor which were the main object of their journey, yet the wide-spread interest felt in their travels by our readers, induces us to continue the narrative.—Ed.]

HAKONE, Japan, Ninth Month 4th, 1892.

More land is lying idle than one would expect to see in a country so densely populated and where so much is mountainous and not available for agriculture. It is probably not very fertile, and has in some cases been exhausted. Where irrigation can be used, rice is planted. Even in the environs of Tokyo, where one would suppose vegetables that must be used fresh would be raised, rice occupies the land suitable for it. It often succeeds other crops and much of it has not yet headed.

Fertilizing matter is carefully utilized, and watering with flowing streams also furnishes plant food as well as moisture.

The plain in which Tokyo stands is the largest in the country, extending sixty miles in some directions. A number of small rivers flow from the mountains, which are made to do large service in the way of watering this plain. The mountain sides are often covered with trees. In other instances a strong growth of coarse grass spreads over them. Much of this is allied to the bamboo, and is said to be very injurious to sheep on account of its hard sharp texture. I think Americans would utilize land that is evidently productive by improving the herbage for pasture.

We seldom see a cow. The few that are kept are probably stabled and soiled. The horses are a scrubby looking breed, thirteen and a half hands high. They are pretty numerous in some parts, for hauling goods or produce on rough made drays, or as pack horses. Cultivation is nearly all done by hand in a laborious way. Weeds grow freely, but the crops are kept very clear of them by constant care.

The farms under such a system are likely to be small, and the plantations of various products would indicate it. The people live largely in villages, in wooden houses covered either with a thick thatch, or short, thin shingles. Tiles are used to some extent. Nearly every village has a storehouse for valuable property, built of stone and intended to be fireproof.

While the mass of the people are poor, absolute want is not common; the younger members of a family being expected to care for the old and disabled.

As to the rapid Christianization of the country, it can hardly be looked for; and yet, I should hope for a steady gain if the lives of the Missionaries and their native adherents were such as to demonstrate that their religion is a more excellent way. Many of the Missionaries appear to be alive to this view, and to be earnest and sincere in their work. They admit that much patient labor will be required, and see willing to continue it for the love of the Savior and of the souls that He has made. In this way, I should hope, that a long series of years would bring the mass of the population over to Christianity. The effort is being made to educate and send out native preachers; and this would seem the most promising method of evangelization.

elization, provided they are such as are rightly called and qualified.

We have had some interesting intercourse with Missionaries at the places where they go for a summer vacation. We have been having great storm of wind and rain to-day. This said to often precede the breaking up of the hot season. We think several inches of water must have fallen, and the gusts have shaken our same hotel.

The average yearly rainfall is over fifty-eight inches.

Ninth Month 6th.—We felt the first earthquake this morning near six o'clock. The house shook for probably twenty seconds very sensibly, but not enough to awaken one out of sound sleep. Should we experience nothing more severe, we may be thankful.

Kamakura, Japan, Ninth Month 9th.—While at Hakone, one of our friends urged our visiting a place on the mountains, three miles from the lake, where volcanic action is going on. A good boat with two men was engaged and properly fitted with mats, cushions and provisions. The boatmen here propel the boat by sculling instead of rowing. Our men worked one on each side of the stern. If more oars are required they are arranged along the sides of the boat. The lake is about six miles long, and this distance took one hour to cover.

Our feet were shod with straw sandals tied on by the men over our shoes. They are very light and prevent slipping on smooth rocks, and relieve the jar in walking down steep, stony hills. The distance to the sulphur beds is near three miles from the lake, part of it steep climbing. In the way we pass hot baths of sulphur water which are frequented by rheumatic and other patients. Accommodations are kept for them in Japanese style. Below the baths the water pours from spouts into a natural pool. In this man was squatting under one of the streams it fell some six feet on the middle of his back. The women and all take their baths in a prize style.

Arrived near the summit of the Pass, we began to notice the bare, burned earth, where a fresh outbreak of hot fumes had destroyed vegetation and then become quiet again. One quarter of a mile further, the mountain sides were boiled and burned earth mixed with sulphur, and rocks peeling off successive layers as they were alternately heated by the internal fires and cooled by rains. From numerous places sulphur vapor arose, and where we could approach them the sound of boiling mud could be distinctly heard.

A fine view of Fuji San is obtained from this spot, as it rose 12,400 feet above the sea. The remarkable thing about Fuji is its wonderful regularity of shape. Except a protuberance on the southerly side, where its last eruption broke out 170 years ago, its sides are almost perfectly symmetrical. The top of the cone is truncated and encloses the old crater. Many tourists ascended to the top, but some suffer severely in the effort from the rarity of the air. Our friend was so persevering in seeing all there was to be seen, that it was quite dark by the time we had crossed the lake.

The next morning, we chose to walk to Yamanoto in preference to riding in kogos, as we had found them uncomfortable. The road is the old kaido, leading from Tokio to the southern cities. It has been paved in many parts with large stones, especially on steep places where sliding is likely to take place. Since the railroad has been built, it is travelled but little, and is not kept in repair. Great gullies have undermined the road-bed in spots where the soil is more friable, making travelling more laborious. The mountain passes are unfit for wheeled vehicles. Sandals again came into requisition with long staves we had bought on our excursion the day before. A coolie to bear our baggage was also our guide and companion. A pretty steady march was kept up, except one or two halts at a tea-house, and once under a large cedar, when a brisk shower had begun. The rain not proving as transient as a mountain shower often does, we plodded on with raised umbrellas, not suffering much inconvenience. Our man covered one valise with a mat, and the other with his wide straw hat, thus protecting them as well as he could.

Coming in sight of the tramway, we had the disappointment of seeing two cars starting off for Kozu—the last that would connect with the train we wished to take. None of the station men could understand our English, neither could we learn by the use of our watches when the next cars left; so after chaffering with the jinrikisha men, and finding them unreasonable in their demands, we settled ourselves for a wait. This did not prove very long, and in half an hour we were underway. All that was involved was other waiting for broken connections, and we reached this place towards evening.

Ninth Month 12th.—On Seventh-day we walked to a high bluff by the side of the bay, whence is a fine view of the sea and hills around. At least eight villages are in sight. The Swedes are proposing to locate several of their number here, and to labor among the people of these villages. Foreigners can live at this place without passports; while in parts of the country, twenty-five miles from Tokyo and other treaty ports they are only allowed when in the employ of a Japanese. In the treaty ports there are districts called Concessions, where foreigners must live and carry on business.

Some uneasiness is felt here in consequence of telegraphic reports of a company of Japanese workmen having been driven out of a town in Idaho by white men as foreign contract laborers. The Japanese are very quick to resent anything of the kind. Further explanations are looked for with some anxiety.

Yesterday being First-day, we spent most of it in the summer-house, on the beach where it was quiet and retired. Much interesting conversation took place on religious subjects, especially with reference to the ordinances of water baptism and the supper.

Ninth Month 13th.—We are still resting on our oars, as a message from Sindai received yesterday, said they would not be ready to receive us for a week to come.

14th.—A beautiful bright morning. In the night we were awakened by an earthquake shock, which though of brief duration, was pretty heavy. C. W. thought the motion was an upward one, which is considered the most dangerous. G. B. said he is more afraid of them than when he first came to Japan, having seen the tremendous effects sometimes produced.

15th.—Dr. W. informed us last evening that he expected to be able to go with us to Mito on Seventh-day; also he brought a letter from Sindai proposing we should come there after the beginning of next week. This will fit in very well. A railroad to Mito is a branch from the main line north, so that if favored to get through there and at Tsuchira by Third-day evening, we can then go on to Sindai. After that I hope our course will be pretty plain.

While the wind comes from the sea, Kamakura is a good place to be in hot weather. A land breeze brings unwholesome vapors from the fields. This has been the case since our return from Hakone, except for about forty hours. We thought we were being affected by it, and we have come this morning to G. B.'s, whose house stands above the general level of the town and catches the cool breezes when they blow. The season is near when a change to lower temperature usually takes place.

A "festival" is going on, and our ears are constantly filled with the beating of small drums and the piping of a kind of life. No attempt at tune or measure is noticeable. * * * We suppose the event is connected with worship in some way, but as with our Christmas holidays, amusement appears to be uppermost.

Our quarters look down on a steep street that slants up the side of the bluff. Up this coolies are hauling heavy loads of stone, bricks, &c., three, four, or five of them to a cart. One of them, all the time, keeps uttering a cry of "hi-ho," often in a plaintive tone. The thought that the poor fellows are earning a subsistence, alone reconciles one's feelings of pity to their hard lot. Some who follow these laborious callings are said to die early.

Coaching in South Africa.

This kind of coaching is an experience which at the present day can only be tried in Africa. The coaches themselves are the most curious productions of human skill. Intended to hold twelve passengers inside, half-a-dozen outside, besides large quantities of heavy baggage; they are constructed of very solid materials hung upon thick springs of leather, and present the most unwieldy, lumbering and old world appearance. They are drawn by ten or twelve mules or horses, harnessed in pairs. Two men are required to guide the team, the one holding the reins, the other the long whip, with which he can severely chastise all but the leading pair. When driving a team of mules the whip is in operation every minute, constant flogging alone inducing these stubborn animals to do their best. At times one of the drivers is compelled to descend from the box and run alongside the team, flogging them all with the greatest heartiness and impartiality. In spite, however, of all this effort and apparent harsh treatment, an average speed of about six miles is all that can be realized. Roads there are none; deeply rutted tracks are followed. When the ruts get too deep for safety, the track turns slightly aside, and to such an extent does this sometimes occur, that in places, the track occupies a width of a quarter of a mile, or more. Swinging, bounding, jolting, creaking, straining over this extraordinary route, the coach pursues the uneven tenor of its way, sometimes laboring and plunging like a ship at sea, constantly keeling over at angles, at which an upset seems unavoidable; now descending into the deep bed of a "spruit" (creek), now sticking fast in heavy ground, now careering over masses of rocks and stones. The travellers, all shaken up inside, like an omelet in a frying-pan, never cease to wonder that the human frame can endure such shaking, or that wood and iron can be so firmly riveted together as to stand such a strain. It may be mentioned that the life of a coach does not exceed two years, that upsets are frequent, and casualties not uncommon.—Men, Mines, and Animals in South Africa.

TO THE YOUTH OF THE FEMALE SEX

ON DRESS, &c.

Why should your native innocence,
Adorned in youth with wit and sense,
In modesty arrayed,
Which always amiably appears,
Be lost as you advance in years,
And you to pride betrayed?

Does wisdom teach to vie in dress?
Or folly only teach excess,
And captivate the mind?
Can love of pleasure yield you peace?
Or can you if your virtue cease,
True solid comfort find?

How can you ever be at ease,
When no invented mode can please
When once it's common grown?
Or how can you in things delight,
Before you find their fashion's right,
Or cuts be fully known?

This heavy cross attends your pride,
Your clothes half worn are laid aside,
Or alterations made,
And those who do it seldom know
From whence these whims or fancies flow,
And never learn their trade.

Thus many waste their precious time,
And fool away their youthful prime,
And spend their money too,
In following ev'ry foolish fashion,
That's newly brought into the nation,
And some themselves undo.

For gay with gay acquaintance take,
And oftentimes such matches make,
As ruin both at last;
But those who are both just and wise,
And fear the Lord, they still despise
All things that change so fast.

These learn religiously to fear
The God who gave them beings here,
And daily learn his cross;
To Him alone they have their eye,
And on his arm alone rely,
And seldom suffer loss.

But such as emulate in dress,
But little peace or rest possess,
For all their great expense;
In those pursuits they often find
Some fresh perplexities of mind,
Which still arise from thence.

Thus many, like the troubled seas,
Are tossed about, and find no ease;
Are still in fluctuation;
Nor can they find it, till they know
The source from whence true comforts flow,
And inward reformation.

—John Fry.
SELECTED.

RECONCILED.

O years, gone down into the past,
What pleasant memories come to me,
Of your untroubled days of peace
And hours of almost ecstasy!

Yet would I have no moon stand still
Where life's most pleasant valleys lie,
Nor wheel the planet of the day
Back on his pathway through the sky.

For though when youthful pleasures died,
My youth itself went with them too,
To-day, ay! even this very hour
Is the best hour I ever knew.

Not that my Father gives to me
More blessings than in days gone by;
Dropping in my uplifted hands
All things for which I blindly cry;

But that his plans and purposes
Have grown to me less strange and dim,
And where I cannot understand,
I leave the issue unto Him.

And, spite of many broken dreams,
This, have I truly learned to say,
Prayers which I thought unanswered once
Were answered in God's own best way.

And though some hopes I cherished once
Perished untimely in their birth,
Yet have I been beloved and blessed
Beyond the measure of my worth.

And sometimes in my hours of grief
For moments I have come to stand,
Where, in the sorrows on me laid,
I felt the chastening of God's hand;—

Then learned I that the weakest ones
Are kept securest from life's harms;
And that the tender lambs alone
Are carried in the shepherd's arms.

And sitting by the way side blind
He is the nearest to the light,
Who crieth out most earnestly
"Lord, that I might receive my sight!"

O feet, grown weary as ye walk,
Where down life's hill my pathway lies,
What care I while my soul can mount
As the young eagle mounts the skies!

O eyes with weeping faded out,
What matters it how dim ye be?
My inner vision sweeps untired
The reaches of Eternity!

O death, most dreaded power of all,
When the last moment comes, and thou
Darkenest the windows of my soul,
Through which I look on nature now;

Yea, when mortality dissolves,
Shall I not meet thy hour unawed?
My house eternal in the Heaven,
Is lighted by the smile of God!

Extracts from the Diary of Louis Taber.

Third Month 7th, 1856.—At our last Monthly Meeting, our aged brethren and sisters who have long borne the burden and heat of the day, were addressed, and in conclusion a belief expressed that they would be gathered as shocks of corn fully ripe into their Heavenly Father's garner, and that there would be raised up a succession of true standard bearers who would be constrained to bear upon their shoulders the ark of the testimony in the church militant here below, while the fathers and mothers would be permitted to rejoice with the just of all generations, and with the church triumphant above.

I have been very much interested in reading the letters of Sarah Grubb. They revive the recollection of the state of our Society in my youthful years, when there was much more life, and seasons of greater favor than at present. May the Lord revive his work in the midst of the years and in judgment remember mercy.

Under an apprehension that it might be right to give our absent friends some further information, I wrote more than a year since, an explanation of the cause and progress of the division in Ohio Yearly Meeting. On submitting it to some elderly Friends, they thought the time had not yet come to issue anything, but that with some abridgements it should be preserved. Our Meeting for Sufferings having replied to some charges preferred against us, I am at present satisfied. Needless controversy cannot advance us in the best life. Keep us O Lord, and we shall be kept!

First Month 30th, 1858.—I am tired of controversy, and fear there is with too many a life in it instead of vital religion. He who gave his life a ransom for many is alike good to all who in sincerity of heart are willing to come to God by Him.

One of our members who gave promise of much usefulness has been removed by death. Our numbers here are small and apparently diminishing, and though numbers do not constitute strength, there is encouragement to individuals in a goodly company, all prevailing together for their mutual growth and prosperity in the Truth.

Often have I felt at our little meetings almost as if we were a sign to be spoken against, yet it is seldom I believe that we are not sensible of the incomes of our Heavenly Father's love, and our spirits are often gathered into the quiet habitation. Very seldom is the silence broken. We cannot live on past favors, but must gather daily the new manna.

The following communication was made at the burial of Dr. William Flanner, which occurred soon after that of Dr. Isaac Parker, an aged and beloved Friend. Both of the funerals were very largely attended.

The solemn language has this day been again and again sounded in the ear of my soul "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh,—" But a few days since we were called together to pay the last salaries to the earthly remains of a dear, aged and venerable brother, whose dust has returned to the earth as it was, and his spirit has gone to his God who gave it. And now again are we assembled upon a similar sad and solemn occasion. Another of our number, a little past the meridian of life, and almost in the full strength of his years, has been called from works to rewards. Ought not these repeated visitations of Divine Providence to be solemn and awakening warnings to us who still survive, to be prepared for that final change which must soon await all.

For whatever may be our situations in life or our distinctions among men, we must all, soon, very soon, lie down in the silence and solitude of the grave, side by side together and our immortal spirits individually stand in the presence of the Judge of all the earth, who most assuredly will do right. It will then be forever too late to return to perform the work given us here to do. And the language unto every soul now present is, "Be ye also ready for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh," and there is neither wisdom nor device nor knowledge in the grave whither all are hastening.

1860.—A Prayer for the Restoration and Preservation of the Church.

O, Lord, Thou alone art a God hearing prayer, long waiting to show Thyself gracious to the children of men and dispensing judgment and mercy unto the thousands who wait upon Thy name, and call upon Thee. Under a humble sense of their unworthiness thus to approach Thee, do a remnant of thy children bow in supplication before Thy throne, desiring to commemorate Thy goodness, Thy long-suffering kindness and very gracious dealings with those who are still permitted to be here in the land of the living, and again enabled and permitted prostrate themselves in solemn supplication before Thee.

O, righteous Father! we have been made this season, as aforetime when our spirits have been thus howled before Thee, to remember how Thou wast pleased to take our forefathers out of spiritual Egypt, and from a house of bondage, with an outstretched hand and a mighty arm, and how Thou preserved them and kept them and sustained them through cruel persecutions, imprisonments and death, faithful unto Thee. For thou madest them even willing to lay down their lives for the testimony of Jesus. And their faithfulness unto Thee, and their sings for the Truth still stand as a precious memorial before us.

Most Holy Shepherd of Israel! Thou who of olddest Joseph like a flock, we have been de also to remember, how Thou didst take a tion of this Thy people, and leddest them oss the great deep and plantedst them here in wilderness with thy children of the forest; l made their enemies to be at peace with m, and the wilderness and the solitary place be glad for them, and the desert to rejoice l blossom as the rose.

Where also Thou didst continue from season season to feed them and to lead them until y became a people to Thy praise whom Thou ighted to place Thy name amongst.

And we have not forgotten, most merciful her, how Thou wast still around about this tion of Thy people to preserve a goodly rem- it alive in the truth, and faithful unto Thee, h through evil and through good report, in t sorrowful season when the cruel spoiler permitted to lay waste Zion, and many were ended in Him, and went away and walked no e with Jesus. And now, O gracious Father, le we are thus again humbled by the turn- s and the overturnings of Thy holy and stening hand upon us, still be pleased, we eat Thee, to remember us for good; look n with compassion upon Thy land and pity e people. "Raise up judges as at the first ousellors as at the beginning," and make portion of thy Zion a beauty and an excel- y the joy and the praise of the whole earth. acknowledge O Lord, that it is through un- fulness unto Thee and to Thy truth, that s and tribulations and anguish of spirit have i permitted again to overtake us, and we are wfully separated in our approaches unto e from some of our dear brethren and sisters, e members of the same household of faith, whom in days past we have taken sweet sel and gone up unto Thy house in company. ompassionate Father of Life! we are all alike ren of Thy care, objects of Thy Divine and erly regard, and of the atoning blood of Lamb Immaculate, the dear Redeemer of and have none to whom we may look with of salvation, save to Thee O Lord, alone. though we may be constrained to travel y and different journeys through this vale ars towards the holy habitation of Thy e, yet be pleased we most humbly beseech , if through lives of faithfulness unto Thee the atoning blood of the Lamb slain for us the foundation of the world we shall be l worthy when the trials, the changes and eparations of this passing scene shall be and the angel of death shall be sent to our ly dwellings to gather our immortal spirits together into thy eternal kingdom of rest f peace, forever to repose in thy open arms everlasting love, where we may be permitted n with the just of all generations, and with nnumerable company before Thy Throne, f every nation and kindred and tongue eople in the ascriptions of praise and honor lory and salvation and dominion unto Thee o the Lamb forever and ever. Amen.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

LEXDEN, Eleventh Month 4th, 1832.

Beloved Friend:—It is long, very long, chou and I have communed in this way; t it has not been so in mind. As for me, oughs are frequently turned towards thee affectionate solicitude; yes, more than merely affectionate feelings fill my heart in remem- brance of thee and thine.

I should be glad to know how you are in bodily health, and if you wax strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might; that so the soul's enemies may be vanquished, even the most potent of them; which are also the enemies of Truth and of real peace.

The world seems to gain much ascendancy in the present day among us, as a people, both with parents and children; so that little room is left for the simplicity, purity and meekness of the Gospel of Christ; and we have few noble standard bearers, and few of our children promising, by their humble deportment, to become valiant upon earth, in the great and glorious cause of promoting the kingdom of the Redeemer among men. Is it not so? I wish I could take a more encouraging view of things immediately relating to our Society than I am capable of doing, when my mind is in an abstracted state; but fear takes hold upon me, lest we should be assimilating more and more at spiritual Babylon in too general a way.

Shall not we who are parents, endeavor to see, in the light which deceiveth not, how it is in our own families, as well as in the church? and is it not for us to labor with our dear children, to bring them to a just sense of the necessity of taking up the daily cross, if they would have a crown of everlasting righteousness and joy; and if, indeed, they would be owned by the Saviour upon earth, as his people?

Oh! my dear friend, I often fear lest I should not say, in the loud language of example, "Follow ye me, as I follow Christ; yet it is my earnest desire to bear about in this body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that his blessed life may also be made manifest in my mortal flesh.

Nothing will do, after all our speculations, but a dying to self, and living that life of which an eminent Christian speaks, "I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." If we are without this knowledge of the great work of regeneration, it will, nevertheless, manifest itself through others; for the true Church must take the place of the false, and all that appertains to "mystery Babylon" must fall, as certainly as God is true, righteous and just.

I know not how it is that I have suffered my pen to run on thus, but my heart feels interested in those I have long loved, that they may be found walking worthy of the high vocation wherewith we are called. With love unfeigned, I am thy sincerely attached friend,

S. GRUBB.

The Defeat of the Pastoral System in England.

At the recent London Yearly Meeting much uneasiness was shown as to some of the methods practised by the "Home Mission" Committee which resulted in the authorization of a conference to be composed of delegates from the English Quarterly Meetings and the General Meeting for Scotland to consider the whole question of Home Mission work as carried on in connection with Friends in Great Britain. The Home Mission Committee which was re-appointed for one year only was also made a component part of the conference.

The meetings of this conference were held on the 2nd and 3rd of the Eleventh Month and very full reports of its proceedings have reached us through the medium of the English periodicals. It appears from these reports that in the early part of the conference strenuous efforts were made to prevent a full discussion of the objectionable features. One member expressed the hope "that the Friends who occupied the whole of the time when the matter was last discussed in the Yearly Meeting would not again take up time by simply covering again the whole of the ground!" Another proposed that Friends should be limited to five minutes in expressing their views. There was a further suggestion (if the matter is correctly reported) that the discussion should be limited to two heads: "mission work generally" and "maintenance of the workers" thus practically leaving out the most important matter which the conference was called to consider, which was the peril of lowering our testimony to the free exercise of Gospel ministry and the priesthood of believers.

None of these suggestions however obtained favor and the conference proceeded to a full discussion of the whole subject referred to it, though an unsuccessful effort was subsequently made to rule out references to the adoption of the "Pastoral System" by some of the American Yearly Meetings.

There were some remarkable statements made by those who favored the methods employed by the Committee. One member "who spoke of himself as coming from one of the grave-yards of the Society, told of the gradual dwindling of his meeting" and contrasted it with the wonderful success of a neighboring chapel which he asserted "was brought about when the deacons hired a shrewd business like Scotchman and paid him a sufficient sum to devote his whole time to the organization of their body." A vigorous effort was also made by some others to repudiate any intention on the part of the Committee to bring about results such as were indicated in the sentiments thus expressed. It was pointed out however on the other hand how the Home Mission Committee had really violated our fundamental principles as respects the Headship of Christ in his Church, with its necessary consequences as to our meetings for worship and views of Gospel ministry, which are the very foundation stones of our separate existence as a religious society. The Home Mission Committee had sent out persons practically as pastors "for the purpose of building up small meetings." "They were sent out to take the place of the Lord Jesus Christ as the head of these meetings and were looked to to build them up instead of the Lord himself." Forty-two persons of this class had been sent out. It was claimed that they were sent only temporarily but in fact many had been in the same place for years and such meetings "still required building up. When Friends were not pointed to Christ and thrown back upon Him for aid to take their own share in the organization of their meetings, it was likely that these would take many years to build up." "The infringement of our principles consisted in any individual being set apart to take the place of the Lord Jesus Christ as the Head of his Church in any particular place."

Notwithstanding the fact that the conference was loaded down with the whole strength of the Home Mission Committee (comprising 59 out of a total of 322) the sentiment which prevailed was overwhelmingly adverse to the methods of the Committee which had been objected to.

As the outcome of this interesting assembly it may be stated that minutes were adopted embodying the "general desire to affirm our continued adherence to the views ever upheld by us on the true authority, right exercise, and freedom of the ministry of the Gospel, to the Headship of Christ, the priesthood of believers and the nature of spiritual worship"

A further minute was adopted to the effect that the action of the Home Mission Committee in respect to those matters had not been satisfactory to many Friends.

Suggestions were also made to the Yearly Meeting as to the future constitution of a Home Mission Committee, with such restrictions as would tend to obviate the danger of constituting a separate class.

A correspondent of the London Friend evidently favorable to the work of the Home Mission Committee in reviewing the proceedings of the conference writes as follows:

"It was made evident beyond doubt that a very wide spread uneasiness existed as to some of the actions of the Home Mission Committee which were regarded as antagonistic to, or subversive of these views." [The right qualification for the ministry of the Gospel.]

"The vital objection made by many to the action of the Committee was not so much to the pecuniary support given to those working in connection with it, as to what, in several instances appeared to be the placing of one man in the position of the pastor or leader of the meeting. It was in vain that those so objecting were assured that the Committee had no such object in view; that, well aware of the dangers incident to such an assumption, they were continually on the watch in that direction, and that the workers also repudiated it. The objectors were firmly convinced by what they regarded as the lessons of history in the long past supported by recent events in the Western Yearly Meetings of America, that the inevitable result of the continuance of the present action of the Committee would be disastrous to the Society; their opposition therefore was in no way lessened by anything said in the conference."

"It was evident from the decided preponderance of this feeling in a body truly representative that in order to preserve harmony in the Society some radical change must be made. Friends of every shade of opinion united in recommending that the constitution of the Committee should be altered."

Whilst the action of the conference is subject to review by the Yearly Meeting there is reason to believe that that body will not reject its decisions.

The "Pastoral System" has taken a firm hold of a large part of our own body in America and many meetings have adopted a mild form of sacerdotalism, which method has also recently been approved by the Indianapolis Conference. It is encouraging to know that Friends in England have been awakened to the perils that threaten them in the introduction of what is wholly at variance with our principles and that a stand has been made against it.

Eleventh Month 30th, 1892.

Since the foregoing was written the writer has seen an account of the Conference by Mary Snowden Braithwaite of Kendal England from which the following extract is taken as a fitting supplement to what has already been said.

"I know of many who were anxious to express their feelings on the blessing and advantage of going on in aggressive work on the old but ever new lines, and of their sense of the danger of officially arranging for and supplying resident workers, but for them also there was but little time. Outside of the meeting I had many come to me in warm approval of the plea for freedom and the protest against walking in a road that had hitherto led to a settled pastorate in church history and in our own Society in America. One young Friend full of zeal and desire to serve her Lord and Saviour told me that she came from a meeting where there were a great many young people and she added 'we are waiting to see whether Friends believe in their own principles or not, from the outcome of this Conference. We do not think they do. We are strong in our belief in them and we wish to work in that way.' I urged her to say this in the Conference to which she replied, 'I cannot get a chance. I have stood up six times already.' I know she represented many of the younger Friends."

I may add that from information derived from a friend who lately returned from a long sojourn in England and whose opportunities were considerable of judging of the sentiments of Friends from a very intimate association with them I am satisfied that the reaction against the objectionable features of the "Home Mission" work is largely and possibly mostly among the younger and middle aged Friends. This is a hopeful sign and gives promise of a wide spread influence against further progress of the "Pastoral System." It is devoutly to be hoped for that such a result may follow.

For "THE FRIEND."

The Chicago Exhibition.

As we read that wonderful prayer of our Blessed Saviour for his disciples, when He had finished his great work of example and teaching upon earth, and was about to be offered a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of mankind,—not that they should be taken out of the world, but be kept from the evil,—and call to mind that it extends down to all future ages of believers, our hearts are animated with gratitude and love, and we are afresh incited to watchfulness unto prayer, lest in any wise we be found hindering the fulfilment thereof, either in our own hearts or the hearts of others. Neither by precept nor example does He exclude his children from mingling with others, but by both of these his teachings are, that we "Be not conformed to this world." And the renewed mind which has proved the good and acceptable, and perfect will of his God, will seek to avoid every occasion which has a tendency to bring reproach upon the precious cause of Christ. There are many things which may be lawful in themselves, and which, considered apart from their accompaniments, might have a show of usefulness, but which are not expedient for the living member of the church of Christ, because of the evils which are encouraged thereby. Amongst these we view with great apprehension and godly jealousy the coming exhibition at Chicago; and would affectionately entreat all who profess to be the "followers of God as dear children," that they be very careful how they lend their aid in this direction, or participate in the scenes which may be enacted there, lest they be found of that number who "crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame."

The military display, which is one of the marked features of the celebration, and has a tendency to gender in the minds of men, and especially the young, the feeling of love for, and interest in the use of carnal weapons; accompanied with the idea that these are necessary in order to maintain a true allegiance to our country; The desecration of that day which has been set apart for rest and religious worship, at which has been proved to be a great blessing. The license for liquor selling, whereby our brother may be led into sin; these, and other iniquitous practices, are among the evils which we bring down upon our land sooner or later, to just judgments of the Almighty, and which every living member of the church of Christ should set his face against, that with clean hands we may unitedly put up our petitions "Spa, thy people, O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach." When the hearts of all Christians are thus filled with the power of the Holy Ghost by hands unsullied by touch of evil; may we not with confidence look for the blessing of the Lord upon our feeble efforts for the promotion of his work in the earth, and the fulfilment of the ancient prophecy, that "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

Natural History, Science, etc.

Homely Gymnastics.—That there is not much sanitary or strengthening influence in the operation of dusting is evident; and yet many women, disdaining heavier work, reserve this domestic duty for themselves, and waste much time upon it. Muscular motion is of little value unless vigorous and swift. The slow walk and loitering movement do not arouse the blood from its torpidity. The lowest labor when zealously performed may be followed by an unexpected hygienic effect. There is the instance of a penniless young man, threatened with a fever in a strange country, shipping as a deck hand, and returning to die among his people. During his voyage he scrubbed away the dirt from the ship-boards, and with it the disease that had invaded his life craft. A story is also told of a family whose women were of the delicate, delicate sort. Misfortune obliged them to perform their own domestic work. What seemed to them a sad necessity proved itself a double blessing. They gained what they had never known before, robust health; and their enforced economy restored them to a prosperous condition. Not all physicians are clear-sighted or independent enough to prescribe as did one of their number. A young lady supposed to be suffering with anemia, nervous prostration and other fashionable ills, sent for the family doctor. "Is there anything I can do to help her?" she asked, after the usual question. "There is," answered he; "follow this prescription faithfully." The folded scrap of paper read as follows: One broom; use in two hours of house-work daily.—Alice B. Tweedy.

Spiders.—Gordon Stables, in his work Our Friends in Wood and Field, describes the capture by a spider of one of the large cockroaches which infest ships, especially in tropical climates. He witnessed the scene while taking a siesta in his cot.

"A big spider who dwells up in a corner notices a cockroach—probably overpowered by wine—that seems to have gone to sleep all over its back, and immediately comes forward, way up the bulkhead, and immediately begins to bag him. So he saunters, carelessly down, and walks in a wide circle round the roach, attaching a thread here and there; having done so, he runs rapidly round the creature, entangling his legs, then dips his threads into the roach's body, and the cockroach is swinging in mid-air by a thread attached to the roof. Up runs the spider and descends by this guy, and first gives his prey the quietus, then proceeds to devour him. He does not do this as a sailor would going aloft and pulling him up hand over hand, because the slack of the rope would be staid, and might entangle his own feet; but rolls the cockroach up lengthwise on the head, head-and-tail fashion, till he is at the f. Then the spider gets rid of the wings, legs, and antennæ—which observant ants march with—and envelops the body in a cocoon, thus secures fresh meat for days.

The Elephant Knew.—Stories of the elephant's sagacity are every where rife in India, and, indeed, every one who happens to have seen these creatures employed in Government contract or will scarcely have failed to notice numerous instances of it himself.

An engineer officer, who was stationed at Cuttack a few years back, was possessed of a valuable elephant, which, to his great regret, contracted a virulent disease of the eyes, after suffering with it for a few days, became completely blind. His owner thereupon applied to a resident surgeon, stating the case, asking if he could do anything for the relief of his favorite. The surgeon, after examining the elephant's eyes, said that he was willing to try the effect of nitrate of silver on one of them, that being a remedy which was very beneficial in the treatment of the human eye afflicted with a similar disease. The animal's driver accordingly summoned, and the great beast was instrumentally made to lie down. The surgeon then applied the nitrate of silver, and the elephant, uttering a roar of pain, jumped up and behaved in such an outrageous fashion that it was some hours before he could be calmed down and secured in his stable again.

One day or two afterward the doctor called again, and found that his application had worked well, the sight of the one eye being almost completely restored, and in consequence deterred to operate in a similar manner on the other. He was apprehensive of the animal's behavior, more especially as he was now able to see, and suggested that he be properly secured before he operated upon him. However, the elephant had recognized the doctor's voice, and, everybody's intense astonishment, followed him of his own accord out of the stable into the street, lay down without any persuasion, placing his head quietly on one side with the diseased eye toward, then curled up his trunk and drew a deep breath, like any human being might do, and was about to undergo a painful operation and awaited the doctor's pleasure. The doctor used his brush as dexterously as possible, and applied the caustic as quickly as he could, and at the same time performed the work thoroughly. During the entire operation the elephant, so far from behaving as he had previously uttered not a sound, and when it was over, he panted with a sigh of satisfaction, and manifested by every means in his power the delight and gratitude he experienced at its completion, by caressing the surgeon with his trunk, and making other similar demonstrations as he lay back to his stake, and, despite the pain he was suffering, uttering no sound of complaint.

This incident, which was well known in Calcutta, not only showed memory, but a high degree of reasoning power, for the animal, realizing the benefit he had received from the application, was, in spite of the pain it cost him, not only willing, but anxious to undergo the second in order that his other eye might be cured in like manner.—St. Louis Globe Democrat.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 24, 1892.

The British Friend of Twelfth Month 1st, contains an article by Frederick Burgess, which speaks of the Conference there recently held by Friends in Great Britain on the "Home Mission Committee," which brings to view some of the questions involved in the prosecution of "Home Mission" work. From it the following is extracted:

"The feeling of that Conference seems to have been that the operations of the Committee infringed the principle of our worship, that they tended to Sacerdotalism, and where successful, led by means which were Methodistic, to something which was not Quakerism."

"At the present time the old ideal of worship, where it is not avowedly abandoned as in the case of Missions, is often but imperfectly realized, and by many is no longer believed to be practicable. In these days of busybodies there is but little belief in the patience required to realize its truth. To occupy a meeting for worship from beginning to end with vocal utterance of some sort,—anything being better than silence,—is the idea of worship which now too often obtains, and this implies an utter distrust of our professed belief as to the nature of worship, and a misplaced confidence in the value of what is uttered. It is not worship, it is the negation of worship, if not, sometimes, even worse. This anomalous position cannot last. A service which is neither spiritual, intellectual, nor æsthetic, recommends itself to no one, unless it be to those who are glad of the liberty to exercise their supposed gift of speech; and probably does more harm than good. Dogmatic statements, conventional phrases, a misuse of the Bible, a misconception of the nature of religion and a want of spirituality, are enough to repel—as a matter of fact do repel, and will further repel—those whom true Quakerism would attract.

"If it is said that the proceedings of the energetic section of the Society represented by the Home Mission Committee are justified by results, and that the means to attain its end are of no consequence so long as they are successful, the claim cannot be allowed without examination. No one doubts that good is effected by the Mission Workers, or that Mission Work may be conducted rightly; but it is also true that vital harm may be involved. It is possible that aggressive activity may take the place of something better, and if it retards the development of a principle which lies at the foundation of all real progress, and contains the promise and potency of all spiritual life, it becomes a source of mischief. The good effected will be purchased too dearly, and if "Mission Work" is allowed to supersede the true Mission of Quakerism, the world will suffer loss."

"As it is, religion is discredited by the mistakes of its votaries; Error is identified with Truth, and mankind in despair finds refuge in agnosticism on one hand, or in sacerdotalism on the other. And in its own limited degree the Mission movement of the Society of Friends has tended to both issues, and will if uncontrolled make an end of genuine Quakerism."

Another writer on the same subject says:—"It was the evident judgment of the majority of the Conference that their policy had better be revised in one important matter, that of 'settling a Friend in a meeting to build it up.'"

An editorial in the same paper contains the following suggestive remarks:

"A remarkable leader on the recent Friends' Conference, held in London, appeared in the Christian World of the 17th ult. Want of space alone prevents our giving the article in full, but the following extracts from it will be read by Friends generally with deep interest, as presenting the judgment of an impartial outsider on the root question so carefully considered by the Conference, and upon which it came to so unmistakable a decision.

"At a recent Conference of the Society of Friends a very interesting discussion took place, on a subject which has an important bearing on the spiritual prosperity of all churches alike. That subject was the legitimacy, from a Quaker point of view, of a Ministry relieved from the necessity of self-support, and officially devoted to the work of the Gospel. An innovation of this kind of recent years has caused a good deal of uneasiness amongst the Friends, and the discussion of the question at the recent Conference extended over five sittings. We observe that while the prevalent feeling was evidently against the new fashion, there was no disposition to deny that in other branches of the Church a separated Ministry might have an appropriate place. But the opponents held, that whatever might be the advantage of the system, 'it was not Quakerism.'

"But, if it is not right for Quakers, why should it be right for other sections of the Church of Christ? The answer apparently is that the Friends were raised up to bear a special testimony. This special testimony, besides the doctrine of the Inward Light, included the free exercise of the Gospel ministry and the priesthood of believers. To institute a 'separate' Ministry, would, in the view of almost all present, tend to diminish the freedom of speaking, and would also threaten the innovation of a special priesthood. We have much sympathy with this view of the case. Our respect and admiration for the Society of Friends is such that we hear of their diminishing numbers with the most unfeigned regret. But we are inclined to agree with them, that even the arrest of this outward decay might be too dearly purchased at the expense of surrendering the special reasons for their existence as a denomination. The sacrifice they make is not without its compensations. One of the speakers, while acknowledging that in the absence of separate Ministers, 'there was not that continued round of effort to keep up the steam, which might be seen elsewhere,' yet held that 'more opportunity was allowed for the development of the gifts of the worshippers.'

"But while it may be difficult or impossible for the Friends to take a leaf out of the book of other denominations without surrendering their own special testimony, there surely should be nothing to prevent other denominations learning from them. There is not a single branch of the Free Churches, not even that of the Primitive Methodists, whose experience fails to confirm the warnings uttered by many of the Friends at this Conference against the effects of a separated Ministry. When the Spirit said to the Church at Antioch, 'Separate me Barnabas and Saul, for the work whereunto I have called them,' the succeeding story makes it perfectly plain that there was no authority whatever for separating these men from the ordinary duties or vocations or engagements of life, except so far as might be absolutely necessary for itinerant preachers. They were separated in the sense of being chosen out of the congregation at Antioch to go on their travels, but not in any other sense whatever.

"Unfortunately, in succeeding times the notion of a separated Ministry developed into that of a Sacerdotal caste, with results of far-reaching demoralization and spiritual paralysis. From this evil the Reformed Churches have not been able entirely to free themselves. Even those which most cherish the tradition of their Puritan descent treat their ministers in all but name as priests. They expect them to wear a particular attire; they regard them as alone authorized to preside at the Lord's Supper, and to administer Baptism. They expect from them a different kind of morality from that which is thought sufficient for the 'laity.' They treat them more or less as Father Confessors, and they regard Ministers' meetings as a kind of Synod. As a result, lay preaching is discouraged or treated as a kind of spurious article. The ordinance of the Lord's Supper comes to be associated with superstitious notions. And Baptism, instead of being regarded with intelligence as a symbol of dedication, is supposed to have some nameless, indescribable, but real effect upon eternal salvation. Perhaps the worst of these evils is the discouragement of lay preaching and lay evangelization. Throughout the land there is a considerable dearth of preaching in village districts, and we do not see how that dearth is ever to be remedied except by the complete and frank abandonment of the superstition of a separated Ministry."

The article on this subject in our present number, by our friend George Vaux, gives a condensed view of the whole discussion.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—During Eleventh Month, 27,492 emigrants came into the United States, as against 38,615 in Eleventh Month, 1891.

In response to inquiries made by the Senate Committee on Immigration regarding the danger of the appearance of cholera in this country, about a dozen prominent New York physicians agree that great danger of the appearance of cholera exists in the public mind and among physicians. They were also of opinion that rigid quarantine abroad should be adopted and rigid inspection and strict quarantine of vessels in this country. If these suggestions are impracticable, the physicians believe that immigration should be suspended for one year.

Commissioner of Internal Revenue Mason, says that the passage of Representative Scott's bill increasing the tax on distilled spirits to $1.25 a gallon would increase the revenues of the Government to the extent of $35,000,000 a year.

The Committee on Ceremonies of the World's Fair has decided to have the exercises at the opening of the Exposition on Fifth Month 1st, 1893, as brief as possible. The President of the United States will be asked to make an address and start the machinery, and a poem by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes will be read and prayer offered.

The Supreme Court of Indiana has decided unconstitutional the Apportionment act passed by the Democratic Legislature two years ago, under the provisions of which the Legislature which meets next month was chosen. The finding is that the apportionment laws of 1891, 1885 and 1879 are all unconstitutional by reason of the matters alleged in the complaint, "but the Court also finds that there is a de facto Legislature elected, qualified to enact a law which may take the place of the law set aside."

Francis L. Basques, Consul for San Domingo, in New York, confirms the report that a syndicate of American capitalists has acquired the right to collect the custom revenues of the Republic of San Domingo. By obtaining this right the syndicate practically controls the finances of San Domingo.

After a hearing before a Pittsburgh Alderman, on the 17th instant, Robert Beatty was held in $5000 bail to answer at Court charges of conspiring to drug and poison men employed by the Carnegie Company during the Homestead strike.

The police census of Philadelphia, just completed, shows the population of the city to be 1,142,653, an increase of 95,689 over the population as shown by the census of 1890.

Deaths in this city last week were 455, being 39 more than the previous week, and 170 less than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing, 245 were males and 210 females; 62 died of diphtheria; 59 of pneumonia; 53 of consumption; 24 of diseases of the heart; 19 of paralysis; 17 of convulsions; 14 of measles; 14 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of old age; 10 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels, and 10 of casualties.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, reg., 113 a 113½; coupon, 114 a 114½; currency, 6's, 105 a 115.

COTTON was officially quoted ½c. per pound higher, but trade was quiet on a basis of 10½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, spot, $16 a 17c.; spring bran, in bulk, spot, 15 a 16c.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.15;

Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.75; Western winter, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do. do., straight, $3.75 a $4.00; winter patent, $4.00 a $4.35; Minnesota, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do., straight, $3.75 a $4.15; do., patent $4.25 a $4.50; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour moved slowly at $3.45 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania. Buckwheat flour was quiet but firm, at $1.90 a $2 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 73½ a 74 cts.
No. 2 mixed corn, 48½ a 48½ cts.
No. 2 white oats, 40 a 40½ cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ a 5½c. good, 5 a 5½c.; medium, 4½ a 4½c.; common, 4½ a 4½c.; culls, 3½ a 4c. fat cows, 2½ a 3½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5½c.; good, 4½ a 5c.; medium, 4½ a 4½c.; common, 3½ a 4c.; culls, 1½ a 3c.; lambs, 5 a 6½c.

HOGS.—Extra Western, 9c.; for other Western, 8½ a 8½c.

FOREIGN.—Sir Richard Owen one of the world's foremost specialists in comparative Anatomy, died on the 18th instant. He was born in Lancaster, Seventh Month 20th, 1804.

A fearful explosion occurred on the 14th instant at the Bam Furlong Colliery, Wigan, and not less than 50 lives have been lost. The men went to their work as usual in the morning, and after the colliery had been inspected in the usual way. They had not long been at work when a terrible explosion shook the earth for a great distance, and a cloud of smoke shot up through the mine, and the greatest excitement prevailed. It was seen that a large number must have perished, and the wailing and weeping of women and children made an indelible scene. Steps were immediately taken to ascertain the full extent of the disaster, and a crowd of volunteers promptly offered to explore the pit. It is believed the explosion was caused by accumulated coal gas which had escaped the notice of the official charged with the inspection of the mine.

Charles Aime Marie de Lesseps, Marius Elieenne Fontane and San-Leroy have been arrested by direction of the Minister of Justice, Bourgeois, for their alleged connection with the Panama Canal scandal. Henry Louis Felix Cottu, for whose arrest an order was also issued, has fled to Vienna.

An investigation of the Panama canal affair reveals a shocking condition. It is said that from five to six hundred persons of various stations in life are known to have been implicated in the frauds and bribe-taking connected with the canal enterprise, although the Government has not sufficient evidence to convict any such number.

Baron de Reinach is stated to have received 5,000,000 francs for advertising and on account of the "underwriting syndicate." Ten million francs were given to persons to boom the Panama loans. Oberdoerfer received 2,000,000 francs for merely suggesting the device of a lottery.

The International Money Conference has adjourned until Fifth Month 13th, 1893, without securing any practical result, excepting an interchange of views.

The committee of 26 members of the German Reichstag, to which the Army bill has been referred, consists of three Social Democrats, six Freisinnige members, eight Clericals, two Poles, three National Liberals, one Free Conservative and five Right Conservatives. It is believed that it will be impossible for the bill to obtain a majority in a committee so constituted, and the opponents of the measure confidently expect its defeat.

Official statistics of the cholera epidemic in Russia have been issued, showing 130,417 deaths from European and 135,343 deaths from Asiatic cholera since the outbreak of the disease in the Empire, making a total of 265,760 deaths.

A despatch from Astrakhan states that a fire recently broke out among a fleet of 27 naphtha boats at that place. All the people on the barges managed to reach the shore in safety. The sight presented as one after another of the cargoes exploded was a magnificent one. No damage was done beyond that incurred to the barges themselves. This is the second large naphtha fire that has occurred at Astrakhan within a short time.

The steamer Peru, at San Francisco on the 13th inst., brought news that the fire in Tokio on Eleventh Month 11th, destroyed nearly seven hundred houses. Seventeen firemen were injured while fighting the conflagration. On Eleventh Month 7th a portion of a limestone mine in Negayamura, Japan, collapsed, killing 36 miners.

Late advices report the volcano of Mauna Loa, in active operation.

On the 30th of Eleventh Month, and subsequently, illuminations have been on a grand scale, and whole country has been shaken by a prodigious earthquake. The earthquake commenced on morning of Twelfth Month 2nd, and increased force till evening, when flames burst from Mauna Loa, and grew in volume and increased in noise from that time on. It was feared the entire village Hilo, under the mountain, and the neighboring town of Waiakaea may be destroyed, and that the vast valuable plantations surrounding them will be covered with lava.

An aerolite which is said to weigh 40,000 pounds fell about four months ago, near Jiminez, Mexico, struck a cliff in its descent, it is further said, and its course down the mountain side ploughed a deep furrow in the earth and rock, revealing a rich vein of silver at one point. The claim was immediately taken, and is being worked with good profit.

A despatch from Halifax, Nova Scotia, says that the exodus from the Annapolis and Cornwallis valleys to the United States has reached large proportions this fall. At one railway station 70 tickets were in two days to people leaving that district to re-enter the United States.

Count Tolstoi purposes paying a visit to the United States next spring. His object is "to live with farmers, to study their methods of agriculture, stock raising, to become acquainted with the people of America who cultivate the soil."

The Standard's Madrid correspondent says that he understands that Premier Sagasta will reverse protection policy of the Canovas Cabinet as far as possible by treaties of commerce with the United States and European countries.

DIED, Eleventh Month 11th, 1892, at the residence of her son-in-law, Edwin Crew, near Pennsville, Morgan Co., Ohio, MATILDA DODD, relict of Isaac Doudna, a member of Pennsville Monthly and Annual Meeting, aged eighty-two years, one month and nineteen days. She was faithful in the attendance of our religious meetings, whilst favored with ability, and although for a few years previous to her death her natural faculties became much impaired, she manifested throughout all a loving and tender spirit, and we humbly hope that she was in mercy permitted to depart to one of those mansions which are prepared for the people of God.

—, On Sixth Month 12th, 1892, at his residence near Pennsville, Morgan Co., Ohio, HENRY DODD, a member of Pennsville Monthly and Particular Meeting, aged seventy-nine years, nine months and seventeen days. During a few of the last years of his life, he passed through much affliction which we believe he bore with Christian patience and resignation. His relatives and friends feel a comfortable hope that through mercy and redeeming love, this dear friend has been gathered into everlasting rest.

—, On Eleventh Month 12th, 1892, at her home in Jackson Co., SUSANNA GOODING, relict of William Gooding, a member of Pennsville Monthly Meeting of Friends, Morgan Co., Ohio, in the thirty-first year of her age.

—, Eleventh Month 22nd, 1892, at the home of his parents in Emporia, Kansas, DAVID H. COPE, son of David and Ruth Cope, a member of Cottonwood Monthly Meeting of Friends, in the forty-fourth year of his age.

—, Ninth Month 25th, 1892, at her residence in Frankford, Philadelphia, ELIZABETH WEBSTER, a loved member and Elder of Frankford Monthly and Particular Meeting, in the seventy-seventh year of her age. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

—, at his home near Chesterfield, on the second day of First Month, 1892, JAMES EDWARDS, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. He was a member of Chesterfield Monthly Meeting and had formerly been one of its leaders. During his illness great suffering was borne with Christian patience and resignation. And they who watched beside him the best assurance that he had received the promised message—"It is enough, come up higher."

Selections from the Life of Mary Dudley.

Soon afterwards she had a public meeting in onmel, and this being the first time she had evinced her concern for the place where she sided, it felt weighty in prospect, as will appear by the following account of this important p.

—"Hadst thou been here I might have been a little more valiant than I found myself, when a matter came to the point that I long had in view, though I never told any one of it till, the anguish of my heart it escaped me, after sitting on First-day, to M. G. and E. P. on air inquiring what ailed me. The time for the fulfilment of this prospect seemed now arrived, and being favored in the afternoon meeting to feel that rise into dominion wherein there is, even vocally, a surrender of my little all, light might be mercifully afforded, I ventured to stop a few Friends afterwards, and informed them of the concern I was under: they evinced much sympathy, and encouraged me to follow apprehended duty.

The meeting was attended by a considerable number, who were generally quiet and solid; although there was more of darkness to encounter, and less, I thought, of the right thirst, than in some late meetings, yet it may be thankfully acknowledged, help was graciously extended, and that the honor of Truth being only in view, preservation was experienced from injuring the precious cause. I never more forcibly felt that truth, 'without me, ye can do nothing.' May it be deeply sealed on my spirit, that the spirits of all who move in this awful life, that so, sufficiency being derived from Him who can alone qualify, his own name may be exalted, and the creature laid in the dust."

The following letter was written in the year 1810, and so manifests the continuance of affectionate and Christian solicitude on behalf of Friends on the continent, that it appears calculated to prove an acceptable termination to the present chapter.

My beloved Friend.—L. Majolier:

Were I to tell thee and thy dear wife, with other valued friends at Congenies, that I have not ceased to love you, as often as the sensible renewings of Christian fellowship refresh my mind, our converse in this way would be frequent; but though I may, through continued gracious regard, be indulged with this symptom of having passed from death unto life, love to the brethren, I seem but seldom under qualification to help any of my fellow professors in their spiritual travail; being often brought very low, not only in mind but in body; instructed by frequent chastisements of love, that I have no continuing city here. You, my dear friends, know some of my many infirmities, and I often gratefully remember how affectionately you sympathized with me, and endeavored, by your friendly attentions, to alleviate such as I was tried with while among you; yea, the remembrance of having been with you is pleasant, and there are seasons when I seem so to visit you in spirit, to feel with and for you, that I am as though personally among you, joying, (if I may use the words of an apostle,) and rejoicing, to behold the steadfastness of some: among these hast thou, beloved Louis, refreshed my mind, in believing that the visitation of Divine love has not been extended in vain; but, that in yielding obedience to the heavenly vision, thou hast known an advancement in the line of righteousness, and an increase in stability and peace. Go on, my endeared friend; the sense that often impressed my heart while with thee now revives; even that much depends on thy perseverance; not only thy own and precious companion's welfare, but that of the little flock, mercifully gathered by the everlasting Shepherd, under whose holy guidance I view thee delegated to lead them, designed in the forcible language of example to encourage them, 'to follow Christ.' Ah! my dear brother, how much is implied in being a follower of Christ; how deep ought the dwelling of such to be, in order that a full conformity may be wrought to his will, by a total renunciation of our own under every appearance. The work of thorough subjection is truly a great work, and it is to be expected, in the refining process, that deep sufferings and closely proving conflicts should attend the exercised spirit. 'Ye shall indeed drink of my cup,' was the blessed Master's language, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with; this is sealed in the experience of his tribulated servants; they measurably partake of the dispensations so largely filled up by Him, when in the prepared body, and herein their union with him is effected; but, blessed be his name, there is a consoling declaration gone forth, if we suffer, we shall also reign with Him. There are seasons when such baptized sons and daughters know, even here, through the resurrection of life, something of this sort, when Truth rising into dominion over all in their hearts, they are made as kings and priests unto God; and there is a season approaching, when, being unclothed of these mortal bodies, such shall be clothed upon with immortality and eternal life. My heart has been unexpectedly filled to thee my dear friend, and I have given my pen liberty; if any thing can be gathered up from these broken hints, which may serve as an encouragement to thee in thy trying allotment, I shall be glad, for surely I would encourage thee; mayest thou put on strength in the Lord's name, and trusting therein find it a strong tower, yea, an impregnable fortress, where the enemy cannot hurt, though he may roar and greatly disquiet. Remember the language applied to the true church, and which belongs to every living member therein, 'He reproveth kings for thy sake, saying, touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.' And now, having relieved my mind a little towards one, I feel a renewed salutation to you, my endeared friends, who were collectively the objects of our visit; a visit to which love was the moving cause, and the consoling attendant of our minds while with you, and which I believe we all now feel to be the cement of a union, not broken or impaired by external separation. In the extension of this pure principle my mind is often drawn towards you, in fervent affectionate solicitude that the good work mercifully begun may abundantly prosper, and He who has been the Alpha becomes the glorious Omega, perfecting the new creation, and fulfilling his gracious purpose, by making you a people to his praise. It is, dear friends, and many of you have seen it, a gradual work; it begins, as in the first or outward creation, with that heavenly command, 'Let there be light.' There are those among you who have intelligently heard this in the secret of your souls, and, through illuminating grace, have clearly distinguished the way wherein you should walk: now this light is to be attended to, according to what the apostle tells the believers, 'to which ye do well to take heed,' because it shines more and more unto the perfect day. While we simply follow it, we come under the description of walking in the day, and stumble not; but are, by regular gradations, introduced into the acceptable state of children of the Lord; taught of Him, and established in righteousness. It is, my beloved friends, this desirable state of establishment in the right way, that my spirit renewedly craves for you and for myself; that every visited mind among you may become redeemed; every called, a chosen disciple, by unreserved dedication of heart to the pure unerring leadings of the only sure guide. Wait, in the silence of all flesh, for the further unfoldings of the Divine law; seek to know a taking root downward; and as you come to witness the sap of heavenly grace to nourish and strengthen the root, you will in due season be qualified to bring forth fruit to the Lord's praise, 'First the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear,' ripening under holy influence, and by the maturing rays of the Sun of Righteousness prepared to be finally gathered into the garner. Oh! how my spirit longs for the safe advancement of the beloved youth among you. May the enriching showers of celestial rain descend to preserve and nourish them; and may the further advanced, those in the meridian and decline of life, wait in humble resignation to know their spirits renewedly seasoned with the salt of the kingdom; that this may produce its salutary effects, enabling to minister grace, suitable example and precept, to the younger. Finally, beloved friends, farewell in the Lord! may He 'be sanctified in them who come nigh' Him, and the gracious purpose of his will be effected, by preparing for himself 'a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing.' In the fresh feeling of undiminished love, I am your cordial friend,

MARY DUDLEY.

The Youths' Home Library.

Request was lately made me by a correspondent, for "the titles and authors of some twenty or thirty books suitable for a library for young people; some of juvenile character for children of ten to twelve years, others for youths and maidens, say in age from thirteen to eighteen. Something light but instructive, not so solid as to be presy, but such as young people might fancy, setting aside fiction."

In educational journals, and in papers of the religious press, it has not been uncommon of late years to see lists of suggested desirable books for a small family library, but they always include some works of fiction—perhaps one-third or one-half of that class. There is a class of juvenile books, however, like those of Jacob Abbott, not dealing in plot or sensation or triviality, but obviously compiled with the benevolent purpose of imparting instruction in a plain and pleasant manner, which hardly come under the designation of fiction. A limited number of these are to be found in libraries under the care of Friends, where fiction as we generally understand it, is carefully excluded. A few years ago, when the writer was connected with the management of one of these libraries, the suggestion was made that it might serve a useful purpose to print as an appendix to the annual report a comprehensive list of recommended, non-harmful juvenile books. Although that suggestion was not then adopted, I have felt that there would be value in having it carried out; continuing the list so as to include books suitable for youths up to about eighteen years of age.

At this time of the approach of a new year, many parents will be scanning the catalogues of books, or advertised announcements of new issues, or press notices of the same, or, perhaps, be examining with more or less of haste the supplies on sale at the book stores, with the view of making purchases for their children or young relations. Most persons who have arrived at years of maturity, will be apt to have grateful remembrance of some improving or healthily stimulating book or books which they have felt were specially helpful to them in their younger years; and, again, parents or care-takers of the present time will have read to their young charges other excellent works which they will have wished that very many others might have had the pleasure and profit of listening to or of individually perusing. Any who may care to send to me (Seal P. O., Chester Co., Pa.) the titles and authors of such books, with the names of the publishers, may thus assist in the preparation of a suggested list for a small home library for the young, which may be useful to some of our own members and may also be welcomed by others who, while deploring the abounding mass of sensational literature, have thought that a good deal of selected fiction was necessary in providing for the mental entertainment of the young. While such a list would in a measure be only tentative, yet it might have practical value in itself and for its suggestiveness.

Reference has been made to publishers' announcements, and to notices or reviews of books in the public prints. The latter being very often the expression of an extremely cursory examination, and the former biased by self-interest, are not always to be depended upon in making desirable book selections. Some books and magazines are given commendatory notice even in the religious press, are thence welcomed, like favored guests, to the bosom of the family, to the parlor and the fireside, but, were the language they contain actually spoken by guests in those homes, requests for their instant withdrawal would follow. "We aim to make it popular," was the reply of a publisher to one who called his attention to the pernicious character of the magazine he issued, and of which he admitted that "unfortunate expressions" would sometimes creep in. A copy of this monthly falling under my notice several weeks ago, it was perceived to be almost entirely made up of sensational fiction, and such as betokened a far more intimate acquaintance with the purlieus of the play-house than with the quiet precincts of home.

While penning the foregoing considerations, I have been interested to see in the current number of that carefully edited Mennonite periodical, the Herald of Truth, not less than three articles inciting their members not to neglect providing improving literature for the children, and such as shall be suitable for their age and condition. A special concern seemed to be felt for those "who are neither little nor big, for the latter class are so often neglected, and not given a chance to develop the spiritual man with the physical."

Obviously this concern needs to be widespread and continuous if the integrity of the family is to be maintained against our unwearied Adversary's mischief-making through the medium of the printed page.

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

For the "FRIEND."

S. E. Morris and J. E. Rhoads' Travels in Japan.

En route to MITO, Japan, Ninth Month 17th, 1892.

Dr. Whitney met us at a station near Tokyo, and we have his helpful company for our visit to Mito and Tsuchira, where are none who can interpret for us, though there are two young men at Mito who speak English; one of them is a Christian. Two at Tsuchira have been connected with Friends in Tokyo, and are doing mission work, but know but little of our language.

Arrived at Mito, we were met at the station by W. B., a Canadian, who teaches in the Public School. He is a young man and has a wife also from Canada. They are very pleasant and congenial, are Methodists, and very moderate in their religious views. The wife says her husband tells her she ought to be a Friend.

First-day, 19th.—We went to our Friends' Meeting place early to see the Bible School, in which ten or twelve children are taught by two Japanese women, who are Friends, and the wives of lawyers. We are greatly pleased with these ladies, for such they appear to be. They also seem like very substantial characters, and to have some religious experience. The husbands are not Friends, but attend the meeting. Dr. Whitney expounded Scripture, in which he is quite ready, for some time. Afterwards the morning meeting for worship was held. It was conducted with decorum and the people were serious. A young teacher, an associate of W. B., was present. He is an inquirer, but has made no profession of Christianity yet. He had never been at a Christian gathering before.

There are but few who have actually joined the Society here yet. The attendance in the evening was pretty good. S. M. had spoken in the morning, and we both had some service in the evening, Dr. W. interpreting for us.

19th.—Arrangement was made for our journey to Tsuchira by jinrikishas with two men each. The distance is thirty miles, and the men agreed to take us there and back for 3.20 yen each. The first seven miles were covered in one hour. The men travelled in a trot except on a few steep hills. The road is gravelled except for two or three miles, is in good repair. No railroad runs in that direction, which is one reason for the road being kept up.

Tsuchira has an estimated population of 10,000 and appears to be prosperous. Foreign people and ways have not made much inroad, and we have a good sample of old Japan.

The two Friend missionaries met us at the outskirts of the town and escorted us to a good hotel. The house has three stories and we were put in the upper one. The room was of good size, but no furniture in it except the mats on the floor and some oil cloth circular pieces placed about. Tea was brought pretty soon, and two friends remained to see we were properly served, and to help order supper for us. We carried with us crackers and canned beef, so had some resource beside Japanese food. The fish, plainly cooked, is good, and they prepare eggs and rice very nicely. Some of their mixtures and pickled articles are disgusting unless one gets used to them. Their cookery is said to be clean.

There were at least one hundred people at the meeting, who presented a respectable appearance. Chairs were provided in sufficient number for us to use them, while the audience sat on the floor. S. M. set before them some of the foundation truths of religion and the blessings that flow from it to men and communities. I afterwards endeavored to carry forward the effects to the life to come, and to set forth the great reward of eternal life. Dr. Whitney followed on the new birth in a way adapted to their habits of thought.

Such companies are, as a rule, always attentive and respectful.

An interested company of men collected at one corner of the room after meeting, to which Dr. W. was introduced first, afterwards S. M. and myself spoke to them. They each handed us his card written in English. We each expressed our interest in their future. Two of the three are members of the law-court, and all attenders of the Friends' Meeting. Such men undergo a great change before becoming Christians, towards which I fear their intellectual reasoning will not much contribute; and yet, we have heard of instances where real humility of soul has been manifested. How much is involved in the adoption of a new religion by a people with the history the Japanese have behind them, one can more fully realize in being among them.

Dr. W. was provided with tracts which he distributed along the road as we met travellers, or the people of a neighborhood. They were kindly accepted. A priest was the recipient of one as we passed him. He turned back and calling after the Doctor handed him 20 sen or more. An interesting conversation ensued, and we were furnished with a Testament, &c. On parting, he told the Doctor he would hear from him again.

Returning to our hotel, we found our beds prepared on the mats. Thick quilts underneath, and others for covers, with pillows six inches in diameter, covered with white muslin except at the ends. Mosquito netting surrounded the whole. I slept as comfortably as if in a good bed at home.

We did not accompany Dr. W. the next morning in his calls on some of the Friends, as we can do little but sit still on such occasions. Ordinary civil remarks seem rather flat to pass through an interpreter.

Dr. W. is interested in a project of establishing a Dispensary at Tsuchira under the care of a graduate from Tokyo.

Much seed-sowing is being done in the way of scripture and tract distribution; also by itinerant preachers. The Bible Societies keep Collectors in the field. George Braithwaite visits many of these, going out with them, and teaching them how to present the Scriptures in a way to secure their purchase by the people. A talk, and reading some portion of them is generally necessary to be done. In one way or other, some knowledge of Christianity is being disseminated.

We have met a Baptist missionary here, just returned from a jinrikisha journey of 160 miles which he has made in a week, accompanied by a Japanese preacher, who acts as interpreter. He spoke of one meeting held in a theatre that was attended by 600 people.

Ninth Month 21st.—The weather has been showery for several days, and to-day is very wet. We failed to look up our train time, thinking we should not leave until near noon to go on to Sindai. But as we are on a branch road, some distance from the main line north, we should have left Mito at 6.20 A. M. Failing to do this, we concluded to remain here another day, rather than travel in the night and reach Sindai at 40 A. M.

Our quarters are comfortable, so we feel satisfied to keep quietly indoors. The temperature has fallen to 62 degrees, making a decided change in the amount of clothing needful. Our friends can, however, have fire in some rooms.

22nd.—On our way to Sindai. W. B. has been devoted to the missionary cause from his boyhood, and proposed in his heart to go to Japan some years ago. He met with various hindrances, and after several propositions from others to go to China and India, to which he consented but was hindered from proceeding, he was allowed to keep £60 that had been given him to go to India, and use it for the journey to Japan. £10 were added to it, and £10 sent from his family enabled him to proceed. His wife is the daughter of a Methodist minister in Canada, and had given her heart to her Saviour in early life, and was quite ready to join her husband in foreign mission field, in which she was encouraged by her family. Arrived in Yokohama, he at once learned from a friend to whom he had written, that a revulsion of feeling towards foreigners had taken place owing to difficulties in revising treaties, and that it was not likely he could get a position as teacher in a government school, which he desired. His friends, however, invited him to Tokyo to meet the missionaries. One who was present had previously offered a place at Mito, about to be vacated. This man was not inclined to take the situation, and it was suggested that W. B. might secure it. A passport was promptly obtained, and he was quickly off to Mito. The place was secured at a salary of 100 yen per month. When the contract came to be signed, he was forbidden to teach Christianity in Mito under any circumstances, unless in the course of a lesson some allusion to Bible history should need explanation. These opportunities, we had been told by others, are improved by the teachers to bring in as much religious information as the subject will admit.

W. B. has spent eighteen months in the school, and his contract expiring next year, he has resigned his position, intending to return to America, being discouraged with the circumstances that defeat the object he had in coming to Japan. Several of us regret that the services of such a man should be lost to the cause of religion here.

Last evening was spent in a religious opportunity, and much interesting conversation with W. B. and wife, and we felt that our detention of another day was not lost time.

Sindai, Ninth Month 25th, 1892.—We reached this city on Fifth-day evening. It is near, though not on the Bay of Sindai, more than 200 miles northeast of Tokyo. The population numbers near 50,000. A large government college has been instituted here within a few years; also, a Presbyterian school of high grade. A Congregational school, originated by J. H. Neesima about sixteen years ago, has been allowed to go down on account of the difficulty of sustaining it in competition with the government college. Some of the teachers have gone to other places, and a few of the students to Kyoto.

Besides these societies there are a Baptist and Methodist mission. The Greek Church has many places of worship through Japan, and probably numerous adherents.

We are entertained by J. H. De Foust and wife who are Congregationalists. He was an associate of Neesima, having come to Japan with him, and undertaken the school here at his solicitation.

On Sixth-day we visited the Presbyterian College, and were introduced to several of the teachers, and heard a recitation in English idioms before Schneider, a Lancaster County man. We then called on Wm. E. Hoy, the leader in founding the school.

Yesterday was bright and bracing after nearly a week of cloudy and rainy weather. A fine cliff rises from the river's side a quarter of a mile from us, and thither we walked under the guidance of three of our young friends. There are temples with their hideous images on the highest spots, but these are not in the way of viewing the city, and the mountains and ocean that lie around.

W. E. Hoy having invited us to dine, we there met with several intelligent Japanese, including the head of the college. They could all speak English, and some pleasant intercourse followed. D. B. Schneider sat near me, and in the course of our conversation he expressed religious sentiments much in accord with those of Friends. In response to our belief that those who live according to the best light they have received, may be saved through the merits of Christ; he told of a woman who was somewhat advanced in years and was suffering from a disorder that necessitated a painful operation. This she underwent in a hospital at Tokyo, without the use of an anæsthetic, enduring it without any expression of suffering. In reply to a remark that it must have caused great pain, she said, "Yes, the severance of the nerves in such a manner must cause much pain." Some time after, being ill, she was very resigned and peaceful, but her relatives were unwilling she should die without having her attention drawn to Christianity. Belonging to the Greek Church, they called in a priest, who spoke to her. She told them she thought it her duty to let them know she felt entirely at peace, and did not need his advice. Singing a Buddhist hymn, she soon after died.

It had been arranged to have a meeting with the Missionaries in the afternoon. At four o'clock they all came together except W. E. H., who is suffering with asthma.

While we were aware that the truths we had to speak were familiar to our hearers, we had some evidence that the revival of them was seasonable, and that they found place in the hearts of several present.

In the evening we had a call from M. Oshikawa, the Principal of the Presbyterian school. He is a man of extensive learning and superior abilities. If he and others of the same class would keep to a deep and humble faith in Christ, they might do a great work for their country.

27th.—We are on our way to Tokyo, having left Sindai at 7.25 A. M. Our friends have manifested great kindness to the last.

The country near and for some distance south of Sindai, is well cultivated, and the houses often indicate more comfort than in some neighborhoods. Judging by the mulberry trees, much silk is raised. Rice, is everywhere, in well-watered valleys. Sweet potatoes grow well and of good quality. Small beans are common; also the Cuscuta, the stalk of which is eaten. The lotus is common, and the seed vessel of it offered for sale in the shops. Patches of cotton occur frequently; it is not yet in boll. A kind of large radish, and a long root, shaped like salsify, but eighteen or twenty inches long, are used.

Burying-places are frequent, often of small size, as if for a family, situated on a knoll or hillside. There are larger ones near towns that are probably used by the public.

Cremation is much practised, too, in which case the ashes are preserved. In burial the body is placed in a sitting posture, and in this way the graves are crowded close together. Square, instead of flat stones are their monuments. Sometimes a shrine is near, but not often.

Tokyo, Japan, Tenth Month 1st, 1892.—We came here on the 29th, expecting to go to the prison; but the afternoon proving very wet the visit was deferred.

The American Legation buildings are on rising ground and pleasantly situated. The Minister lives in them, having his and his secretaries' offices in part of the house. The first Secretary and Dr. W. (the interpreter) occupy houses on the adjoining ground. The doctor's house is built Japanese style, one story, and covers considerable space. * * *

Some of the rooms are rather small, and can be thrown together, or divided by their sliding shutters—"shoji." These are made of oiled paper. Those covered with glazed wall-paper are called "amado." The outside wooden ones, that are removed in the day-time are "karakami." They are all very light and slide in shallow grooves. By lifting them, they can be removed altogether. This is done with the karakami; they are pushed to one end of the side of a house, into a projecting closet, and set back in it.

If they were once introduced into our country, Japanese houses would do very well for seashore or other summer cottages. They are cold in winter.

Yesterday, after breakfast, we went with the doctor to his hospital. This was built in memory of his mother, who was devoted to missionary work, and ended her days here. The hospital is chiefly for diseases of the eye, but some other cases are treated. It was begun on a small scale, and now accommodates about forty patients. A Japanese doctor is the resident physician. He gave up a practice worth one hundred yen per month for a salary of thirty yen. His family live at the hospital.

Leaving the hospital, for a short walk, we went to the Legation; and were introduced to our Minister Coombs. He is a Californian. We found him open and conversable—had a pleasant talk with him on our Japanese relations. He has been here but a short time.

Our work here has been laid out for us now, but there have been considerable intervals when we have had little to do but read and write. Several visitors came last evening, and we made a call on a member of the Swedish Mission. This mingling with the missionaries I trust, is profitable, and gives opportunity to inform ourselves of their work, and often to speak a word of counsel or encouragement. Two of the men took tea with us, and it was with these especially we had the conversation.

Extracts from the Diary of Louis Taber.

Second Month 19th, 1860.—I was not at our last Yearly Meeting, which I am informed was a stormy time. I hoped after the division of 1854 that "surely the bitterness of death was past." But it seems that some have yet to drink of the dregs of the cup of trembling, and there remains that which is comparable to the giants of old to be slain. Never have I been so much discouraged about our again being a united people. These difficulties, with some others of a different kind, and our present isolated condition as a Yearly Meeting, have very closely tried my faith. But I have been unable to see how I could have done differently with safety, and I do believe the Good Shepherd is still mindful of us as a people; that He will not utterly cast us away from his presence, and that He has not yet taken his Holy Spirit from us. Trials purify us. "The foundation of God standeth sure having this seal. The Lord knoweth them that are his." May I be kept in this day of deep proving, and be strengthened patiently to bear my allotted portion of suffering, and be preserved through all these dispensations, in the everlasting patience, and in the faith which was once delivered to the saints, which does outlast and will overreach all opposition, and will assuredly have the victory in the end. Our meeting at Short Creek is reduced by removals and death to a small number, but we are much united and have comforting seasons. An event of no small importance to us occurred on Tenth Mo. 7th, the addition of another daughter to our little family. Thankful for the blessing and remembering our additional responsibilities as parents, we unitedly again commit ourselves, together with our dear children into the hands of that great gracious Being who united our hearts and who has hitherto preserved us in the journey of life.

Supposed to be 1862.—Wearied with controversy in our afflicted Society, I have purposely avoided allusions to difficulties amongst us. It may be required of some to contend earnestly "for the faith once delivered to the saints, but I desire not to be a controversialist. How soon will all these things pass away, and we with them, and be forgotten.

Our last Yearly Meeting was about as largely attended as usual, and in some respects there seemed to be an improvement. We are yet in captivity; when will the day of deliverance arrive? Daniel prayed three times a day with his face turned toward Jerusalem, but it was Nehemiah who was afterwards commissioned to lead the captives again to Judea and rebuild the walls of Zion. All are not the true Israel that are of Israel. We need greater humiliation and refinement. But I have never doubted there would be preserved a living remnant, perhaps in all the Yearly Meetings, who will bear upon their shoulders the ark of the testimony, and speak well of the Lord's great and excellent name. Individual faithfulness must precede and keep pace with any real growth and advancement in the militant Church.

O, that there were more amongst us turning to the Healer of breaches, the Restorer of paths to dwell in! I am most of all desirous to feel the witness of acceptance with the Beloved. A few words are occasionally given me to drop in our little meetings. I have ceased to look for or desire great things for myself, being willing, I trust, if permitted to be but a doorkeeper in the Lord's spiritual house.

Year after year with measured tread goes by, bearing us ever nearer "that bourn whence no traveller returns." Having little of importance to note, I have allowed a year to elapse since adding to my diary. Not that we have been without our trials as well as our enjoyments. Could the inner life of different individuals be written in full, I have believed there would be really less difference than is supposed, especially in the lives of the true disciples of a crucified and risen Lord. Those who were arrayed in white robes had all alike come out of great tribulation and had washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

A Prayer for our Country, and the Preservation of the true militant Church.

Great and Eternal God! whose throne is the heavens above, and the earth thy footstool, before whom the nations are as a drop in the bucket, and counted as the small dust in the balance; who weighest the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance, and "takest up the isles as a very little thing." We reverently acknowledge with deep humiliation and abasement of spirit before Thee, that it is because of our many and multiplied transgressions both as individuals and as a people, for our forgetfulness of Thee, and our oppression of the poor, that Thy judgments are thus poured out upon this land, and upon this nation. "By terrible things in righteousness" art Thou again visiting this people, and whilst Thy judgments are abroad in the land, may "the inhabitants thereof learn righteousness."

But in judgment O, righteous Father! be pleased to remember mercy. For when Thou arisest in thy fierce anger to judge among the nations, who shall be able to stand before Thee? Thou canst make "even the wrath of man to praise Thee," and "the remainder of wrath" art Thou also able to restrain. And O, most holy and compassionate Father, when we shall be made willing to "break off our sins by righteousness, and our transgressions by remembering the poor, to undo the heavy burdens and let the oppressed bondsman go free, and to break every yoke; and when we shall be constrained to acknowledge, that it is Thou alone O, Lord most High, who rulest and reignest not only in the armies of Heaven, but in the kingdoms of men and settest up over them whomsoever Thou wilt and exaltest for a season the basest of men, and when the purposes of Thy inscrutable will shall be accomplished towards this people and the inhabitants of the earth, be pleased to look down again upon Thy land and pity Thy people, restore again peace to this afflicted land, and prosperity to this guilty nation. And O, most merciful and compassionate Father, while the overflowing scourge is thus permitted to pass by, overspreading with the shadow of darkness, destruction and death, our beloved land, be pleased to preserve Thy faithful confiding ones in patience and in peace in Thy holy and everlasting and spiritual kingdom, safe as in Thy holy enclosure and under the shadow of Thy Divine wing. And since wars and desolations are determined even unto the end, may all thy devoted and confiding children the world over, be found like Thy faithful servant Daniel of old going their way in peace and standing in their lots "at the end of the days;" looking forward in the full assurance of faith to the coming of that time when the "stone cut out without hands" shall smite upon all these kingdoms and break them in pieces, and they shall become as the chaff of the summer threshing floor, and the wind shall carry them away, and no more place shall be found for them; and the stone shall become great mountain, and fill the whole earth; when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ and "from the rising of the sun until the going down of the same," His "name shall be great among the Gentiles, and in every place incense shall be offered "unto His name and a pure offering; for unto Thee O Lord Almighty, and the Lamb, belong the kingdom and the glory and the honor and power, the might, majesty and dominion, not only now, but henceforth and forever more. Amen.

Twelfth Month, 1862.

Second Month 2nd, 1862.—The solemn warning to be prepared for our final change, is frequently heard. A. T. M., a schoolmate and friend of M. A.'s a few weeks since, sunk from her chair into the arms of a friend of hers, with whom she was pleasantly conversing, and suddenly expired. She was much beloved and deeply lamented. Some of our friends and distant relations have been called to part with their children. Three died in one family, two promising sons in another, and an interesting daughter in a third, all of that afflicting and formidable malady, the diphtheria.

We feel that we have abundant cause for thankfulness for having been spared serious sickness or suffering; our little circle still remaining unbroken. "Bless the Lord, O, my soul, and forget not all his benefits."

Fourth Month 8th.—The latter part of last month, Milton Petit, who was visiting families called on us, having an opportunity with us. He appeared in supplication, and had considerable to communicate.

About three years since, on the sudden death of his wife, leaving a number of children, wrote him a letter, to which he alluded, expressing the comfort and consolation it afforded him in that time of trial, and encouraging him to faithfulness in the performance of appointed duty. His visit was acceptable to us.

Last First-day we were informed of the death of Milton Petit, a young man and nephew of the first named, and that the funeral would be at Short Creek at 1 p. m. It was impressed mind that it would be required of me to feel at the grave, which affected me even to trembling. This continued until the commencement of the meeting. The house was nearly filled, many coming from town.

Fourth Month 8th.—Three appeared in testimony and two in supplication. I felt entirely cured, and returned both thankful and peaceful. I find it best to try the fleece both wet and dry, and to present no offering that is not accompanied with continued or increased weight. It is certainly better to err through fear than through hardness, yet there may be danger of grievously wounding the spirit of grace. The corpse of the young man was attired in his usual dress. This seemed unnatural to me, if not a departure from the simplicity of truth. When Lazarus arose, he came forth bound in his grave clothes, and his sisters when looking for Jesus beheld his grave clothes lying in the tomb. There is a solemnity befitting the dead. Should any of our family and especially my dear children use these pages, I am willing they should know it is my desire that this perishing body should be attired in a simple shroud and placed in a plain coffin when my dust must return to earth as it was, and my spirit I humbly hope God who gave it.

Fifth Month.—A good Quarterly Meeting. An interesting memoir of Maria Hall was read. She was aged nine years, and had been dealt with in a remarkable manner. She said, "My heavenly Father has prepared me for this age more than any of you know of. None of you have an idea of half the length of eternity, the glory of the heavenly city. I am going to heaven, to the blessed mansions where I shall dwell forever in the bosom of my Saviour and sing praise." How truly said the psalmist, "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou perfected praise."

(To be continued.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

THE OLDEN QUAKER.

J. W. HODSON.

When Quakers to their meetings go,
For worship and for prayer;
They may have melody, but no
Need of the organ there.

Their melody's within the heart,
Which sweet communion fills;
The music's in their inward part,
Which soul and spirit thrills.

No need of college bred divines,
The pulpit for to fill;
But as the Lord moves on their minds
They preach, or they keep still.

No need of sermons written out,
Or subjects planned to fill,
But as the Lord may bring about
The purpose of his will.

They strive to know, and do his will
And heed it everywhere;
Sometimes they preach, sometimes they're still,
Sometimes they're heard in prayer.

Oh! when He doth deign to teach
Without the aid of man,
That no one ever dare to preach
Or mar his holy plan.

'Tis his own prerogative
Mankind Himself to teach.
And ours to in submission live
To preach or not to preach.

And as the Gospel freely came
As free as water ran,
They dare not say they'll preach the same,
And ask their pay of man.

They ask no pay of man for what
Their Maker bids them do,
But in submission to their lot
They trust their Master through,

Who offered to each one who wrought
Within his vineyard bower
The penny which their service sought,
E'en to the eleventh hour.

He never faileth to fulfil
The promise He has made,
So they can safely trust Him still
Until the penny's paid.

He pays in full for every time
They labor for Him, and
What more could they desire of Him,
What more could they demand.

He pays all as the laborer wrought
In full for every claim,
Not one day missed by Him or aught
In payment of the same.

It's downright pay in every case,
No waiting till to-morrow;
How could they ever have the face
To ask of men to borrow,

Or hire out by the year as though
The Lord would never pay,
And where the highest wages go
For what they have to say.

The Quaker dare not preach for hire
Or sell what's not his own,
Or even preach from a desire
That springs from self alone.

But as the Lord moves on his heart
As with a burning fire,
With words which he should then impart,
To preach he may aspire.

He then the Gospel may proclaim
As from the Lord above,
But only in the Saviour's name
And in the Father's love;

The Master going with him through
The whole of the discourse,
And bringing language to his view
His message to enforce.

They heed the motions in their hearts
Their Master's pointings there,
And only preach what life imparts
His message to declare;

He being Bishop, Priest and Lord
And Minister to those Whom He has called to preach the Word
His Gospel to disclose.

BAIRNIES CUDDLE DOON.

ALEX. ANDERSON.

The bairnies cuddle doon at nicht,
Wi' muckle fauch an' din;
"O, try and sleep, ye waukrife rognies,
Your faither's comin' in."
They never heed a word I speak;
I try to gie a froom,
But aye I hap them up, an' cry,
"O, bairnies, cuddle doon."

Wee Jamie wi' the curly heid—
(He aye sleeps next the wa'),
Bangs up an' cries, "I want a piece."
The rascal starts them a'.
I rin and fetch them pieces, drinks,
They stop awee the soun',
Then draw the blankets up and cry,
"Noo, weanies, cuddle doon."

But ere five minutes gang, wee Rab
Cries oot, frae' neath the claes,
"Mither, mak' Tam gie over at once,
He's kittlin' with his tacs.
The mischief's in that Tam for tricks,
He'd bother half the toon;
But aye I hap them up and cry,
O, bairnies cuddle doon."

At length they hear their father's fit,
An', as he seeks the door,
They turn their faces to the wa',
While Tam pretends to snore.
"Hae all the weans been gude?" he asks,
As he pits off his shoon,
"The bairnies, John, are in their beds,
An' lang since cuddled doon."

An' just before we bed oursel's,
We look at our wee lambs;
Tam has his airm' roun' wee Rab's neck,
An' Rab his airm' roun' Tam's.
I lift wee Jamie up the bed,
An', as I straik each croon,
I whisper till my heart fills up,
"O, bairnies, cuddle doon."

The bairnies cuddle doon at night
Wi' mirth that's dear to me;
But sune the big world's cark and care
Will quaten doon their glee.
Yet come what will to ilka ane,
May He who sits aboon
Aye, whisper, tho' their paws be bauld,
"O, bairnies, cuddle doon."

Ninth Month 25th, 1892.

IN No. 14, of the present volume of THE FRIEND, there was published a letter from Richard Shackleton, written while attending London Yearly Meeting in 1791. A Friend suggests printing the Epistle issued by London Yearly Meeting, that year. It is as follows:

ANNUAL EPISTLE FROM THE YEARLY MEETING IN LONDON TO THE QUARTERLY AND MONTHLY MEETINGS OF FRIENDS IN GREAT BRITAIN AND ELSEWHERE. 1791.

Dear Friends:—In that love which is the bond of religious fellowship, we affectionately salute you who profess the blessed Truth, wherever scattered in your several allotments, and wish you health and salvation through Jesus Christ our Lord. Brethren, we write not to you as a matter of form, but as having our minds impressed with a renewed sense of the state of the Church. We have in humble gratitude to commemorate the continued kindness of Divine Providence in enabling us once more to meet together and to hold our annual assembly, which hath been large, and in a good degree owned by the gracious regard of Him without whom no religious act can be acceptably performed. Under a lively sense of the necessity of waiting for this holy help, and, we trust, under some experience of it, the affairs of our religious Society have been transacted at this time. The accounts of sufferings brought in this year, principally for tithes, and those called church-rates, in Great Britain, amount to five thousand, two hundred and eighty-four pounds, and in Ireland, to one thousand four hundred and ninety-one pounds. We greatly desire that all professing with us may see the nature and ground of our testimony for the free Gospel of Christ, and against the great evil of endeavoring to make gain thereof; that so, being closely and feelingly united in principle and practice, all may be of the same mind, all speak the same thing.

We have received at this time accounts of the state of our religious Society in this nation, and Ireland; and also epistles from New England, New York, Pennsylvania and the Jerseys, Maryland, Virginia, the Carolinas and Georgia; whereby we are informed of the prevalence of love throughout the Society, and that (notwithstanding the sorrowful declension of many professing with us) divers from time to time join it by conviction. We find it our concern at this time to remind you, dear Friends, that though a sound form be requisite, it is essentially necessary that we should wait for a Divine power to quicken and animate it. Our forefathers turned away from such as had a form of godliness, but who denied the power thereof. Let not us then, their successors in the same faith, settle down in formality, or rest content with anything short of feeling the life and power of Truth in our religious movements.

As a Christian Society, we have found it our duty to promote the abolition of the slave trade; and, although the legislature of this country hath not yet done away this evil, it still remains our steady concern to discourage so iniquitous a traffic; and, at the present affecting juncture, we think it particularly incumbent on every individual deeply to ponder his own particular share in the testimony, which we have so long believed it to be our duty to bear, and to be careful not to stifle the smallest conviction of duty; more especially that the prospect of gain may not lead any to countenance a trade, of which the immediate and unavoidable consequence is the miseries of men.

Inasmuch as we are sensible that the Lord Almighty is still graciously caring for and visiting his Church, and that his forming, qualifying hand is preparing and leading forth, many of the rising generation into the service of the day; it is the earnest travail of our spirits, that these may be preserved in watchfulness, fidelity and obedience.

It is not enough that the eye hath been once opened to see the beauty and excellence which are in the Truth; it is not enough to have walked well for a time, or even to have been rightly engaged in some religious services: that eye may again close, and that capacity for service may decay. There is a necessity to follow on to know the Lord, and to experience the renewings of a right spirit, in order to be preserved in a state of safety and of ability to labor in the cause of Christ.

And may those who are advanced in years, and in religious growth, not trust to their former experiences of good and to the sense and understanding which they have had in spiritual things, but may they diligently wait for the arising of that power in their hearts which reneweth the mind, and preserveth in a freshness and liveliness of spirit, even in old age; that so they may have their fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. All are called to purity and holiness: without which, it is said, "no man shall see the Lord." (Heb. xii: 14.) Let us, beloved Friends, in the strength of Gospel love, entreat all, both old and young, to walk as becometh our high and holy profession; so that our Christian simplicity of manners, uprightness of conduct, and universal charity, may answer the just witness in all; and that serious persons of other professions who are thoughtful about a future state, being induced, by observing our lives and conversation, to inquire into our principles, may, through the Divine blessing on their honest and impartial search, be brought to the experience and acknowledgment of the Truth, as it is in Jesus. Be not discouraged by the smallness of numbers in any place, from attending with diligence your week-day meetings. We need to have our spiritual strength often renewed, and it was esteemed by our forefathers and elders in the Truth, to be as profitable as well as necessary duty. When any then are negligent in this part of our testimony, let it be the care of those who remain livingly sensible of the benefit of these opportunities, to stir up such to their duty; and let the deficient seriously consider, whether, by a neglect of this part of our religious duty, they are not in danger of gradually declining from a life of faith and holiness, and falling into evils which at present they may hold in abhorrence.

Finally, brethren, in the fresh feeling of that uniting love, which is the mark of discipleship; that universal love which reaches over sea and land, and anxiously desires the welfare and happiness of the whole mass of mankind in that love, and in the words of the apostle, "We commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified," (Acts xx: 32.)

Clerk to the Meeting this year.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Galls and Ants.—The galls of a gall-fly, produced on an oak, attract, states Dr. Ráthay, by their viscid secretion, a number of small ants, which he believes to be advantageous to the tree, in killing quantities of caterpillars and other insects which are its natural enemies.

A Fish Farm.—L. West in The British Friend, describes a visit to Joseph John Armitstead's fish farm, near Dunfries, Scotland. It is supplied with water flowing from the adjacent hills.

The business of this valley is to send out salmon, trout and grayling, &c., alive to customers all over the world, to stock new waters or renew the stocks of old exhausted ones. To accomplish this, hundreds of very large stock fish are kept in deep ponds supplied with a constant stream of water through them. In the winter months the eggs are collected from these fish, and are taken to the hatching-house and deposited in a single layer on glass grids, and immersed in shallow running spring water, where the embryo fish slowly develop, taking about three months to hatch at a temperature of 42° Far., every degree of heat accelerating the development five days, and every degree fall of temperature retarding development to a similar extent. A trout egg is about the size of a yellow pea, such as commonly used for splitting, and the shell being transparent the development of the embryo is most interesting to watch. With the aid of a microscope the whole internal arrangements are very easy of examination, the action of the heart, the circulation of the blood, the abrasion of fat globules by the blood corpuscles all being distinctly visible. The appearance of two dark eyes is the first indication to the naked eye of the development of the embryo; after these become fully developed, the eggs are ready for sending out as "eyed ova" in tens, hundreds, or thousands as required, and will bear almost any journey merely packed in damp moss, and are much more hardy after the eyes are developed than before. After the fry come out of the eggs they are known as "alevins," and continue in this state, nature-sustained by a bag of oil, known as the umbilical sac, for about a month, when, having absorbed their supplies from this source, they commence to feed in the ordinary way. At this period they become more individual in their existence, and instead of all putting their heads together in the darkest corner they swim about freely, and explore their prison and try to escape down stream; and if a particle of anything drops on the water it is immediately pounced upon by some small fish, anxious to try if it is good to eat. The commissariat department is a most important one. This will be readily understood when we say that in an establishment of the kind there are hundreds of trout, three to ten pounds each, thousands of fish six to twelve inches long, and millions of small fry, all which require feeding three time per day.

Generally speaking the food consists of two kinds, namely, natural and artificial; the former being again divisible into naturally provided food, and that which is collected from outside sources.

The larger part of the food is artificial, and consists of mussels, beef, horseflesh, or liver very finely divided or coarsely chopped, according to the size of the fish to be fed; and we can assure our readers that it is a most interesting sight to see the fish feed. The small ones are exceedingly quick and voracious, and the larger ones are positively savage, and on the first appearance of the keeper with the food show signs of the wildest excitement. On looking into a pond that a moment before apparently contained nothing alive, we see huge trout darting about in all directions; and when the keeper throws in a handful of food the fish rise en masse and greedily devour it, some actually jumping out to catch it as it falls.

The natural food consists of flies, caddis worms, water-snails, fresh water shrimps, small fish, and the thousand and one other forms of life found in water, nothing coming amiss to a trout which is not too large to swallow. The collected food consists of worms and maggots purposely raised in enclosures, and tadpoles trapped and fattened in ponds, and esteemed a very dainty morsel. To encourage insect life, suitable aquatic plants are introduced into the ponds and water-courses, and botanical ponds are set apart for rare and beautiful varieties: and again other ponds are set apart for special insects. We found the time all too short to inspect the contents of fifty or more ponds.

Careful observation shows that among fish, a fish one pound weight lays a thousand eggs, a two pounder two thousand, and so on. In a state of nature almost every bird, beetle, reptile, fish or insect, which lives in or around a stream, preys upon fish-eggs; and it is estimated that not more than ten per-cent. of the number ever have the chance of hatching. This will be readily believed when we add the risks from the above enemies, the destruction of ova by floods and other accidents, the artificial spawning and hatching all the above risks are obviated, and it is occasionally possible to hatch over a hundred per cent. of fish from eggs, some eggs being double-yoked and hatching two small fish, though, our friends say, these twins rarely, if ever, live.

Moles.—The first naturalist to make man intimate with this curious subterranean laborer, was Henri le Court. He managed to escape with his life from Paris, during the reign of terror, and settled down in a quiet part of the country. This gentleman studied all the habits of the mole, and some of his methods of eliciting the truth about them were somewhat ingenious. We are told, for example, that being desirous of ascertaining the secret with which the creature can travel through one of its tunnels, he "watched his opportunity" and when the animal was out on its feed, at one of the most distant points from its fortress, which the mole's high road leads, Le Court placed along the course of that road, between the mole and the fortress, several little ladders with small pieces of paper attached to straws at certain distances, the straws penetratonwards into the passage. Near the end of the subterranean road he inserted a horn, mouth-piece of which stood out of the ground. When all was ready, Le Court blew a blast loud enough to frighten all the moles within hearing, from their propriety, and the mole, whose presence at the spot he had well ascertained, sympathized in the panic. Down went the first little flag, and one after another folded with astonishing celerity as the mole came into contact with the flag straws in his rush towards the fortress, indeed, the spectators affirmed that its swiftness was equal to that of a race at a good round trot.—Cassell's Natural History.

Iron Manufacture Among the Kafirs.—The Kavenda Kafirs are a branch of the Makatse, closely allied to the Basutos, and amongst these people iron-smelting and manufacturing work in a rough way is carried on. My friend arranged that I should witness the making of a "pick" or agricultural hoe, the principal article fabricated, and the head Kavenda gave me his pony on which to ride to his home on the summit of a hill, where I was received by himself and assistants under a thatched roof, where the primitive forge was erected. The furnace was soon lighted, charcoal being used, and small calabash containing iron (the ore produced from an iron mountain in the vicinity, previously smelted) was produced, the contents of which were thrown on the fire when violently heated. When the metal was fused it was laid on a large block of stone and beaten into shape by another heavy stone, wielded with great force by a stalwart and adept assistant, and it was interesting to watch how, with the rough implements, the pick slowly but surely grew into shape. It was taken from the furnace by a rough pair of tongs held by the headman, who always whistled during the time he held it on the stone anvil and his assistant gave a grunt brought down his heavy weight on the exact spot indicated by his chief. During the whole time two men took it in turn to blow the bellows, made of buck or goat skin, and the hollow horns of antelopes for the fun, whilst several visitors squatted around and watched the operation. It was living in the country, and thought travelled back to the bygone times in human progress.

These picks are greatly valued by Kafir agriculturists, always maintaining a value of at least five shillings, and are greatly preferred to those made in Birmingham, which can be bought and sold for less money.—A Naturalist in Transvaal.

Caught in the Act.—J. Watson, F. L. S., writing in the Reading Mercury, tells the following story, whilst spending my summer vacation in a lonely farm-house among the hills, I remember going out with a man-servant to shoot. Young as I was, I pleaded long and earnestly that they might be spared, urging that if they were again they took a young pigeon, they would do finite good as a 'set off' by the quantity of game they destroyed. The fellow would not be moved by my entreaties, however, as he perfectly well knew that the pair of owls that were perched on their nest upon the beam in the barn had just laid their young pigeons. After lying for some time under a sycamore at the top of the fold, I crept up and skimmed silently over the trees and entered the pigeon-cot. Soon it emerged with its claws. 'There,' said the man, 'caught in the act!' And so it was—of killing one of the largest rats I ever saw; for the stupid rustic fired and killed it, and this rodent dropped from its claws. Rats were the authors of the mischief, which, if allowed, the owls would have exterminated."

Reform in the Coptic Church.—The native race of Egypt (Copts) have from ancient times been professors of a form of Christianity. Among them the clergy had the predominating influence, but the laity occupied a higher place than in the Roman Catholic Church. The Khedives formed a committee, exclusively of laymen, who should be consulted in all matters pertaining to the temporal affairs of the Coptic community. A Reform party arose requiring better schools and teachers. The clergy resisted the movement, and the Patriarch sided with them. An appeal was made to the Khedive, with the result that the Patriarch was remanded to his monastery and a vicar appointed in his place.

The English Episcopal Church.—Archdeacon Farrar knows how to wield a caustic pen when so inclined. He sometimes probes the English Church, of which he is a distinguished preacher and ecclesiastic, in a manner which lays bare her sore spots so that the proper remedy may be applied. When stern rebuke is required, he is fearless and independent enough to administer it. In one of his latest exposures he draws a picture both dark and alarming. Here it is: "I see her lapsing on every side into Romanism in all but name; I see but few living saints among her professors, though I hear the name of 'saint' bandied among one another by her partisans. I see her undoubtedly losing some of her hold upon the upper classes, who are growing more indifferent to her Sabbaths and her ordinances. I see her producing little real effect on the working-classes, who are the great mass of the nation, not ten per cent. of whom attend her churches. I see her standing with weak hands and feeble knees in the great battle against the masterful force of drink, or even siding with his champions or palliating his intolerable enormities; and others saying smooth things and prophesying deceits. Let those others, if they will, prop tottering walls with untempered mortar. There are plenty of them to do it and to be rewarded for it. I will not."—The Presbyterian.

Practical Sermons.—W. E. Gladstone says: "The class of sermons which I think are most needed, are of the class which offended Lord Melbourne long ago. Lord Melbourne was one day seen coming from church in the country in a mighty fume. Finding a friend, he exclaimed, 'It is too bad. I have always been a supporter of the Church, and I have always upheld the clergy. But it is really too bad to have to listen to a sermon like that we have had this morning. Why the preacher actually insisted upon applying religion to a man's private life!' But that is the kind of preaching which I like best, the kind of preaching which men need most, but it is, also, the kind of which they get the least."

The "Conference" held at Indianapolis in the Tenth Month.—The British Friend says of this gathering, and of the discussion in it of the Pastoral System, that "the most remarkable feature was a paper by Dr. William Nicholson, of California, who has hitherto been considered as opposed to the pastorate system. He clearly pointed out its dangers, and said that it meant the theological seminaries, church fairs, &c., and yet he endorsed it! He said that the duty of ministers now was to be in absolute submission to the Pastor, to speak or keep silence as he bade them, and to sit on the platform or in the body of the meeting, as he indicated!"

Is it possible that this Friend, long held in much esteem, has become one of the "dead fish," that float with the current?

WE are too fond of our own will. We want to be doing what we fancy mighty things; but the great point is, to do small things, when called to them, in a right spirit.—Cecil.

A GOOD STORY is told of a minister by the name of Samuel Jones, an incident that happened when the well-known preacher first started in evangelistic work. He went to a small town and was told that he would have a hard time in the church, as there were numerous feuds existing between the members, and two brothers, who both belonged to the church, never spoke to each other, nor did their families.

The night for opening the meeting arrived. The minister entered the meeting-house while the choir and congregation were singing:

Come, angel band;
Come and around me stand.
Oh, bear me away on your snowy wings
To my immortal home.

When the centre of the house was reached the minister stopped in the aisle, waived his hat at the choir and shouted:

"Stop! stop that singing!"

The music ceased at once, and the minister continued:

"That's not a fit song to be singing in this church. I am told there are brothers and cousins who belong here and yet don't speak to each other. Now do you think there is any danger of hearing the rustling of angels' wings beneath the roof with such a state of affairs? You won't hear any kind of wings rustle so long as that sort of thing keeps up, unless it's a buzzard's wings."

The two brothers made friends before the meeting broke up.—Atlanta Journal.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 31, 1892.

WE have received a communication from Job S. Gidley, of North Dartmouth, Mass., which commences as follows:

In THE FRIEND of Ninth Month 3rd, in the article taken from The Australian Friend, the editor of that paper, writing of the departures from Quakerism, among the members of the larger Bodies, in the "Western States of America," asks—"Can nothing be done to turn the tide? Will it continue to ebb and ebb, until nothing is left of Friends but the old name traced on the deserted shore?" How would it do for the Conservative Friends in these meetings to join themselves to the smaller Bodies of Friends, in the "Far West," who are endeavoring to keep true Quakerism alive and to live up to the principles which they profess? Otherwise, will not those who are inclined to Methodism in these larger Bodies draw the more conservative ones among them all down under the water together?

In the editorial of THE FRIEND, of Tenth Month 29th, the following may be found: "A letter received from a valued Friend in New England, a member of the larger Body there, queries whether the time has not 'nearly come' or the way is opening for Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to move with the view of bringing into fellowship and harmonious action the Friends on this continent who are striving to uphold the ancient doctrines of the Society?" Ibid Tenth Month 29th, "A minister in the larger Body, Kansas Yearly Meeting, says: 'To me the saddest thing in our condition is that the Conservative Friends make so little effort to keep together and work hand to hand to build up the cause for which our fathers suffered.'" And Twelfth Month 10th, the following appears as the language used by a minister, a former Clerk of a Western Yearly Meeting: "The religious Society of Friends has ceased to exist; and Friends'

Church is inevitably moving in the direction of Methodism." He added, "that the only thing which he saw for him to do was, to accept this movement as inevitable, and conform himself to it."

J. S. Gidley thinks that if there could be a gathering together of the fragments that remain—of all those in every place who retain their allegiance to the original doctrines of Friends—there would be a greater interchange of religious visits through our Society than now exists, there would be "a larger number of Friends in the different Yearly Meetings who would be so filled with love to God and their fellow-men, that they would feel as Paul the apostle did, when he said unto Barnabas: 'Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do.'"

He adds—"Will the oppressed ones wait for Philadelphia? She has her own work to do. Will they complain because the Conservative Bodies of Friends seem to make little effort to keep together? They have their own burdens to bear. Will they hearken unto those who say that the Society of Friends has ceased to exist, and move along with the current? Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind."

In reflecting upon the questions raised by our correspondent, we feel that they are very serious. In the nature of things, true unity and fellowship cannot exist in a body whose members take opposite views on important and fundamental questions which affect the practices of the body. Hence we see no probability of the stoppage of the process of disintegration which is now going on, unless a great change should come over the feelings and views of the people. We feel sympathy for those tried ones who attend meetings where much is transacted with which they cannot unite. But we are willing to leave to their own convictions the solution of the question as to what course it is best for them to pursue. This no doubt will vary with the varying situations in which they are placed. But whether they remain in connection with those who have departed from the principles of Friends, or whether they withdraw, we desire that they may manifest their adhesion to our doctrines and testimonies, and so conduct themselves that it will be known to others that they do not acquiesce in the departures visible about them.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Senator McPherson has introduced a joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend, until otherwise ordered by Congress, all purchases of silver bullion, as provided in the first section of the act of Seventh Month 14th, 1890. He asked that it be laid on the table, and gave notice that, immediately after the holiday recess, he would ask to have it taken up and acted on.

The Senate and House have adjourned until First Month 4th, 1893.

Immediately upon the assembling of the Senate after the recess, the Army bill will be reported and called up at an early day. The total amount of this bill, as it passed the House, was $24,197,639, with an estimate of $25,923,955. The bill, as it passed the House, was less than $1,725,315 less than the estimate, and $110,860 less than the appropriation of last year.

The present session of the Fifty-second Congress is not quite up to the ante-holiday record of the short session of the Fifty-first Congress. The House has so far passed the Army bill, and reported only the Fortifications bill.

The Duluth Board of Trade has issued a call for a convention to be held in Washington, D. C., First Month 12th, 1893, to discuss and promote the construction of a deep-water ship canal connecting the great lakes and the Atlantic. All commercial associations, including industrial unions and farmers' organizations, are asked to send delegates.

The Indians at the Pueblo of Zuni, who were accused of torturing two alleged witches, have resisted the efforts of the United States Marshals to arrest them, and troops have been sent from Fort Wingate. Trouble is feared.

The Mille Lac band of Chippewas are strongly protesting against their removal by the Government to the White Earth reservation.

The President has issued a proclamation reserving for timber and fish culture purposes the island of Afognak, Alaska, and its adjacent rocks and territorial waters, including the Sea Lion Rocks and Sea Otter Island. It is said that this reservation is one of the most important yet made. "The salmon and trout crowd the Afognak river at the breeding season, and there is no doubt that by preserving it, it will become a breeding place for all the other waters of Alaska and the different rivers of the United States in all the future; whereas, if it had been left to the depredations already commenced upon it, the fish there, as they have elsewhere in the United States, would become utterly exterminated."

The resurvey of the boundary line between Delaware and Pennsylvania has practically been completed, the placing of the marking stones at intervals of a half mile only remaining to be done. A thin strip of territory, on which possibly twenty persons live, has been added to Pennsylvania's area.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, reg., 112½ a 113, coupon, 113½ a 114; currency, 6's, 105 a 115.

COTTON was quiet, but steady on a basis of 10½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, $16 a 17c., and spring do. $15 a 16 per ton.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.00 a $2.25; do., extras, $2.25 a $2.75; No. 2 winter family, $2.75 a $3.15; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 a $3.75; Western winter, clear, $3.25 a $3.65; do. do., straight, $3.65 a $3.90; winter patent, $4.00 a $4.25; Minnesota, clear, $3.08 a $3.50; do., straight, $3.60 a $4.00; do., patent $4.20 a $4.50; do., favorite brands, higher. Rye flour moved slowly at $3.45 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania. Buckwheat flour was quiet at $1.90 a 2.00 per 100 pounds for new.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 74 a 74½ cts.

No. 2 mixed corn, 47½ a 47½ cts.

No. 2 white oats, 39½ a 40 cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Good, 5 a 5½c.; medium, 4½ a 4¾c.; Extra Chicago, 9½c.; other Western, 9 a 9½c. Fat cows were dull at 2½ a 3½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5½ a 5½c.; good, 4½ a 5c.; medium, 4½ a 4¾c.; common, 3½ a 4c.; culls, 1½ a 3c.; lambs, 5 a 6½c.

HOGS were in fair demand and ½c. higher

FOREIGN.—The investigation of the Panama Canal scandal still continues to occupy the attention of the French Chamber of Deputies. The Royalist and Bonapartist factions are on the alert to take advantage of any weakness on the part of the government, which, however, up to date, has withstood all efforts made to disorganize it.

The Bourse during the past week has been very unsettled. Every day has seen unusual fluctuations. The energetic action of the Government, however, somewhat checked the depressing influences of the Panama Canal disclosures, and especially the gloom due to M. Rouvier's weak defence. Considering the exciting events in the Chamber of Deputies, Rentes have shown surprising firmness.

The discontent that has been prevailing at Havre among the dock laborers for a long time past, has culminated in a general strike. Some trouble was experienced in loading and discharging vessels. It is thought that plenty of men will be available to take the strikers' places.

Six hundred joiners, polishers and saw mill hands employed by the Fairfield Ship Building Company, of Glasgow, went on strike on the 23rd instant, the company having insisted upon a reduction in wages of one farthing an hour. The strikers are buoyed up with the belief that it will be found impolitic to stop work at present on the new steamships for the Cunard Line, and that the company therefore will soon yield.

The employees of all the glass works in Leeds have received notice of a reduction in wages of three shillings a week. The cause of the reduction is dullness in trade. The men intend to resist.

Violent gales are raging off the west coast of Spain. Reports indicate that there have been many fatalities in this part of the Atlantic, and that shipping has suffered seriously along the Spanish coast. The ship

Maria Joaquina managed to make haven at Vigo in disabled condition, her rudder having been unshipped and her mast broken. During the gale her captain was killed and two seamen were drowned. The ship Maria Teresa foundered at San Lucar, and eight of the crew were drowned.

The rejection of the Franco-Swiss Commercial Treaty by the French Chamber of Deputies is bitterly resented in Berne. There is a unanimous feeling favor of reprisals.

A despatch from Hamburg dated Twelfth Month 26th, states:—The Eppendorf Hospital is treating cases of cholera, of which eight are of an exceedingly virulent type. Without doubt the disease is making steady although slow progress. General uneasiness prevails, especially in mercantile circles, which is still under the burdens of last fall's losses. Increases in the sick list and death list would mean within few weeks that all opportunity of making good reverses would be lost. The life insurance companies are said to be already curtailing business.

The famine in the Government of Uleaborg threatens to cause an exodus of the poorer people. Hundreds have gone to the coast of the Gulf of Bothnia to seek means of emigrating. Uleaborg City is crowded with starving peasants. In the interior the people are reported to be dying by scores.

Governor Reyes, commander of the Northern Mexican military zone, has written a letter to President Diaz recommending that the Mexican Government make an arrangement with the United States Government for the pursuit of the border revolutionists over the international boundary line. General Reyes and other high military authorities of that country claim that such an arrangement can be made the border trouble will soon be effectually overcome.

The first issue of an evening paper, called the Star, has made its appearance in Toronto. Its avowed object is to advocate the annexation of Canada to the United States. In its salutatory it says: "We have no hesitation in saying our lack of like progress has been and is entirely due to our unhappy separation from the Republic of the United States, and as our faith is that as one of the States of that Union, we would become more prosperous than we can be as British colonies alongside the overshadowing great Republic, we shall devote ourselves to the furtherance of this great mission."

It is understood that efforts will be made by the Mexican Government to turn the tide of emigration which has been flowing from Europe to the United States to that country in view of the probable passage by the United States Congress of laws further restricting immigration. It is rumored that the authorities to several of the Mexican States are preparing to send emigration commissioners of Italy, Sweden, Ireland and Germany.

Ten thousand troops have been mobilized to suppress the spreading rebellion in the Argentine Province of Corrientes.

NOTICES.

Through the kindness of two Friends, I have had a loan of original Yearly Meeting "Extracts" as set down by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, from the years 1749 to 1825, inclusive—with the exceptions mentioned below—and as these are now very scarce, I had copies carefully made. Four years are lacking—1752, 1753, 1757 and 1759—and in order to complete the set, I should be very much obliged to any one who could loan me these, or any of them, or old suggest where I might procure them. I desire solely to make copies, and will then carefully return them. I am especially desirous of the "Extracts" for 1757, as recording the action of the Yearly Meeting on Slavery, in response to the efforts of John Woolman and others. HOWARD M. JENKINS

A service for which my dear mother had long been preparing, and which she contemplated with awfulness and many fears, now presented the immediate requiring of her great Master, early in the Sixth Month she laid before the Monthly Meeting a concern to visit Friends at Dunkirk, Guernsey, and some parts of the north of England and Scotland, having in prospect to hold meetings also with those not in connection with our Society. The trial which it was her affectionate feelings, and the conflicts she endured, when thus about to leave her husband and children, are somewhat described in the following extract from a letter, dated

Sixth Month 23rd, 1792. Thy sympathy in the present important prospect is truly consolatory, and thy encouragement to follow apprehended duty is strengthening. Ah! my progress indeed been slow, and my experience comparatively small; but how much has it cost my life, yea, almost its destruction, to be in the service I am, loosened from my precious domestic

When a gracious Master demands the sacrifice of obedience, what struggles do I renewed feel to give up all; at this moment I am even ready to question whether that faith to which all things are possible will be victorious, or whether that the small grain will so increase as to give the victory."

In the first of the Eighth Month she sailed for Waterford, being accompanied by her friends, Elizabeth Pim and Edward Hatton, both felt bound to the service; respecting the accomplishment of which, my dear mother writes as follows:

"Through merciful preservation we arrived at Milford about seven o'clock this morning after a very tedious passage.

5th. We proceeded from Haverfordwest to Portharthen, where, as there was a meeting-house belonging to Friends, we ventured to invite the people to come and sit with us: a little company attended, and I think there was no reason to be dissatisfied with this step. We proceeded on to Llandovery to lodge, and reached the mouth the next day, called on a family of friends about a mile from the town, who are situated in a lonely situation far from meeting, separated from the Society of Friends; some communication in a sitting with them tended to relieve our minds, and I hope sealed some profitable instruction on theirs. We went from thence to Ross, and finding their Monthly Meeting was to be held the next day, concluded to attend it. Our minds being drawn in Gospel love to those not of our Society, notice was circulated and many came to the meeting, which proved a solemn one. E. H. was engaged with good authority, and the season ended in humble acknowledgment of Divine mercy. We had a religious sitting in the family where we lodged, and proceeded that evening to Gloucester, where we also felt bound to appoint a meeting; and though but few attended, it was an open, relieving time, affording renewed cause to trust in the never-failing arm of saving strength.

"We reached Buford the evening of the 9th, and were affectionately received at the hospitable dwelling of Thomas Huntley. In religious retirement after supper, we were refreshed together, and felt a little of that fellowship which is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. We had a season of religious worship next morning with the boys in their school room, and afterwards proceeded to High Wycomb, where we arrived just as Friends were going to a meeting held at seven in the evening on that day of the week; it was a solid time, the number attending not large. Here I met with my old companion Adey Bellamy, who took me to his house, and with his wife, a valuable religious woman, lodged and entertained us most kindly.

"11th. After breakfast we went to see our friend Mary Green, and her three daughters, where we were favored with an opportunity the most refreshing and strengthening to my poor mind, of any we have had since leaving Waterford. A. B. supplicated, and after some communications in the line of ministry, his wife revived the language of David, 'Surely mercy and goodness hath followed me all the days of my life,' &c., when our valuable friend M. G., with whom much sympathy was felt, made humble acknowledgment of the mercy renewedly extended to her; after which another return of prepared praise closed this memorable season, wherein it seemed to me such food was graciously handed, as might be gone in the strength of many days, and our spirits were bowed in thankfulness to the Lord. We left this place in peaceful serenity, and reached London to tea, being cordially received at my dear friend J. Eliot's.

"12th. Attended Westminster meeting, which was to my feelings a low season, though E. H. was well concerned in testimony. The afternoon meeting was wholly silent, but I thought inward travail was got to, which it is a favor to be willing to abide under, even a state where the seed can be profitably visited and interceded for; believing that in this situation groans which cannot be uttered, reach the sacred ear. My mind was instructed in these seasons, as well as in a time of retirement at our lodgings, in the evening, and though my lips were closed in this city, I was in degree thankful for one sense of life,—renewed willingness to suffer.

"13th. After attending the Morning Meeting, where our certificates were read, we apprehended ourselves clear of London, and left it about four o'clock, accompanied by John Eliot and John Bevans. Arrived at Rochester late that evening, and not feeling easy to proceed without having a meeting there, one was appointed for next morning. This through Divine favor, proved a season of considerable relief; it was wholly confined to Friends, and I believe properly so, as it appeared a visit to our fellow members, who are sometimes deprived of their portion when others are present. Many Friends dined with us, at William Rickman's, and a solemn season afterwards crowned this labor of love. We proceeded to Dover that night, where, though not arriving until past ten o'clock, we were hospitably received at Richard Baker's.

"We found that our dear friends Martha Routh and Christiana Hustler, were daily expected from Dunkirk, and that a vessel was likely to sail for that place in the morning. We had before thought only of Calais, but R. B. recommending this, in preference, we changed our original intention, and set sail on Fourth-day morning the 12th, with a favorable breeze, but this soon slackened, so that we were about twelve hours on sea, and suffered much from sickness. The gates of the town being shut when we got into harbor, we were obliged to remain on board all night. On reaching the house of our kind friend William Rotch, next morning, we found it was their usual meeting day; but not feeling ourselves equal to sitting down profitably, so soon after a voyage, it was deferred to six in the evening, when we assembled, and though but a small number, it felt a time of solemnity.

"On conferring together next morning, it seemed consonant to all our feelings to sit with the few families, and we began at that of our kind host, with whom, his wife and two daughters, we were favored to feel spiritual refreshment.

"In proceeding with this engagement, much exercise attended, and the truth of the Scripture assertion was sensibly enforced, 'ye have need of patience;' but I had afresh to consider that it is part of the laborer's business to break up the fallow ground, as well as to sow the seed; this is the hardest portion of the work, but the servant is not to choose. It is enough for the servant to be as his Master, and the disciple as his Lord. May I increasingly learn this salutary lesson, for I am far behind my fellow laborers in the glorious work.

"First-day, the 19th. Our meeting this morning was attended by a few others besides Friends, and through the extension of Divine regard, proved solemn; holy help being afforded to visit the different states of the people to some relief, and I trust profit. In the evening, at our lodging, a memorable season crowned this day, so that it was indeed measurably known that through continued mercy the outgoings of the morning and the evening rejoice.

"20th. After the last family sitting an exercise which had attended my mind since coming here, became so heavy that I mentioned to my companions the view of having a meeting with the inhabitants of this place; they encouraged me, but did not appear to be themselves, under the weight of it. This tried my faith, and on speaking to our dear friend William Rotch, he expressed some fear that owing to the present state of public affairs it would not be of much advantage. Having moved so far, I felt relieved, and willing either to give the matter wholly up, or to yield to it in the morning, should the pressure continue. After supper, a very solemn season ensuing, wherein access was mercifully afforded to the throne of Divine grace, and renewed strength experienced, we again conferred on the subject, and concluded to appoint a meeting, and though the number attending was but small, it proved a season owned by the liberty of the Gospel. E. Hatton was early engaged with good authority on the testimony concerning our Saviour, 'In Him was life, and the life was the light of men.' E. Pim followed acceptably, and strength was afterwards afforded for one of the poorest to be engaged in the service of a gracious Master, who was pleased mercifully to help while advocating his cause.

"At the close of this meeting, the members of our Society were requested to remain; and we had to recommend an attention to some points which seemed overlooked by Friends in this place, and to encourage to deep watchfulness lest the testimony of Truth might fall; also to strengthen the hands of those concerned for its support: this felt a solemn conclusion to our visit here, and my mind was favored with a sense of calmness and relief.

"Apprehending that liberty was now given to proceed, we prepared for doing so, and just before separating, the feeling of Divine love sweetly cemented our spirits, under which a fresh salutation arose to several present, and solemn acknowledgment of the Lord's unfailing mercy was made; under which covering, and the evidence of solid peace, we parted with this dear family. There were, besides the household, several at this last opportunity for whom travail of soul had been experienced, that they might abide under the softening influence of heavenly love, and submit to the holy discipline of the cross.

"Benjamin Rotch accompanied us to Calais, where we were detained two days by unfavorable wind; a trial of patience, feeling anxious to get forward.

"24th. We embarked from Calais about four o'clock in the afternoon, and had a sick passage of eight hours; landing at Dover, I trust with thankful hearts, and were again affectionately received at our kind friend Richard Baker's.

"26th. Attended the usual meeting, which was an exercising time: the life of religion being so low that suffering with the oppressed seed was our portion. My companions were well engaged, and I was drawn to supplicate for the church in her wilderness state, faith being mercifully afforded to trust that she will yet be brought forth: this I felt to be a renewed favor from the Divine hand.

"I strongly recommend a frequent perusal of the Holy Scriptures; they afford instruction and consolation to the seeking mind. The revelation of these sacred truths very much depends on the state of mind in which we read them. I have derived unspeakable advantage, and many times my mind has felt comfort, from an early acquaintance with them, which makes me desirous that all may cherish a partiality for reading them: I well know their real value.—Be frequently in the practice of retiring and waiting on the Lord; seek his counsel as your only sure guide through life; it will enable you to pursue the necessary avocations you may be engaged in.—Live loose to the fleeting things of time; place not your affections on sensual pleasures; let the Almighty Father of the universe, the Saviour and Redeemer of mankind, be your first love; give Him the greatest room in your hearts, allow Him to come in and abide with you; may you never reject the tender visitations of Divine love, nor spurn the gentle reproofs and admonitions of unerring wisdom, which can only lead you in the right path;—be not ashamed to acknowledge the Lord in all your ways."—Margaret Jackson.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Extracts From Letters Written During a Summer Holiday Trip.

On the 20th of Sixth Month, my aunt and I left Baxter Springs, duly equipped for a two weeks sojourn in the Indian Territory. The same horse and buggy that for so many years had carried her from house to house, visiting the sick and afflicted Indians, was now at our disposal, having been sent up for that purpose a few days before.

We left early, for though our destination was only twenty miles from Baxter, it was part of aunty's plan to be present at a Quapaw council, that was to meet at the house of the chief. She was greatly exercised over a bill that has been gotten up by the white people here in their own interests, about which the council met. She hoped to be able to induce them not to accept of it. Many of their friends in Baxter were likewise concerned, for so far the impenetrable stupidity of the tribe (and they are the most backward of any in this agency), had prevented their seeing that it was contrary to their interests. We reached the house in good time. A drove of horses roamed at will about the place. Soon the Indians began to gather; they came on horseback and in wagons, and met together under the spreading trees. Aunty talked to them through an interpreter, with what result time will show.

I am ashamed to say that I took a nap in the carriage while they were talking, but wakened sufficiently before it was over to secure a photograph of them. One of the group, Buffalo Calf, I had seen before in Baxter Springs. Many of the Indians had come to town that day bringing bead work, bows and arrows, etc., to sell, hoping to raise sufficient funds to attend a travelling show then stopping in the place.

I was particularly attracted to Buffalo, for he, still clinging to the tastes of his ancestors, was gorgeously decorated with scarlet ribbon and feathers. Gladly he consented to stand for me, and as I pulled the magazine out to let the plate drop and expose a fresh one, he walked up confidently, holding out his hand and expecting, of course, to see himself at once reproduced, and life size no doubt. I satisfied him, however, by promising him a copy if it was good. I gave him two at the council, and he was evidently gratified, for he stuck one on each side of his hat, and marched away, the admired and envied of all his fellows.

Aunty having relieved her mind was comfortable to proceed and enjoy the rare beauty of the scenery. Oh, the prairies are lovely! They give exactly the effect of a boundless ocean, only this is of waving grass instead of rolling waters. The luxuriance everywhere is almost intoxicating. Occasionally there were tilled fields, and in every case, the wheat, oats or corn was of the most excellent quality. We passed many enclosures that kept within bound vast herds of cattle. Splendid creatures they were too, preparing for the Chicago and Kansas City market.

Whenever we came upon an eminence, the view was indescribably lovely, and the air the blows over the rolling prairies is soft and balmy almost as balmy as that of Nantucket, and the flowers scarcely less lovely.

All along on our left the forests that follow the course of the Spring River could plainly be seen, and finally they were joined from our right by those of the Neosho, until the whole region became densely wooded. Through this we drove for some time, until we reached a turn in the road, and there before us was "Nancy's!" Yes, it was true. We were really at our journey's end, and my curiosity was unbounded to find out what a real Indian home would be like. I felt certain from the first that I should find clean, for aunty had lived with her for years and was as particular on that score as I dare be. Still I had never seen inside, and I was curious. Nancy, herself, came to the gate to meet us. She is a large, fine looking woman, dignified in her manner, and reserved as most of her people are. The house stands in the midst of a large yard, surrounded by a high rail fence. Unlike most other Indian homes we have seen, it has a gate on each side, so one need not climb the fence.

The house itself is of log, with a large porch in front and back. It contains two rooms downstairs, and two attic rooms above. After the closest scrutiny I find it all scrupulously clean. One of the upper apartments proved a very comfortable sleeping room, it being still almost as aunty left it several years ago, and we felt ourselves at home in it at once.

When supper was announced we found ourselves served in the wide porch. The butter, meat and cream looked so tempting I felt sure other things would be right all through our stay. We were provided with not only the necessities but many of the luxuries of life. Her vegetables came fresh from the garden close by, and her young chickens—well, I need say no more, and only have mentioned these things because I did some fears about the table myself.

In the woods by the house, a delicious spring of clear, cool water bubbles up, and from it rises a sparkling stream. Over this stream her spring house is built, and after my first visit I no longer marvelled at her butter and cream. I have at my disposal one of the prettiest ponies, "Johnnie," whose pace is the very poetry of motion, and whose gallop is, to say the least, highly exhilarating. Then there are two beautiful dogs that follow me wherever I go. The winds in such a delightfully aimless way, that you may go miles and miles without seeing any one or coming to anything in particular.

The grandest primeval forests stretch on three sides from the yard around Nancy's home, while to the north extend her goodly acres. She has 160 in all, since the allotment of the land, and about half of them cleared. Splendid crops of wheat and corn grow upon them, and a very fine orchard containing several hundred trees gives her an abundance of fruit.

On the afternoon of the day following our arrival, Nancy and I started for Grand River. Nellie was slow, and as the day was hot, while er choose her own gait. We had to ford Spring River. It is a beautiful stream, about one-eighth of a mile wide at this place, densely wooded on both sides. Giant elms and sycamores lean far over the water; magnificent they are in their native glory, undescrated as yet by the ruthless hand of man. It requires an experienced person to ford the river in safety, but I felt no fears with my Indian guide. We waded amid stream, with the water flowing through the bottom of the buggy, while I took a photograph. Two or three miles more brought us at last past the Government School buildings, and on to the P. O. that rejoices in such a high sounding name, and the no less pompous postmaster glories in that of Napoleon! I managed to secure a photograph as the contrast was so great between the low log structure and its pretentious appellation, but alas, the sun was obscured by a cloud that hitherto had been almost unnoticed, but which to our dismay we saw rapidly climbing the sky. Not only this, but rumblings of distant thunder warned us of an approaching storm. Eager to reach the ford before it broke, Naney proposed a short cut, which she knew, thinking so to save time, which in the end proved the truth of the proverb that, "the longest way round is the shortest way home; for after driving along a dark, narrow trail, that took us over stumps, stoned and fallen trees, we came to the verge of a deep ravine that must be crossed, and behold the bridge, a rickety concern at best, was down! It was so dark by this time that Naney was walking ahead to see if the road was passable. Vivid lightning flashed about us, and the thunder roared among the hills, so that our position was scarcely enviable. No time was to be lost, however, so in some way, though how I can never tell, we turned around and retraced our steps until we came to a rail fence. This we tore down. While in the act an Indian came galloping up to us, and though I had feared otherwise, he leaped from his horse and politely offered to put it up, at the same time assuring we could reach the road beyond. Gratefully we found ourselves at the ford. I shall never forget that crossing. It was now past sunset, and the dark outlines of the wooded banks of the river were set against the still darker sky, which was continually illuminated with the lightning flashes. Unused as I was to fording, the sensation was a fearful one, for the rapidly moving current made us seem to be hopelessly drifting up stream. At last we were over, and the lie who seemed to realize the position, soon led us at home. We were scarcely inside, when the storm broke, and such a night as it was! 'Twas a novel feeling to lie in a cabin and hear the rain beat, it seemed on our heads; and the lightning and thunder all made it fearfully grand. A beautiful day followed this stormy night, and my aunt and I took advantage of it to visit an Indian friend who lived near. I was not at all prepared to find what I did, a refined, cultivated woman, who had lived most of her life in the city, and was in every way a superior person. We spent a day and night with her really delightfully, and then accompanied her on a drive to the Government School, and were delighted with the beautiful arrangement everywhere. From here we went to another well known Indian home, and in the evening attended a reception of the Government employees, held at the house of the Agent. My aunt had so impressed me with the fact that I could see no one, that my wardrobe limited me to appearing in a last year's boating suit. However, I did not allow that to spoil my pleasure, for the several hundred guests that gathered in the beautifully lighted grounds about the Agency were interested in their work, and I learned from different ones a great deal about the Indian question. The Agent told me that he thought within two years time this whole Agency could be done away with, and the Indians be made citizens. This may be a good thing for some of the more progressive among them, but for most, the end will inevitably be absolute penury, for they are mostly so lazy and hire their farms to a poor class of whites, and they of course take advantage of them in every way they can.

We spent First-day at the Modoc Mission. We found a delightful family there. The husband, a Friend from Maine, was thoroughly educated and his wife, whom he had lately married, had always lived and worked among the Indians. These Modocs interested me greatly. Fifteen years ago they were brought from Oregon in chains, and were one of the most warlike tribes, but now they seem quiet and peaceable and even contented with their lot.

Second-day was the Fourth, and the Indians, always glad of an excuse, celebrated it in typical fashion—that is, by having a barbecue. Anxious to be present on such an occasion, I gladly consented to accompany Naney to Miami, a little village on the edge of the agency, where the celebration was to take place. About twelve hundred persons we found assembled in a large grove, where a brass band and all sorts of penny shows were helping on the fun. Many of the Indians were gorgeously decorated for the occasion. Red was the predominating color, but bright yellow, green and blue in some cases satisfied them. But I have not told you what a barbecue is, and I naturally suppose you to be as ignorant as I was myself. They dig a trench from eight to ten feet deep, according to the size of the animal to be barbecued, and line the inside with stones. Upon this they pile wood, and burn it until it is a mass of live coals. Then they run poles through the animal prepared for roasting, resting them upon the sides of the trench. Over this they build a gable of rails, covering heavily with damp straw. Upon this they again pile earth and allow it to roast (so I was told) for two or three days. They say the meat is delicious, but I did not indulge in any.

A large platform was being erected in the woods preparative to a dance in the evening, but we did not stay to see it, for I had some work to do at home. My camera was full of exposed plates and I wished to develop them that night. I had been prospecting for a place where I could fix a dark room, and had determined upon a corner of the spring-house. The cracks between the logs were so large that even at night a great deal must be done to make it entirely dark, so I spent an hour or more in carrying down every available article for hangings and coverings. Rag carpet, blankets, shawls and most of my personal wardrobe, by means of tacks, stones and sticks, were made to answer the purpose, and having prepared my chemicals and all things being ready I anxiously awaited the night. Somehow, during my preparations it did not occur to me that the spring-house, situated as it is in a woods and some distance from the house, would be a less attractive spot during the night, than it was in the daytime; however it turned out that, when occupied in my cell, such visions of rattlesnakes, scorpions and centipedes—with all which the territory swarms—filled my mind that I too much hurried my work and so spoiled many of my negatives. I did not stop to consider whether any or all of these creatures were nocturnal in their habits, there seemed no reason to me then why they should not be all about me. Almost every time I moved I managed to step upon a loose board, which immediately sprang high into the air at one end and descended low into the soft ooze at the other. I kept at my post, however, until nearly midnight, and then making my plates, carried them to the house and carefully ranged them on a table, leaning one edge against the wall. In my wisdom I placed every one with the gelatine face out. In the morning, to my dismay, I found each covered with a thick coating of fine saw-dust—some nocturnal beast had been boring in the logs above—so that all those not spoiled in the developing, now came up to the proper standard for amateur work.

I must not leave this description of our Indian home without mentioning one incident, which interested me greatly, showing as it does that the Indian has not yet learned all that his civilized neighbors can teach him, in that he still feels himself one with the wild animals about him and not their natural born enemies. Upon the dressing-table that stands between our two windows (both of which are innocent of sash) is a box with a curtain. Inside this a pair of wrens have built their nest. The mother bird sits there most of the time, while her mate flits about and brings her food. He does not seem to mind us a bit, but comes to the table as we stand by, and hops around, turning his cunning little head to one side, and looking up in the sauciest manner possible, and treats us exactly as poachers, and, I dare say, has watched our preparations for to-morrow's departure with genuine pleasure. I, however, feel far otherwise, and would gladly prolong our stay, but Colorado lies before me, and though nothing in the future seems so delightful as the present, I know I shall soon cease to regret, because I shall have no time for it. I took my last gallop on Johnnie to-day, and to-morrow our drive home will be our last trip in the Territory. My next will be from Colorado Springs—so farewell for the present.

Fifth Month, 1862.—At our Quarterly Meeting, a year since, I was led strongly to desire, if not secretly to petition, that the spirit of supplication might be poured upon us, and rest on some of our ministers. Ann Branson, whom I never remember having heard in prayer before, appeared fervently in that exercise, and at considerable length. My desires were answered.

Seventh Month.—A committee of our school district waited on me asking my subscription to the Bounty Fund. They said I must head the list with $100, and would not be denied, telling me others of our Society had subscribed, and nearly all would contribute. I assured them that if every one besides should contribute, I could not. Addressing one of them, a serious man and a professor, I told him he could understand my conscientious scruples. This was a matter between my Maker and myself, for which I was not to be finally accountable to man. That I could not resort to arms in self-defence, or countenance or encourage others in so doing, and that I could as soon part with my right hand as sign their paper for that purpose, for I could never again expect to enjoy peace of mind, unless through repentance and forgiveness for my error. He admitted I was sincere, but said, "How different it is with me. I believe I am doing God's service!" Perhaps he will be excused. We must not limit the mercy of God.

Ninth Month.—Our brother and sister, Silas and Anna Taber, and their eldest children Mary and Reuben, also our cousins Jesse and Cynthia Harkness, attended their Yearly Meeting, the former making their home with us. We were pleased with their company, and our regret was mutual that we could not meet together and worship the one only and true God at the same altar. O, the heartburnings and the heart-breakings of these separations! I cannot think they were in the ordering of Divine Wisdom.
